59. This must suffice as a reply to the false accusations brought by Faustus against the three fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, from whom the God whom the Catholic Church worship was pleased to take His name. This is not the place to discourse on the merits and piety of these three men, or on the dignity of their prophetic character, which is beyond the comprehension of carnal minds. It is enough in this treatise to defend them against the calumnious attacks of malevolence and falsehood, in case those who read the Scriptures in a carping and hostile spirit should fancy that they have proved anything against the sacredness and the profitableness of these books, by their attempts to blacken the character of men who are there mentioned so honorably.

60. It should be added that Lot, the brother, that is the blood relation, of Abraham, is not to be ranked as equal to those of whom God says, "I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob;" nor does he belong to those testified to in Scripture as having continued righteous to the end, although in Sodom he lived a pious and virtuous life, and showed a praiseworthy hospitality, so that he was rescued from the fire, and a land was given by God to his seed to dwell in, for the sake of his uncle Abraham. On these accounts he is commended in Scripture--not for intemperance or incest. But when we find bad and good actions recorded of the same person, we must take warning from the one, and example from the other. As, then, the sin of Lot, of whom we are told that he was righteous previous to this sin, instead of bringing a stain on the character of God, or the truth of Scripture, rather calls on us to approve and admire the record in its resemblance to a faithful mirror, which reflects not only the beauties and perfections, but also the faults and deformities, of those who approach it; still more, in the case of Judah, who lay with his daughter-in-law, we may see how groundless are the reproaches cast on the narrative. The sacred record has an authority which raises it far above not merely the cavils of a handful of Manichaeans, but the determined enmity of the whole Gentile world; for, in confirmation of its claims, we see that already it has brought nearly all people from their idolatrous superstitions to the worship of one God, according to the rule of Christianity. It has conquered the world, not by violence and warfare, but by the resistless force of truth. Where, then, is Judah praised in Scripture? Where is anything good said of him, except that in the blessing pronounced by his father he is distinguished above the rest, because of the prophecy that Christ would come in the flesh from his tribe?(2)

61. Judah, as Faustus says, committed fornication; and besides that, we can accuse him of selling his brother into Egypt. Is it any disparagement to light, that in revealing all things it discloses what is unsightly? So neither is the character of Scripture affected by the evil deeds of which we are informed by the record itself. Undoubtedly, by the eternal law, which requires the preservation of natural order, and forbids the transgression of it, conjugal intercourse should take place only for the procreation of children, and after the celebration of marriage, so as to maintain the bond of peace. Therefore, the prostitution of women, merely for the gratification of sinful passion, is condemned by the divine and eternal law. To purchase the degradation of another, disgraces the purchaser; so that, though the sin would have been greater if Judah had knowingly lain with his daughter-in-law (for if, as the Lord says, man and wife are no more two, but one flesh,(3) a daughter-in-law is the same as a daughter); still, it is plain that, as regards his own intention, he was disgraced by his intercourse with an harlot. The woman, on the other hand, who deceived her father-in-law, sinned not from wantonness, or because she loved the gains of iniquity, but from her desire to have children of this particular family. So, being disappointed in two of the brothers, and not obtaining the third, she succeeded by craft in getting a child by their father; and the reward which she got was kept, not as an ornament, but as a pledge. It would certainly have been better to have remained childless than to become a mother without marriage. Still, her desire to have her father-in-law as the father of her children was very different from having a criminal affection for him. And when, by his order, she was brought out to be killed, on her producing the staff and necklace and ring, saying that the father of the child was the man who had given her those pledges, Judah acknowledged them, and said, "She hath been more righteous than I" --not praising her, but condemning himself. He blamed her desire to have children less than his own unlawful passion, which had led him to one whom he thought to be an harlot. In a similar sense, it is said of some that they justified Sodom;(1) that is, their sin was so great, that Sodom seemed righteous in comparison. And even allowing that this woman is not spoken of as comparatively less guilty, but is actually praised by her father-in-law, while, on account of her not observing the established rites of marriage, she is a criminal in the eye of the eternal law of right, which forbids the transgression of natural order, both as regards the body, and first and chiefly as regards the mind, what wonder though one sinner should praise another?

62. The mistake of Faustus and of Manichaeism generally, is in supposing that these objections prove anything against us, as if our reverence for Scripture, and our profession of regard for its authority, bound us to approve of all the evil actions mentioned in it; whereas the greater our homage for the Scripture, the more decided must be our condemnation of what the truth of Scripture itself teaches us to condemn. In Scripture, all fornication and adultery are condemned by the divine law; accordingly, when actions of this kind are narrated, without being expressly condemned, it is intended not that we should praise them, but that we should pass judgment on them ourselves. Every one execrates the cruelty of Herod in the Gospel, when, in his uneasiness on hearing of the birth of Christ, he commanded the slaughter of so many infants.(2) But this is merely narrated without being condemned. Or if Manichaean absurdity is bold enough to deny the truth of this narrative, since they do not admit the birth of Christ, which was what troubled Herod, let them read the account of the blind fury of the Jews, which is related without any expression of reproach, although the feeling of abhorrence is the same in all.

63. But, it is said, Judah, who lay with his daughter-in-law, is reckoned as one of the twelve patriarchs. And was not Judas, who betrayed the Lord, reckoned among the twelve apostles? And was not this one of them, who was a devil, sent along with them to preach the gospel?(3) In reply to this, it will be said that after his crime Judas hanged himself, and was removed from the number of the apostles; while Judah, after his evil conduct, was not only blessed along with his brethren, but got special honor and approval from his father, who is so highly spoken of in Scripture. But the main lesson to be learned from this is, that this prophecy refers not to Judah, but to Christ, who was foretold as to come in the flesh from his tribe; and the very reason for the mention of this crime of Judah is to be found in the desirableness of teaching us to look for another meaning in the words of his father, which are seen not to be applicable to him in his misconduct, from the praise which they express.

64. Doubtless, the intention of Faustus' calumnies is to damage this very assertion, that Christ was born of the tribe of Judah. Especially, as in the genealogy given by Matthew we find the name of Zara, whom this woman Tamar bore to Judah. Had Faustus wished to reproach Jacob's family merely, and not Christ's birth, he might have taken the case of Reuben the first-born, who committed the unnatural crime of defiling his father's bed, of which fornication the apostle says, that it was not so much as named among the Gentiles.(4) Jacob also mentions this in his blessing, charging his son with the infamous deed. Faustus might have brought up this, as Reuben seems to have been guilty of deliberate incest, and there was no harlot's disguise in this case, were it not that Tamar's conduct in desiring nothing but to have children is more odious to Faustus than if she had acted from criminal passion, and did he not wish to discredit the incarnation, by bringing reproach on Christ's progenitors. Faustus unhappily is not aware that the most true and truthful Saviour is a teacher, not only in His words, but also in His birth. In His fleshly origin there is this lesson for those who should believe on Him from all nations, that the sins of their fathers need be no hindrance to them. Besides, the Bridegroom, who was to call good and bad to His marriage,(5) was pleased to assimilate Himself to His guests, in being born of good and bad. He thus confirms as typical of Himself the symbol of the Passover, in which it was commanded that the lamb to be eaten should be taken from the sheep or from the goats--that is, from the righteous or the wicked.(6) Preserving throughout the indication of divinity and humanity, as man He consented to have both bad and good as His parents, while as God He chose the miraculous birth from a virgin.

65. The impiety, therefore, of Faustus' attacks on Scripture can injure no one but himself; for what he thus assails is now deservedly the object of universal reverence. As has been said already, the sacred record, like a faithful mirror, has no flattery in its portraits, and either itself passes sentence upon human actions as worthy of approval or disapproval, or leaves the reader to do so. And not only does it distinguish men as blameworthy or praiseworthy, but it also takes notice of cases where the blameworthy deserve praise, and the praiseworthy blame. Thus, although Saul was blameworthy, it was not the less praiseworthy in him to examine so carefully who had eaten food during the curse, and to pronounce the stern sentence in obedience to the commandment of God.(1) So, too, he was right in banishing those that had familiar spirits and wizards out of the land.(2) And although David was praiseworthy, we are not called on to approve or imitate his sins, which God rebukes by the prophet. And so Pontius Pilate was not wrong in pronouncing the Lord innocent, in spite of the accusations of the Jews;(3) nor was it praiseworthy in Peter to deny the Lord thrice; nor, again, was he praiseworthy on that occasion when Christ called him Satan because, not understanding the things of God, he wished to withhold Christ from his passion, that is, from our salvation. Here Peter, immediately after being called blessed, is called Satan.(4) Which character most truly belonged to him, we may see from his apostleship, and from his crown of martyrdom.

66. In the case of David also, we read of both good and bad actions. But where David's strength lay, and what was the secret of his success, is sufficiently plain, not to the blind malevolence with which Faustus assails holy writings and holy men, but to pious discernment, which bows to the divine authority, and at the same time judges correctly of human conduct. The Manichaeans will find, if they read the Scriptures, that God rebukes David more than Faustus does.(5) But they will read also of the sacrifice of his penitence, of his surpassing gentleness to his merciless and bloodthirsty enemy, whom David, pious as he was brave, dismissed unhurt when now and again he fell into his hands.(6) They will read of his memorable humility under divine chastisement, when the kingly neck was so bowed under the Master's yoke, that he bore with perfect patience bitter taunts from his enemy, though he was armed, and had armed men with him. And when his companion was enraged at such things being said to the king, and was on the point of requiting the insult on the head of the scoffer, he mildly restrained him, appealing to the fear of God in support of his own royal order, and saying that this bad happened to him as a punishment from God, who had sent the man to curse him.(7) They will read how, with the love of a shepherd for the flock entrusted to him, he was willing to die for them, when, after he had numbered the people, God saw good to punish his sinful pride by lessening the number he boasted of. In this destruction, God, with whom there is no iniquity, in His secret judgment, both took away the lives of those whom He knew to be unworthy of life, and by this diminution cured the vainglory which had prided itself on the number of the people. They will read of that scrupulous fear of God in his regard for the emblem of Christ in the sacred anointing, which made David's heart smite him with regret for having secretly cut off a small piece of Saul's garment, that he might prove to him that he had no wish to kill him, when he might have done it. They will read of his judicious behavior as regards his children, and also of his tenderness toward them--how, when one was sick, he entreated the Lord for him with many tears and with much self-abasement, but when he died, an innocent child, he did not mourn for him; and again, how, when his youthful son was carried away with unnatural hostility to an infamous violation of his father's bed, and in a parricidal war, he wished him to live, and wept for him when he was killed; for he thought of the eternal doom of a soul guilty of such crimes, and desired that he should live to escape this doom by being brought to submission and repentance. These, and many other praiseworthy and exemplary things, may be seen in this holy man by a candid examination of the Scripture narrative, especially if in humble piety and unfeigned faith we regard the judgment of God, who knew the secrets of David's heart, and who, in His infallible inspection, so approves of David as to commend him as a pattern to his sons.

67. It must have been on account of this inspection of the depths of David's heart by the Spirit of God that, when on being reproved by the prophet, he said, I have sinned, he was considered worthy to be told, immediately after this brief confession, that he was pardoned--that is, that he was admitted to eternal salvation. For he did not escape the correction of the fatherly rod, of which God spoke in His threatening, that, while by his confession he obtained eternal exemption, he might be tried by temporal chastisement. And it is a remarkable evidence of the strength of David's faith, and of his meek and submissive spirit, that, when he had been told by the prophet that God had forgiven him, although the threatened consequences were still permitted to follow, he did not accuse the prophet of having deluded him, or murmur against God as having mocked him with a declaration of forgiveness. This deeply holy man, whose soul was lifted up unto God, and not against God, knew that had not the Lord mercifully accepted his confession and repentance, his sins would have deserved eternal punishment. So when, instead of this, he was made to smart under temporal correction, he saw that, while the pardon remained good, wholesome discipline was also provided. Saul, too, when he was reproved by Samuel, said, I have sinned.(1) Why, then, was he not considered fit to be told, as David was, that the Lord had pardoned his sin? Is there acceptance of persons with God? Far from it. While to the human ear the words were the same, the divine eye saw a difference in the heart. The lesson for us to learn from these things is, that the kingdom of heaven is within us,(2) and that we must worship God from our inmost feelings, that out of the abundance of the heart the mouth may speak, instead of honoring Him with our lips, like the people of old, while our hearts are far from Him. We may learn also to judge of men, whose hearts we cannot see, only as God judges, who sees what we cannot, and who cannot be biased or misled. Having, on the high authority of sacred Scripture, the plainest announcement of God's opinion of David, we may regard as absurd or deplorable the rashness of men who hold a different opinion. The authority of Scripture, as regards the character of these men of ancient times, is supported by the evidence from the prophecies which they contain, and which are now receiving their fulfillment.

68. We see the same thing in the Gospel, where the devils confess that Christ is the Son of God in the words used by Peter, but with a very different heart. So, though the words were the same, Peter is praised for his faith, while the impiety of the devils is checked. For Christ, not by human sense. but by divine knowledge, could inspect and infallibly discriminate the sources from which the words came. Besides, there are multitudes who confess that Christ is the Son of the living God, without meriting the same approval as Peter--not only of those who shall say in that day, "Lord, Lord," and shall receive the sentence, "Depart from me," but also of those who shall be placed on the right hand. They may probably never have denied Christ even once; they may never have opposed His suffering for our salvation; they may never have forced the Gentiles to do as the Jews;(3) and yet they shall not be honored equally with Peter, who, though he did all these things, will sit on one of the twelve thrones, and judge not only the twelve tribes, but the angels. So, again, many who have never desired another man's wife, or procured the death of the husband, as David did, will never reach the place which David nevertheless held in the divine favor. There is a vast difference between what is in itself so undesirable that it must be utterly rejected, and the rich and plenteous harvest which may afterwards appear. For farmers are best pleased with the fields from which, after weeding them, it may be, of great thistles, they receive an hundred-fold; not with fields which have never had any thistles, and hardly bear thirty-fold.

69. So Moses, too, who was so faithful a servant of God in all his house; the minister of the holy, just, and good law; of whose character the apostle speaks in the words here quoted;(4) the minister also of the symbols which, though not conferring salvation, promised the Saviour, as the Saviour Himself shows, when He says, "If ye believed Moses, ye would also believe me, for he wrote of me,"--from which passage we have already sufficiently answered the presumptuous cavils of the Manichaeans;--this Moses, the servant of the living, the true, the most high God, that made heaven and earth, not of a foreign substance, but of nothing--not from the pressure of necessity, but from plenitude of goodness--not by the suffering of His members, but by the power of His word;--this Moses, who humbly put from him this high ministry, but obediently accepted it, and faithfully kept it, and diligently fulfilled it; who ruled the people with vigilance, reproved them with vehemence, loved them with fervor, and bore with them in patience, standing for his subjects before God to receive His counsel, and to appease His wrath;--this great and good man is not to be judged of from Faustus' malicious representations, but from what is said by God, whose word is a true expression of His true opinion of this man, whom He knew because He made him. For the sins of men are also known to God, though He is not their author; but He takes notice of them as a judge in those who refuse to own them, and pardons them as a father in those who make confession. His servant Moses, as thus described, we love and admire, and to the best of our power imitate, coming indeed far short of his merits, though we have killed no Egyptian, nor plundered any one, nor carried on any war; which actions of Moses were in one case prompted by the zeal of the future champion of his people, and in the other cases commanded by God.

70. It might be shown that, though Moses slew the Egyptian, without being commanded by God, the action was divinely permitted, as, from the prophetic character of Moses, it prefigured something in the future. Now however, I do not use this argument, but view the action as having no symbolical meaning. In the light, then, of the eternal law, it was wrong for one who had no legal authority to kill the man, even though he was a bad character, besides being the aggressor. But in minds where great virtue is to come, there is often an early crop of vices, in which we may still discern a disposition for some particular virtue, which will come when the mind is duly cultivated. For as farmers, when they see land bringing forth huge crops, though of weeds, pronounce it good for corn; or when they see wild creepers, which have to be rooted out, still consider the land good for useful vines; and when they see a hill covered with wild olives, conclude that with culture it will produce good fruit: so the disposition of mind which led Moses to take the law into his own hands, to prevent the wrong done to his brother, living among strangers, by a wicked citizen of the country from being unrequited, was not unfit for the production of virtue, but from want of culture gave signs of its productiveness in an unjustifiable manner. He who afterwards, by His angel, called Moses on Mount Sinai, with the divine commission to liberate the people of Israel from Egypt, and who trained him to obedience by the miraculous appearance in the bush burning but not consumed, and by instructing him in his ministry, was the same who, by the call addressed from heaven to Saul when persecuting the Church, humbled him, raised him up, and animated him; or in figurative words, by this stroke He cut off the branch, grafted it, and made it fruitful. For the fierce energy of Paul, when in his zeal for hereditary traditions he persecuted the Church, thinking that he was doing God service, was like a crop of weeds showing great signs of productiveness. It was the same in Peter, when he took his sword out of its sheath to defend the Lord, and cut off the right ear of an assailant, when the Lord rebuked him with something like a threat, saying, "Put up thy sword into its sheath; for he that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword."(1) To take the sword is to use weapons against a man's life, without the sanction of the con stituted authority. The Lord, indeed, had told His disciples to carry a sword; but He did not tell them to use it. But that after this sin Peter should become a pastor of the Church was no more improper than that Moses, after smiting the Egyptian, should become the leader of the congregation. In both cases the trespass originated not in inveterate cruelty, but in a hasty zeal which admitted of correction. In both cases there was resentment against injury, accompanied in one case by love for a brother, and in the other by love, though still carnal, of the Lord. Here was evil to be subdued or rooted out; but the heart with such capacities needed only, like good soil, to be cultivated to make it fruitful in virtue.

71. Then, as for Faustus' objection to the spoiling of the Egyptians, he knows not what he says. In this Moses not only did not sin, but it would have been sin not to do it. It was by the command of God,(2) who, from His knowledge both of the actions and of the hearts of men, can decide on what every one should be made to suffer, and through whose agency. The people at that time were still carnal, and engrossed with earthly affections; while the Egyptians were in open rebellion against God, for they used the gold, God's creature, in the service of idols, to the dishonor of the Creator, and they had grievously oppressed strangers by making them work without pay. Thus the Egyptians deserved the punishment, and the Israelites were suitably employed in inflicting it. Perhaps, indeed, it was not so much a command as a permission to the Hebrews to act in the matter according to their own inclinations; and God, in sending the message by Moses, only wished that they should thus be informed of His permission. There may also have been mysterious reasons for what God said to the people on this matter. At any rate, God's commands are to be submissively received, not to be argued against. The apostle says, "Who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been His counsellor?"(3) Whether, then, the reason was what I have said, or whether in the secret appointment of God, there was some unknown reason for His telling the people by Moses to borrow things from the Egyptians, and to take them away with them, this remains certain, that this was said for some good reason, and that Moses could not lawfully have done otherwise than God told him, leaving to God the reason of the command, while the servant's duty is to obey.

72. But, says Faustus, it cannot be admitted that the true God, who is also good, ever gave such a command. I answer, such a command can be rightly given by no other than the true and good God, who alone knows the suitable command in every case, and who alone is incapable of inflicting unmerited suffering on any one. This ignorant and spurious goodness of the human heart may as well deny what Christ says, and object to the wicked being made to suffer by the good God, when He shall say to the angels, "Gather first the tares into bundles to burn them." The servants, however, were stopped when they wished to do this prematurely: "Lest by chance, when ye would gather the tares, ye root up the wheat also with them."(1) Thus the true and good God alone knows when, to whom, and by whom to order anything, or to permit anything. In the same way, this human goodness, or folly rather, might object to the Lord's permitting the devils to enter the swine, which they asked to be allowed to do with a mischievous intent?(2) especially as the Manichaeans believe that not only pigs, but the vilest insects, have human souls. But setting aside these absurd notions, this is undeniable, that our Lord Jesus Christ, the only son of God, and therefore the true and good God, permitted the destruction of swine belonging to strangers, implying loss of life and of a great amount of property, at the request of devils. No one can be so insane as to suppose that Christ could not have driven the devils out of the men without gratifying their malice by the destruction of the swine. If, then, the Creator and Governor of all natures, in His superintendence, which, though mysterious, is ever just, indulged the violent and unjust inclination of those lost spirits already doomed to eternal fire, why should not the Egyptians, who were unrighteous oppressors, be spoiled by the Hebrews, a free people, who would claim payment for their enforced and painful toil, especially as the earthly possessions which they thus lost were used by the Egyptians in their impious rites, to the dishonor of the Creator? Still, if Moses had originated this order, or if the people had done it spontaneously, undoubtedly it would have been sinful; and perhaps the people did sin, not in doing what God commanded or permitted, but in some desire of their own for what they took. The permission given to this action by divine authority was in accordance with the just and good counsel of Him who uses punishments both to restrain the wicked and to educate His own people; who knows also how to give more advanced precepts to those able to bear them, while He begins on a lower scale in the treatment of the feeble. As for Moses, he can be blamed neither for coveting the property, nor for disputing, in any instance, the divine authority.

73. According to the eternal law, which requires the preservation of natural order, and forbids the transgression of it, some actions have an indifferent character, so that men are blamed for presumption if they do them without being called upon, while they are deservedly praised for doing them when required. The act, the agent, and the authority for the action are all of great importance in the order of nature. For Abraham to sacrifice his son of his own accord is shocking madness. His doing so at the command of God proves him faithful and submissive. This is so loudly proclaimed by the very voice of truth, that Faustus, eagerly rummaging for some fault, and reduced at last to slanderous charges, has not the boldness to attack this action. It is scarcely possible that he can have forgotten a deed so famous, that it recurs to the mind of itself without any study or reflection, and is in fact repeated by so many tongues, and portrayed in so many places, that no one can pretend to shut his eyes or his ears to it. If, therefore, while Abraham's killing his son of his own accord would have been unnatural, his doing it at the command of God shows not only guiltless but praiseworthy compliance, why does Faustus blame Moses for spoiling the Egyptians? Your feeling of disapproval for the mere human action should be restrained by a regard for the divine sanction. Will you venture to blame God Himself for desiring such actions? Then "Get thee behind me, Satan, for thou understandest not the things which be of God, but those which be of men." Would that this rebuke might accomplish in you what it did in Peter, and that you might hereafter preach the truth concerning God, which you now, judging by feeble sense, find fault with! as Peter became a zealous messenger to announce to the Gentiles what he objected to at first, when the Lord spoke of it as His intention.

74. Now, if this explanation suffices to satisfy human obstinacy and perverse misinterpretation of right actions of the vast difference between the indulgence of passion and presumption on the part of men, and obedience to the command of God, who knows what to permit or to order, and also the time and the persons, and the due action or suffering in each case, the account of the wars of Moses will not excite surprise or abhorrence, for in wars carried on by divine command, he showed not ferocity but obedience; and God in giving the command, acted not in cruelty, but in righteous retribution, giving to nil what they deserved, and warning those who needed warning. What is the evil in war? Is it the death of some who will soon die in any case, that others may live in peaceful subjection? This is mere cowardly dislike, not any religious feeling. The real evils in war are love of violence, revengeful cruelty, fierce and implacable enmity, wild resistance, and the lust of power, and such like; and it is generally to punish these things, when force is required to inflict the punishment, that, in obedience to God or some lawful authority, good men undertake wars, when they find themselves in such a position as regards the conduct of human affairs, that right conduct requires them to act, or to make others act in this way. Otherwise John, when the soldiers who came to be baptized asked, What shall we do? would have replied, Throw away your arms; give up the service; never strike, or wound, or disable any one. But knowing that such actions in battle were not murderous but authorized by law, and that the soldiers did not thus avenge themselves, but defend the public safety, he replied, "Do violence to no man, accuse no man falsely, and be content with your wages."(1) But as the Manichaeans are in the habit of speaking evil of John, let them hear the Lord Jesus Christ Himself ordering this money to be given to Caesar, which John tells the soldiers to be content with. "Give," He says, "to Caesar the things that are Caesar's."(2) For tribute-money is given on purpose to pay the soldiers for war. Again, in the case of the centurion who said, "I am a man under authority, and have soldiers under me: and I say to one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it," Christ gave due praise to his faith;(3) He did not tell him to leave the service. But there is no need here to enter on the long discussion of just and unjust ways.

75. A great deal depends on the causes for which men undertake wars, and on the authority they have for doing so; for the natural order which seeks the peace of mankind, ordains that the monarch should have the power of undertaking war if he thinks it advisable, and that the soldiers should perform their military duties in behalf of the peace and safety of the community. When war is undertaken in obedience to God, who would rebuke, or humble, or crush the pride of man, it must be allowed to be a righteous war; for even the wars which arise from human passion cannot harm the eternal well-being of God, nor even hurt His saints; for in the trial of their patience, and the chastening of their spirit, and in bearing fatherly correction, they are rather benefited than injured. No one can have any power against them but what is given him from above. For there is no power but of God,(4) who either orders or permits. Since, therefore, a righteous man, serving it may be under an ungodly king, may do the duty belonging to his position in the State in fighting by the order of his sovereign,--for in some cases it is plainly the will of God that he should fight, and in others, where this is not so plain, it may be an unrighteous command on the part of the king, while the soldier is innocent, because his position makes obedience a duty,--how much more must the man be blameless who carries on war on the authority of God, of whom every one who serves Him knows that He can never require what is wrong?

76. If it is supposed that God could not enjoin warfare, because in after times it was said by the Lord Jesus Christ, "I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but if any one strike thee on the right cheek, turn to him the left also,"(5) the answer is, that what is here required is not a bodily action, but an inward disposition. The sacred seat of virtue is the heart, and such were the hearts of our fathers, the righteous men of old. But order required such a regulation of events, and such a distinction of times, as to show first of all that even earthly blessings (for so temporal kingdoms and victory over enemies are considered to be, and these are the things which the community of the ungodly all over the world are continually begging from idols and devils) are entirely under the control and at the disposal of the one true God. Thus, under the Old Testament, the secret of the kingdom of heaven, which was to be disclosed in due time, was veiled, and so far obscured, in the disguise of earthly promises. But when the fullness of time came for the revelation of the New Testament, which was hidden under the types of the Old, clear testimony was to be borne to the truth, that there is another life for which this life ought to be disregarded, and another kingdom for which the opposition of all earthly kingdoms should be patiently borne. Thus the name martyrs, which means witnesses, was given to those who, by the will of God, bore this testimony, by their confessions, their sufferings, and their death. The number of such witnesses is so great, that if it pleased Christ--who called Saul by a voice from heaven, and having changed him from a wolf to a sheep, sent him into the midst of wolves--to unite them all in one army, and to give them success in battle, as He gave to the Hebrews, what nation could withstand them? what kingdom would remain unsubdued? But as the doctrine of the New Testament is, that we must serve God not for temporal happiness in this life, but for eternal felicity hereafter, this truth was most strikingly confirmed by the patient endurance of what is commonly called adversity for the sake of that felicity. So in fullness of time the Son of God, made of a woman, made under the law, that He might redeem them that were under the law, made of the seed of David according to the flesh sends His disciples as sheep into the midst of wolves, and bids them not fear those that can kill the body, but cannot kill the soul, and promises that even the body will be entirely restored, so that not a hair shall be lost.(1) Peter's sword He orders back into its sheath, restoring as it was before the ear of His enemy that had been cut off. He says that He could obtain legions of angels to destroy His enemies, but that He must drink the cup which His Father's will had given Him.(2) He sets the example of drinking this cup, then hands it to His followers, manifesting thus, both in word and deed, the grace of patience. Therefore God raised Him from the dead, and has given Him a name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and of things in earth, and of things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.(3) The patriarchs and prophets, then, have a kingdom in this world, to show that these kingdoms, too, are given and taken away by God: the apostles and martyrs had no kingdom here, to show the superior desirableness of the kingdom of heaven. The prophets, however, could even in those times die for the truth, as the Lord Himself says, "From the blood of Abel to the blood of Zacharia;(4) and in these days, since the commencement of the fulfillment of what is prophesied in the psalm of Christ, under the figure of Solomon, which means the peacemaker, as Christ is our peace,(5) "All kings of the earth shall bow to Him, all nations shall serve Him,"(6) we have seen Christian emperors, who have put all their confidence in Christ, gaining splendid victories over ungodly enemies, whose hope was in the rites of idolatry and devil-worship. There are public and undeniable proofs of the fact, that on one side the prognostications of devils were found to be fallacious, and on the other, the predictions of saints were a means of support; and we have now writings in which those facts are recorded.

77. If our foolish opponents are surprised at the difference between the precepts given by God to the ministers of the Old Testament, at a time when the grace of the New was still undisclosed, and those given to the preachers of the New Testament, now that the obscurity of the Old is removed, they will find Christ Himself saying one thing at one time, and another at another. "When I sent you," He says, "without scrip, or purse, or shoes, did ye lack anything? And they said, Nothing. Then saith He to them, But now, he that hath a scrip, let him take it, and also a purse; and he that hath not a sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one." If the Manichaeans found passages in the Old and New Testaments differing in this way, they would proclaim it as a proof that the Testaments are opposed to each other. But here the difference is in the utterances of one and the same person. At one time He says, "I sent you without scrip, or purse, or shoes, and ye lacked nothing;" at another, "Now let him that hath a scrip take it, and also a purse; and he that hath a tunic, let him sell it and buy a sword." Does not this show how, without any inconsistency, precepts and counsels and permissions may be changed, as different times require different arrangements? If it is said that there was a symbolical meaning in the command to take a scrip and purse, and to buy a sword, why may there not be a symbolical meaning in the fact, that one and the same God commanded the prophets in old times to make war, and forbade the apostles? And we find in the passage that we have quoted from the Gospel, that the words spoken by the Lord were carried into effect by His disciples. For, besides going at first without scrip or purse, and yet lacking nothing, as from the Lord's question and their answer it is plain they did, now that He speaks of buying a sword, they say, "Lo, here are two swords;" and He replied, "It is enough." Hence we find Peter with a weapon when he cut off the assailant's ear, on which occasion his spontaneous boldness was checked, because, although he had been told to take a sword, he had not been told to use it.(1) Doubtless, it was mysterious that the Lord should require them to carry weapons, and forbid the use of them. But it was His part to give the suitable precepts, and it was their part to obey without reserve.

78. It is therefore mere groundless calumny to charge Moses with making war, for there would have been less harm in making war of his own accord, than in not doing it when God commanded him. And to dare to find fault with God Himself for giving such a command, or not to believe it possible that a just and good God did so, shows, to say the least, an inability to consider that in the view of divine providence, which pervades all things from the highest to the lowest, time can neither add anything nor take away; but all things go, or come, or remain according to the order of nature or desert in each separate case, while in men a right will is in union with the divine law, and ungoverned passion is restrained by the order of divine law; so that a good man wills only what is commanded, and a bad man can do only what he is permitted, at the same time that he is punished for what he wills to do unjustly. Thus, in all the things which appear shocking and terrible to human feebleness, the real evil is the injustice; the rest is only the result of natural properties or of moral demerit. This injustice is seen in every case where a man loves for their own sake things which are desirable only as means to an end, and seeks for the sake of something else things which ought to be loved for themselves. For thus, as far as he can, he disturbs in himself the natural order which the eternal law requires us to observe. Again, a man is just when he seeks to use things only for the end for which God appointed them, and to enjoy God as the end of all, while he enjoys himself and his friend in God and for God. For to love in a friend the love of God is to love the friend for God. Now both justice and injustice, to be acts at all, must be voluntary; otherwise, there can be no just rewards or punishments; which no man in his senses will assert. The ignorance and infirmity which prevent a man from knowing his duty, or from doing all he wishes to do, belong to God's secret penal arrangement, and to His unfathomable judgments, for with Him there is no iniquity. Thus we are informed by the sure word of God of Adam's sin; and Scripture truly declares that in him all die, and that by him sin entered into the world, and death by sin.(2) And our experience gives abundant evidence, that in punishment for this sin our body is corrupted, and weighs down the soul, and the clay tabernacle clogs the mind in its manifold activity;(3) and we know that we can be freed from this punishment only by gracious interposition. So the apostle cries out in distress, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord."(4) So much we know; but the reasons for the distribution of divine judgment and mercy, why one is in this condition, and another in that, though just, are unknown. Still, we are sure that all these things are due either to the mercy or the judgment of God, while the measures and numbers and weights by which the Creator of all natural productions arranges all things are concealed from our view. For God is not the author, but He is the controller of sin; so that sinful actions, which are sinful because they are against nature, are judged and controlled, and assigned to their proper place and condition, in order that they may not bring discord and disgrace on universal nature. This being the case, and as the judgments of God and the movements of man's will contain the hidden reason why the same prosperous circumstances which some make a right use of are the ruin of others, and the same afflictions under which some give way are profitable to others, and since the whole mortal life of man upon earth is a trial,(5) who can tell whether it may be good or bad in any particular case--in time of peace, to reign or to serve, or to be at ease or to die--or in time of war, to command or to fight, or to conquer or to be killed? At the same time, it remains true, that whatever is good is so by the divine blessing, and whatever is bad is so by the divine judgment.

79. Let no one, then, be so daring as to make rash charges against men, not to say against God. If the service of the ministers of the Old Testament, who were also heralds of the New, consisted in putting sinners to death, and that of the ministers of the New Testament, who are also interpreters of the Old, in being put to death by sinners, the service in both cases is rendered to one God, who, varying the lesson to suit the times, teaches both that temporal blessings are to be sought from Him, and that they are to be forsaken for Him, and that temporal distress is both sent by Him and should be endured for Him. There was, therefore, no cruelty in the command, or in the action of Moses. when, in his holy jealousy for his people, whom he wished to be subject to the one true

God, on learning that they had fallen away to the worship of an idol made by their own hands, he impressed their minds at the time with a wholesome fear, and gave them a warning for the future, by using the sword in the punishment of a few, whose just punishment God, against whom they had sinned, appointed in the depth of His secret judgment to be immediately inflicted. That Moses acted as he did, not in cruelty, but in great love, may be seen from the words in which he prayed for the sins of the people: "If Thou wilt forgive their sin, forgive it; and if not, blot me out of Thy book."(1) The pious inquirer who compares the slaughter with the prayer will find in this the clearest evidence of the awful nature of the injury done to the soul by prostitution to the images of devils, since such love is roused to such anger. We see the same in the apostle, who, not in cruelty, but in love, delivered a man up to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.(2) Others, too, he delivered up, that they might learn not to blaspheme.(3) In the apocryphal books of the Manichaeans there is a collection of fables, published by some unknown authors under the name of the apostles. The books would no doubt have been sanctioned by the Church at the time of their publication, if holy and learned men then in life, and competent to determine the matter, had thought the contents to be true. One of the stories is, that the Apostle Thomas was once at a marriage feast in a country where he was unknown, when one of the servants struck him, and that he forthwith by his curse brought a terrible punishment on this man. For when he went out to the fountain to provide water for the guests, a lion fell on him and killed him, and the hand with which he had given a slight blow to the apostle was torn off, in fulfillment of the imprecation, and brought by a dog to the table at which the apostle was reclining. What could be more cruel than this? And yet, if I mistake not, the story goes on to say, that the apostle made up for the cruelty by obtaining for the man the blessing of pardon in the next world; so that, while the people of this strange country learned to fear the apostle as being so dear to God, the man's eternal welfare was secured in exchange for the loss of this mortal life. It matters not whether the story is true or false. At any rate, the Manichaeans, who regard as genuine and authentic books which the canon of the Church rejects, must allow, as shown in the story, that the virtue of patience, which the Lord enjoins when He says, "If any one smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him thy left also," may be in the inward disposition, though it is not exhibited in bodily action or in words. For when the apostle was struck, instead of turning his other side to the man, or telling him to repeat the blow, he prayed to God to pardon his assailant in the next world, but not to leave the injury unpunished at the time. Inwardly he preserved a kindly feeling, while outwardly he wished the man to be punished as an example. As the Manichaeans believe this, rightly or wrongly, they may also believe that such was the intention of Moses, the servant of God, when he cut down with the sword the makers and worshippers of the idol; for his own words show that he so entreated for pardon for their sin of idolatry as to ask to be blotted out of God's book if his prayer was not heard. There is no comparison between a stranger being struck with the hand, and the dishonor done to God by forsaking Him for an idol, when He had brought the people out of the bondage of Egypt, had led them through the sea, and had covered with the waters the enemy pursuing them. Nor, as regards the punishment, is there any comparison between being killed with the sword and being torn in pieces by wild beasts. For judges in administering the law condemn to exposure to wild beasts worse criminals than are condemned to be put to death by the sword.

80. Another of Faustus' malicious and impious charges which has to be answered, is about the Lord's saying to the prophet Hosea, "Take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms."(4) As regards this passage, the impure mind of our adversaries is so blinded that they do not understand the plain words of the Lord in His gospel, when He says to the Jews, "The publicans and harlots shall go into the kingdom of heaven before you."(5) There is nothing contrary to the mercifulness of truth, or inconsistent with Christian faith, in a harlot leaving fornication, and becoming a chaste wife. Indeed, nothing could be more unbecoming in one professing to be a prophet than not to believe that all the sins of the fallen woman were pardoned when she changed for the better. So when the prophet took the harlot as his wife, it was both good for the woman to have her life amended, and the action symbolized a truth of which we shall speak presently. But it is plain what offends the Manichaeans in this case; for their great anxiety is to prevent harlots from being with child. It would have pleased them better that the woman should continue a prostitute, so as not to bring their god into confinement, than that she should become the wife of one man, and have children.

81. As regards Solomon, it need only be said that the condemnation of his conduct in the faithful narrative of holy Scripture is much more serious than the childish vehemence of Faustus' attacks. The Scripture tells us with faithful accuracy both the good that Solomon had at first, and the evil actions by which he lost the good he began with; while Faustus, in his attacks, like a man closing his eyes, or with no eyes at all, seeks no guidance from the light, but is prompted only by violent animosity. To pious and discerning readers of the sacred Scriptures evidence of the chastity of the holy men who are said to have had several wives is found in this, that Solomon, who by his polygamy gratified his passions, instead of seeking for offspring, is expressly noted as chargeable with being a lover of women. This, as we are informed by the truth which accepts no man's person, led him down into the abyss of idolatry.

82. Having now gone over all the cases in which Faustus finds fault with the Old Testament, and having attended to the merit of each, either defending men of God against the calumnies of carnal heretics, or, where the men were at fault, showing the excellence and the majesty of Scripture, let us again take the cases in the order of Faustus' accusations, and see the meaning of the actions recorded, what they typify, and what they foretell. This we have already done in the case of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, of whom God said that He was their God, as if the God of universal nature were the God of none besides them; not honoring them with an unmeaning title, but because He, who could alone have a full and perfect knowledge, knew the sincere and remarkable charity of these men; and because these three patriarchs united formed a notable type of the future people of God, in not only having free children by free women, as by Sarah, and Rebecca, and Leah, and Rachel, but also bond children, as of this same Rebecca was born Esau, to whom it was said, "Thou shalt serve thy brother;"(1) and in having by bond women not only bond children, as by Hagar, but also free children, as by Bilhah and Zilphah. Thus also in the people of God, those spiritually free not only have children born into the enjoyment of liberty, like those to whom it is said, "Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ"(2) but they have also children born into guilty bondage, as Simon was born of Philip.(3) Again, from carnal bondmen are born not only children of guilty bondage, who imitate them, but also children of happy liberty, to whom it is said, "What they say, do; but do not after their works."(4) Whoever rightly observes the fulfillment of this type in the people of God, keeps the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, by continuing to the end in union with some, and in patient endurance of others. Of Lot, also, we have already spoken, and have shown what the Scripture mentions as praiseworthy in him, and what as blameworthy and the meaning of the whole narrative.

83. We have next to consider the prophetic significance of the action of Judah in lying with his daughter-in-law. But, for the sake of those whose understanding is feeble, we shall begin with observing, that in sacred Scripture evil actions are sometimes prophetic not of evil, but of good. Divine providence preserves throughout its essential goodness, so that, as in the example given above, from adulterous intercourse a man-child is born, a good work of God from the evil of man, by the power of nature, and not due to the misconduct of the parents; so in the prophetic Scriptures, where both good and evil actions are recorded, the narrative being itself prophetic, foretells something good even by the record of what is evil, the credit being due not to the evil- doer, but to the writer. Judah, when, to gratify his sinful passion, he went in to Tamar, had no intention by his licentious conduct to typify anything connected with the salvation of men, any more than Judas, who betrayed the Lord, intended to produce any result connected with the salvation of men. So then if from the evil deed of Judas the Lord brought the good work of our redemption by His own passion, why should not His prophet, of whom He Himself says "He wrote of me," for the sake of instructing us make the evil action of Judah significant of something good? Under the guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the prophet has compiled a narrative of actions so as to make a continuous prophecy of the things he designed to foretell. In foretelling good, it is of no consequence whether the typical actions are good or bad. If it is written in red ink that the Ethiopians are black, or in Black ink that the Gauls are white, this circumstance does not affect the information which the writing conveys. No doubt, if it was a painting instead of a writing, the wrong color would be a fault; so when human actions are represented for example or for warning much depends on whether they are good or bad. But when actions are related or recorded as types, the merit or demerit of the agents is a matter of no importance, as long as there is a true typical relation between the action and the thing signified. So in the case of Caiaphas in the Gospel as regards his iniquitous and mischievous intention, and even as regards his words in the sense in which he used them, that a just man should be put to death unjustly, assuredly they were bad; and yet there was a good meaning in his words which he did not know of when he said, "It is expedient that one man should die for the people and that the whole nation perish not." So it is written of Him, "This he spake not of himself; but being the high priest, he prophesied that Jesus should die for the people."(1) In the same way the action of Judah was bad as regards his sinful passion, but it typified a great good he knew nothing of. Of himself he did evil while it was not of himself that he typified good. These introductory remarks apply not only to Judah, but also to all the other cases where in the narrative of bad actions is contained a prophecy of good.

84. In Tamar, then, the daughter-in-law of Judah, we see the people of the kingdom of Judah, whose kings, answering to Tamar's husbands, were taken from this tribe. Tamar means bitterness; and the meaning is suitable, for this people gave the cup of gall to the Lord.(2) The two sons of Judah represent two classes of kings who governed ill--those who did harm and those who did no good. One of these sons was evil or cruel before the Lord; the other spilled the seed on the ground that Tamar might not become a mother. There are only those two kinds of useless people in the world--the injurious and those who will not give the good they have but lose it or spill it on the ground. And as injury is worse than not doing good, the evil-doer is called the eider and the other the younger. Er, the name of the elder, means a preparer of skins, which were the coats given to our first parents when they were punished with expulsion from paradise.(3) Onan, the name of the younger, means, their grief; that is, the grief of those to whom he does no good, wasting the good he has on the earth. The loss of life implied in the name of the elder is a greater evil than the want of help implied in the name of the younger. Both being killed by God typifies the removal of the kingdom from men of this character. The meaning of the third son of Judah not being joined to the woman, is that for a time the kings of Judah were not of that tribe. So this third son did not become the husband of Tamar; as Tamar represents the tribe of Judah, which continued to exist, although the people received no king from it. Hence the name of this son, Selom, means, his dismission. None of those types apply to the holy and righteous men who, like David, though they lived in those times, belong properly to the New Testament, which they served by their enlightened predictions. Again, in the time when Judah ceased to have a king of its own tribe, the eider Herod does not count as one of the kings typified by the husbands of Tamar; for he was a foreigner, and his union with the people was never consecrated with the holy oil. His was the power of a stranger, given him by the Romans and by Caesar. And it was the same with his sons, the tetrarchs, one of whom, called Herod, like his father, agreed with Pilate at the time of the Lord's passion.(4) So plainly were these foreigners considered as distinct from the sacred monarchy of Judah, that the Jews themselves, when raging against Christ, exclaimed openly, "We have no king but Caesar."(5) Nor was Caesar properly their king, except in the sense that all the world was subject to Rome. The Jews thus condemned themselves, only to express their rejection of Christ, and to flatter Caesar.

85. The time when the kingdom was removed from the tribe of Judah was the time appointed for the coming of Christ our Lord, the true Saviour, who should come not for harm, but for great good. Thus was it prophesied, "A prince shall not fail from Judah, nor a leader from his loins, till He come for whom it is reserved: He is the desire of nations."(6) Not only the kingdom, but all government, of the Jews had ceased, and also, as prophesied by Daniel, the sacred anointing from which the name Christ or Anointed is derived. Then came He for whom it was reserved, the desire of nations; and the holy of holies was anointed with the oil of gladness above His fellows.(7) Christ was born in the time of the eider Herod, and suffered in the time of Herod the tetrarch. He who thus came to the lost sheep of the house of Israel was typified by Judah when he went to shear his sheep in Thamna, which means, failing. For then the prince had failed from Judah, with all the government and anointing of the Jews, that He might come for whom it was reserved. Judah, we are told, came with his Adullamite shepherd, whose name was Iras; and Adullamite means, a testimony in water. So it was with this testimony that the Lord came, having indeed greater testimony than that of John;(1) but for the sake of his feeble sheep he made use of the testimony in water. The name Iras, too, means, vision of my brother. So John saw his brother, a brother in the family of Abraham, and from the relationship of Mary and Elisabeth; and the same person he recognised as his Lord and his God, for, as he himself says, he received of His fullness.(2) On account of this vision, among those born of woman, there has arisen no greater than he;(3) because, of all who foretold Christ, he alone saw what many righteous men and prophets desired to see and saw not. He saluted Christ from the womb;(4) he knew Him more certainly from seeing the dove; and therefore, as the Adullamite, he gave testimony by water. The Lord came to shear His sheep, in releasing them from painful burdens, as it is said in praise of the Church in the Song of Songs, that her teeth are like a flock of sheep after shearing.(5)

86. Next, we have Tamar changing her dress; for Tamar also means changing. Still, the name of bitterness must be retained--not that bitterness in which gall was given to the Lord, but that in which Peter wept bitterly.(6) For Judah means confession; and bitterness is mingled with confession as a type of true repentance. It is this repentance which gives fruitfulness to the Church established among all nations. For "it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead, and that repentance and the remission of sins be preached among all nations in His name, beginning at Jerusalem."(7) In the dress Tamar put on there is a confession of sins; and Tamar sitting in this dress at the gate of AEnan or AEnaim, which means fountain, is a type of the Church called from among the nations. She ran as a hart to the springs of water, to meet with the seed of Abraham; and there she is made fruitful by one who knows her not, as it is foretold, "A people whom I have not known shall serve me."(8) Tamar received under her disguise a ring, a bracelet, a staff; she is sealed in her calling, adorned in her justification, raised in her glorification. For "whom He predestinated, them He also called: and whom He called, them He also justified: and whom He justified, them He also glorified."(9) This was while she was still disguised, as I have said; and in the same state she conceives, and becomes fruitful in holiness. Also the kid promised is sent to her as to a harlot. The kid represents rebuke for sin, and it is sent by the Adullamite already mentioned, who, as it were, uses the reproachful words, "O generation of vipers!"(10) But this rebuke for sin does not reach her, for she has been changed by the bitterness of confession. Afterwards, by exhibiting the pledges of the ring and bracelet and staff, she prevails over the Jews, in their hasty judgment of her, who are now represented by Judah himself; as at this day we hear the Jews saying that we are not the people of Christ, and have not the seed of Abraham. But when we exhibit the sure tokens of our calling and justification and glorification, they will immediately be confounded, and will acknowledge that we are justified rather than they. I should enter into this more particularly, taking, as it were, each limb and joint separately, as the Lord might enable me, were it not that such minute inquiry is prevented by the necessity of bringing this work to a close, for it is already longer than is desirable.

87. As regards the prophetic significance of David's sin, a single word must suffice. The names occurring in the narrative show what it typifies. David means, strong of hand, or desirable; and what can be stronger than the Lion of the tribe of Judah, who has conquered the world, or more desirable than He of whom the prophet says, "The desire of all nations shall come?"(11) Bersabee means, well of satisfaction, or seventh well: either of these interpretations will suit our purpose. So, in the Song of Songs, the spouse, who is the Church, is called a well of living water;(12) or again, the number seven represents the Holy Spirit, as in the number of days in Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit came from heaven. We learn also from the book of Tobit, that Pentecost was the feast of seven weeks.(13) To forty-nine, which is seven times seven, one is added to denote unity. To this effect is the saying of the apostle: "Bearing with one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."(14) The Church becomes a well of satisfaction by this gift of the Spirit, the number seven denoting its spirituality; for it is in her a fountain of living water springing up unto everlasting life, and he who has it shall never thirst.(15) Uriah, Bersabee's husband, must, from the meaning of his name, be understood as representing the devil. It is in union to the devil that all are bound whom the grace of God sets free, that the Church without spot or wrinkle may be married to her true Saviour. Uriah means, my light of God; and Hittite means, cut off, referring either to his not abiding in the truth, when he was cut off on account of his pride from the celestial light which he had of God, or to his transforming himself into an angel of light, because after losing his real strength by his fall, he still dares to say, My light is of God. The literal David, then, was guilty of a heinous crime, which God by the prophet condemned in the rebuke addressed to David, and which David atoned for by his repentance. On the other hand, He who is the desire of all nations loved the Church when washing herself on the roof, that is, when cleansing herself from the pollution of the world, and in spiritual contemplation mounting above her house of clay, and trampling upon it; and after commencing an acquaintance, He puts to death the devil, whom He first entirely removes from her, and joins her to Himself in perpetual union. While we hate the sin, we must not overlook the prophetical significance; and while we love, as is His due, that David who in His mercy has freed us from the devil, we may also love the David who by the humility of his repentance healed the wound made by his transgression.

88. Little need be said of Solomon, who is spoken of in Holy Scripture in terms of the strongest disapproval and condemnation, while nothing is said of his repentance and restoration to the divine favor. Nor can I find in his lamentable fall even a symbolical connection with anything good. Perhaps the strange women he lusted after may be thought to represent the Churches chosen from among the Gentiles. This idea might have been admissible, if the women had left their gods for Solomon's sake to worship his God. But as he for their sakes offended his God and worshipped their gods, it seems impossible to think of any good meaning. Doubtless, something is typified, but it is something bad, as in the case already explained of Lot's wife and daughters. We see in Solomon a notable pre-eminence and a notable fall. Now, this good and evil which we see in him at different periods, first good and then evil, are in our day found together in the Church. What is good in Solomon represents, I think, the good members of the Church; and what was bad in him represents the bad members. Both are in one man, as the bad and the good are in the chaff and grain of one floor, or in the tares and wheat of one field. A closer inquiry into what is said of Solomon in Scripture might disclose, either to me or to others of greater learning and greater worth, some more probable interpretation. But as we are now engaged on a different subject, we must not allow this matter to break the connection of our discourse.

89. As regards the prophet Hosea, it is unnecessary for me to explain the meaning of the command, or of the prophet's conduct, when God said to him, "Go and take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and produce children of whoredoms," for the Scripture itself informs us of the origin and purpose of this direction. It proceeds thus: "For the land hath committed great whoredom, departing from the Lord. So he went and took Gomer the daughter of Diblaim; which conceived, and bare him a son. And the Lord said unto him, Call his name Jezreel; for yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Judah, and will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel. And it shall come to pass at that day, that I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel. And she conceived again, and bare a daughter. And God said unto him, Call her name No-mercy: for I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them away. But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the Lord their God, and will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen. Now when she had weaned No-mercy, she conceived, and bare a son. Then said God, Call his name Not-my-people: for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God. Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured for multitude; and it shall come to pass that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. Then shall the children of Israel and the children of Judah be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land: for great shall be the day of Jezreel. Say ye unto your brethren, My people; and to your sister, She hath found mercy."(1) Since the typical meaning of the command and of the prophet's conduct is thus explained in the same book by the Lord Himself, and since the writings of the apostles declare the fulfillment of this prophecy in the preaching of the New Testament, every one must accept the explanation thus given of the command and of the action of the prophet as the true explanation. Thus it is said by the Apostle Paul, "That He might make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy, which He had afore prepared unto glory, even us, whom He hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles. As He saith also in Hosea, I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which was not beloved. And it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there shall they be called the children of the living God."(1) Here Paul applies the prophecy to the Gentiles. So also Peter, writing to the Gentiles, without naming the prophet, borrows his expressions when he says, "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye might show forth the praises of Him who has called you out of darkness into His marvellous light; which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy."(2) From this it is plain that the words of the prophet, "And the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured for multitude," and the words immediately following, "And it shall be that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there they shall be called the children of the living God," do not apply to that Israel which is after the flesh, but to that of which the apostle says to the Gentiles, "Ye therefore are the seed of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise."(3) But, as many Jews who were of the israel after the flesh have believed, and will yet believe; for of these were the apostles, and all the thousands in Jerusalem of the company of the apostles, as also the churches of which Paul speaks, when he says to the Galatians, "I was unknown by face to the churches of Judaea which were in Christ;"(4) and again, he explains the passage in the Psalms, where the Lord is called the cornerstone,(5) as referring to His uniting in Himself the two walls of circumcision and uncircumcision, "that He might make in Himself of twain one new man, so making peace; and that He might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby: and that He might come and preach peace to them that are far off, and to them that are nigh," that is, to the Gentiles and to the Jews; "for He is our peace, who hath made of both one;"(6) to the same purpose we find the prophet speaking of the Jews as the children of Judah, and of the Gentiles as children of Israel, where he says, "The children of Judah and the children of Israel shall be gathered together, and shall make to themselves one head, and shall go up from the land." Therefore, to speak against a prophecy thus confirmed by actual events, is to speak against the writings of the apostles as well as those of the prophets; and not only to speak against writings, but to impugn in the most reckless manner the evidence clear as noonday of established facts. In the case of the narrative of Judah, it is perhaps not so easy to recognize, under the disguise of the woman called Tamar, the harlot representing the Church gathered from among the corruption of Gentile superstition; but here, where Scripture explains itself, and where the explanation is confirmed by the writings of the apostles, instead of dwelling longer on this, we may proceed at once to inquire into the meaning of the very things to which Faustus objects in Moses the servant of God.

90. Moses killing the Egyptian in defending one of his brethren reminds us naturally of the destruction of the devil, our assailant in this land of strangers, by our defender the Lord Christ. And as Moses hid the dead body in the sand, even so the devil, though slain, remains concealed in those who are not firmly settled. The Lord, we know, builds the Church on a rock; and those who hear His word and do it, He compares to a wise man who builds his house upon a rock, and who does not yield or give way before temptation; and those who hear and do not, He compares to a foolish man who builds on the sand, and when his house is tried its ruin is great.(7)

91. Of the prophetic significance of the spoiling of the Egyptians, which was done by Moses at the command of the Lord his God, who commands nothing but what is most just, I remember to have set down what occurred to me at the time in my book entitled On Christian Doctrine;(8) to the effect that the gold and silver and garments of the Egyptians typified certain branches of learning which may be profitably learned or taught among the Gentiles. This may be the true explanation; or we may suppose that the vessels of gold and silver represent the precious souls, and the garments the bodies, of those from among the Gentiles who join themselves to the people of God, that along with them they may be freed from the Egypt of this world. Whatever the true interpretation may be, the pious student of the Scriptures will feel certain that in the command, in the action, and in the narrative there is a purpose and a symbolic meaning.

92. It would take too long to go through all the wars of Moses. It is enough to refer to what has already been said, as sufficient for the purpose in this reply to Faustus of the prophetic and symbolic character of the war with Amalek.(1) There is also the charge of cruelty made against Moses by the enemies of Scriptures, or by those who have never read anything. Faustus does not make any specific charge, but speaks of Moses as commanding and doing many cruel things. But, knowing the things they are in the habit of bringing forward and of misrepresenting, I have already taken a particular case and have defended it, so that any Manichaeans who are willing to be corrected, and all other ignorant and irreligious people, may see that there is no ground for their accusations. We must now inquire into the prophetic significance of the command, that many of those who, while Moses was absent, made an idol for themselves should be slain without regard to relationship. It is easy to see that the slaughter of these men represents the warfare against the evil principles which led the people into the same idolatry. Against such evil we are commanded to wage war in the words of the psalm, "Be ye angry and sin not.(2) And a similar command is given by the apostle, when he says, "Mortify your members which are on earth fornication, uncleanness, luxury, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry."(3)

93. It requires closer examination to see the meaning of the first action of Moses in burning the calf in fire, and grinding it to powder, and sprinkling it in the water for the people to drink. The tables given to him, written with the finger of God, that is, by the agency of the Holy Spirit, he may have broken, because he judged the people unworthy of having them read to them; and he may have burned the calf, and ground it, and scattered it so as to be carried away by the water, in order to let nothing of it remain among the people. But why should he have made them drink it? Every one must feel anxious to discover the typical significance of this action. Pursuing the inquiry, we may find that in the calf there was an embodiment of the devil, as there is in men of all nations who have the devil as their head or leader in their impious rites. The calf is gold, because there is a semblance of wisdom in the institution of idolatrous worship. Of this the apostle says, "Knowing God, they glorified Him not as God, nor were thankful; but they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise they became foolish, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of corruptible man, and of birds, and of four-footed beasts, and of creeping things."(4) From this so- called wisdom came the golden calf, which was one of the forms of idolatry among the chief men and professed sages of Egypt. The calf, then, represents every body or society of Gentile idolaters. This impious society the Lord Christ burns with that fire of which He says in the Gospel, "I am come to send fire on the earth;"(5) for, as there is nothing hid from His heat,(6) when the Gentiles believe in Him they lose the form of the devil in the fire of divine influence. Then all the body is ground, that is, after the dissolution of the combination in the membership of iniquity comes humiliation under the word of truth. Then the dust is sprinkled in the water, that the Israelites, that is, the preachers of the gospel, may in baptism admit those formerly idolaters into their own body, that is, the body of Christ. To Peter, who was one of those Israelites, it was said of the Gentiles, "Kill, and eat."(7) To kill and eat is much the same as to grind and drink. So this calf, by the fire of zeal, and the keen penetration of the word, and the water of baptism, was swallowed up by the people, instead of their being swallowed up by it.

94. Thus, when the very passages on which the heretics found their objections to the Scriptures are studied and examined, the more obscure they are the more wonderful are the secrets which we discover in reply to our questions; so that the mouths of blasphemers are completely stopped, and the evidence of the truth so stifles them that they cannot even utter a sound. The unhappy men who will not receive into their hearts the sweetness of the truth must feel its force as a gag in their mouths. All those passages speak of Christ. The head now ascended into heaven along with the body still suffering on earth is the full development of the whole purpose of the authors of Scripture, which is well called Sacred Scripture. Every part of the narrative in the prophetical books should be viewed as having a figurative meaning, except what serves merely as a framework for the literal or figurative predictions of this king and of his people. For as in harps and other musical instruments the musical sound does not come from all parts of the instrument, but from the strings, and the rest is only for fastening and stretching the strings so as to tune them, that when they are struck by the musician they may give a pleasant sound; so in these prophetical narratives the circumstances selected by the prophetic spirit either predict some future event, or if they have no voice of their own, they serve to connect together other significant utterances.

95. Should the heretics reject our exposition of those allegorical narratives, or even insist on understanding them only in a literal sense, to dispute about such a difference of understanding would be as useless as to dispute about a difference of taste. Only, the fact that the divine precepts have either a moral and religious character or a prophetic meaning must be believed, whether intelligently or not. Moreover, the figurative interpretations must all be in the interest of morality and religion. So, if the Manichaeans or any others disagree with our interpretation, or differ from us in method or in any particular opinion, suffice it that the character of the fathers whom God commends for their conduct and obedience to His precepts is vindicated on a principle which all but those inveterate in their hostility will acknowledge to be true; and that the purity and dignity of the Scriptures are maintained in reference to those passages which the enemies of the truth find fault with, where certain actions are either praised or blamed, or merely narrated for us to form a judgment of them.

96. In fact, nothing could have been devised more likely to instruct and benefit the pious reader of sacred Scripture than that, besides describing praiseworthy characters as examples, and blameworthy characters as warnings, it should also narrate cases where good men have gone back and fallen into evil, whether they are restored to the right path or continue irreclaimable; and also where bad men have changed, and have attained to goodness, whether they persevere in it or relapse into evil; in order that the righteous may be not lifted up in the pride of security, nor the wicked hardened in despair of cure. And even those passages in Scripture which contain no examples or warnings are either required for connection, so as to pass on to essential matters, or, from their very appearance of superfluity, indicate the presence of some secret symbolical meaning. For in the books we speak of, so far from there being a want or a scarcity of prophetical announcements, such announcements are numerous and distinct; and now that the fulfillment has actually taken place, the testimony thus borne to the divine authority of the books is irresistibly strong, so that it is mere madness to suppose that there can be any useless or unmeaning passages in books to which all classes of men and of minds do homage, and which themselves predict what we see thus actually coming to pass.

97. If, then, any one reading of the action of David, of which he repented when the Lord rebuked and threatened him, find in the narrative an encouragement to sin, is Scripture to be blamed for this? Is not the man's own guilt in proportion to the abuse which he makes for his own injury or destruction of what was written for his recovery and release? David is set forth as a great example of repentance, because men who fall into sin either proudly disregard the cure of repentance, or lose themselves in despair of obtaining salvation or of meriting pardon. The example is for the benefit of the sick, not for the injury of those in health. If madmen destroy themselves, or if evil-doers destroy others, with surgical instruments, it is not the fault of surgery.

98. Even supposing that our fathers the patriarchs and prophets, of whose devout and religious habits so good a report is given in that Scripture which every one who knows it, and has not lost entirely the use of his reason, must admit to have been provided by God for the salvation of men, were as lustful and cruel as the Manichaeans falsely and fanatically allege, they might still be shown to be superior not only to those whom the Manichaeans call the Elect, but also to their god himself. Is there in the licentious intercourse of man with woman anything so bad as the self-abasement of unclouded light by mixture with darkness? Here, is a man prompted by avarice and greed to pass off his wife as his sister and sell her to her lover; but worse still and more shocking, that one should disguise his own nature to gratify criminal passion, and submit gratuitously to pollution and degradation. Why, even one who knowingly lies with his own daughters is not equally criminal with one who lets his members share in the defilement of all sensuality as gross as this, or grosser. And is not the Manichaean god a partaker in the contamination of the most atrocious acts of uncleanness? Again, if it were true, as Faustus says, that Jacob went from one to another of his four wives, not desiring offspring, but resembling a he-goat in licentiousness, he would still not be sunk so low as your god, who must not only have shared in this degradation, from his being confined in the bodies of Jacob and his wives so as to be mixed up with all their movements, but also, in union with this very he-goat of Faustus' coarse comparison, must have endured all the pains of animal appetite, incurring fresh defilement at every step, as partaking in the passion of the male, the conception of the female, and the birth of the kid. And, in the same way, supposing Judah to have been guilty not only of fornication, but of incest, a share in the heats and impurities of this incestuous passion would also belong to your god. David repented of his sin in loving the wife of another, and in ordering the death of her husband; but when will your god repent of giving up his members to the wanton passion of the male and female chiefs of the race of darkness, and of putting to death not the husband of his mistress, but his own children, whom he confines in the members of the very demons who were his own lovers? Even if David had not repented, nor been thus restored to righteousness, he would still have been better than your god. David may have been defiled by this one act, or to the extent to which one man is capable of such defilement; but your god suffers the pollution of his members in all such actions by whomsoever committed. The prophet Hosea, too, is accused by Faustus: and, supposing him to have taken the harlot to wife because he had a criminal affection for her, if he is licentious and she a prostitute, their souls, according to your own assertion, are parts and members of your god and of his nature. In plain language, the harlot herself must be your god. You cannot pretend that your god is not confined in the contaminated body, or that he is only present, while preserving entire the purity of his own nature; and you acknowledge that the members of your god are so defiled as to require a special purification. This harlot, then, for whom you venture to find fault with the man of God, even if she had not been changed for the better by becoming a chaste wife, would still have been your god; at least you must admit her soul to have been a part, however small, of your god. But one single harlot is not so bad as your god, for he on account of his mixture with the race of darkness shares in every act of prostitution; and wherever such impurities are perpetrated, he goes through the corresponding experiences of abandonment, of release, and of confinement, and this from generation to generation, till this most corrupt part reaches its final state in the mass of darkness, like an irreclaimable harlot. Such are the evils and such the shameful abominations which your god could not ward off from his members, and to which he was brought irresistibly by his merciless enemy; for only by the sacrifice of his own subjects, or rather his own parts, could he effect the destruction of his formidable assailant. Surely, there was nothing so bad as this in killing an Egyptian so as to preserve uninjured a fellow-countryman. Yet Faustus finds fault with this most absurdly, while with amazing infatuation he overlooks the case of his own god. Would it not have been better for him to have carried off the gold and silver vessels of the Egyptians, than to let his members be carried off by the race of darkness? And yet the worshippers of this unfortunate god find fault with the servant of our God for carrying on wars, in which he with his followers were always victorious, so that, under the leadership of Moses, the children of Israel carried captive their enemies, men and women, as your god would have done too, if he had been able. You profess to accuse Moses of doing wrong, while in fact you envy his success. There was no cruelty in punishing with the sword those who had sinned grievously against God. Indeed, Moses entreated pardon for this sin, even offering to bear himself in their stead the divine anger. But even had he been cruel instead of compassionate, he would still have been better than your god. For if any of his followers had been sent to break the force of the enemy and had been taken captive, he would never, if victorious, have condemned him when he had done no wrong, but acted in obedience to orders. And yet this is what your god is to do with the part of himself which is to be fastened in the mass of darkness, because it obeyed orders, and advanced at the risk of its own life in defence of his kingdom against the body of the enemy. But, says the Manichaean, this part, after mixture and combination with evil during the course of ages, has not been obedient. But why? If the obedience was voluntary, the guilt is real, and the punishment just. But from this it would follow that there is no nature opposed to sin; otherwise it would not sin voluntarily; and so the whole system of Manichaeism falls at once. If, again, this part suffers from the power of this enemy against whom it was sent, and is subdued by a force it was unable to resist, the punishment is unjust, and flagrantly cruel. The god who is defended on the plea of necessity is a fit object of worship to those who refuse to worship the one true God. Still, it must be allowed that, however debasing the worship of this god may be, the worshippers are so far better than their deity, that they have an existence, while he is nothing more than a fabulous invention. Proceed we now to the rest of Faustus' vagaries.(1)

BOOK XXIII.

FAUSTUS RECURS TO THE GENEALOGICAL DIFFICULTY AND INSISTS THAT

EVEN ACCORDING TO MATTHEW JESUS WAS NOT SON OF GOD UNTIL HIS BAPTISM. AUGUSTIN SETS FORTH THE CATHOLIC VIEW OF THE RELATION OF THE DIVINE AND THE HUMAN IN THE PERSON OF CHRIST.

1. FAUSTUS said: On one occasion, when addressing a large audience, I was asked by one of the crowd, Do you believe that Jesus was born of Mary? I replied, Which Jesus do you mean? for in the Hebrew it is the name of several people. One was the son of Nun, the follower of Moses;(1) another was the son of Josedech the high priest;(2) again, another is spoken of as the son of David;(3) and another is the Son of God.(4) Of which of these do you ask whether I believe him to have been born of Mary? His answer was, The Son of God, of course. On what evidence, said I, oral or written, am I to believe this? He replied, On the authority of Matthew. What, said I, did Matthew write? He replied, "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham "(Matt. i. 1). Then said I, I was afraid you were going to say, The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; and I was prepared to correct you. Now that you have quoted the verse accurately, you must nevertheless be advised to pay attention to the words. Matthew does not profess to give an account of the generation of the Son of God, but of the son of David.

2. I will, for the present, suppose that this person was right in saying that the son of David was born of Mary. It still remains true, that in this whole passage of the generation no mention is made of the Son of God till we come to the baptism; so that it is an injurious misrepresentation on your part to speak of this writer as making the Son of God the inmate of a womb. The writer, indeed, seems to cry out against such an idea, and in the very title of his book to clear himself of such blasphemy, asserting that the person whose birth he describes is the son of David, not the Son of God. And if you attend to the writer's meaning and purpose, you will see that what he wishes us to believe of Jesus the Son of God is not so much that He was born of Mary, as that He became the Son of God by baptism at the river Jordan. He tells us that the person of whom he spoke at the outset as the son of David was baptized by John, and became the Son of God on this particular occasion, when about thirty years old, according to Luke, when also the voice was heard saying to Him, "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten Thee."(5) It appears from this, that what was born, as is supposed, of Mary thirty years before, was not the Son of God, but what was afterwards made so by baptism at Jordan, that is, the new man, the same as in us when we were converted from Gentile error, and believe in God. This doctrine may or may not agree with what you call the Catholic faith; at all events, it is what Matthew says, if Matthew is the real author. The words, Thou art my Son, this day I have begotten Thee, or, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, do not occur in connection with the story of Mary's motherhood, but with the putting away of sin at Jordan. This is what is written; and if you believe this doctrine, you must be called a Matthaean, for you will no longer be a Catholic. The Catholic doctrine is well known; and it is as unlike Matthew's representations as it is unlike the truth. In the words of your creed, you declare that you believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was born of the Virgin Mary. According to you, therefore, the Son of God comes from Mary; according to Matthew, from the Jordan; while we believe Him to come from God. Thus the doctrine of Matthew, if we are right in assigning the authorship to him, is as different from yours as from ours; only we acknowledge that he is more cautious than you in ascribing the being born of a woman to the son of David, and not to the Son of God. As for you, your only alternative is to deny that those statements were made, as they appear to be, by Matthew, or to allow that you have abandoned the faith of the apostles.

3. For our part, while no one can alter our conviction that the Son of God comes from God, we might indulge a credulous disposition, to the extent of admitting the fiction, that Jesus became the Son of God at Jordan, but not that the Son of God was born of a woman. Then, again, the son said to have been born of Mary cannot properly be called the son of David, unless it is ascertained that he was begotten by Joseph. You say he was not, and therefore you must allow him not to have been the son of David, even though he were the son of Mary. The genealogy proceeds in the line of Hebrew fathers from Abraham to David, and from David to Joseph; and as we are told that Joseph was not the real father of Jesus, Jesus cannot be said to be the son of David. To begin with calling Jesus the son of David, and then to go on to tell of his being born of Mary before the consummation of her marriage with Joseph, is pure madness. And if the son of Mary cannot be called the son of David, on account of his not being the son of Joseph, still less can the name be given to the Son of God.

4. Moreover, the Virgin herself appears to have belonged not to the tribe of Judah, to which the Jewish kings belonged, and which all agree was David's tribe, but to the priestly tribe of Levi. This appears from the fact that the Virgin's father Joachim was a priest; and his name does not occur in the genealogy. How, then, can Mary be brought within the pale of relationship to David, when she has neither father nor husband belonging to it? Consequently, Mary's son cannot possibly be the son of David, unless you can bring the mother into some connection with Joseph, so as to be either his wife or his daughter.

5. AUGUSTIN replied: The Catholic, which is also the apostolic, doctrine, is, that our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is both the Son of God in His divine nature, and the Son of David after the flesh. This we prove from the writings of the evangelists and apostles, so that no one can reject our proofs without also rejecting these writings. Faustus' plan is to represent some one as saying a few words, without bringing forward any evidence in answer to Faustus' fertile sophistry. But with all his ingenuity, the proofs I have to give will leave Faustus no reply, but that these passages are spurious interpolations in the sacred record,--a reply which serves as a means of escaping, or of trying to escape, the force of the plainest statements in Holy Scripture. We have already in this treatise sufficiently exposed the irrational absurdity, as well as the daring profanity, of such criticism; and not to exceed all limits, we must avoid repetition. It cannot be necessary that we should bring together all the passages scattered throughout Scripture, which show, in answer to Faustus, that in the books of the highest and most sacred authority He who is called the only-begotten Son of God, even God with God, is also called the Son of David, on account of His taking the form of a servant from the Virgin Mary, the wife of Joseph. To instance only Matthew, since Faustus' argument refers to this Gospel, as the whole book cannot be quoted here, let whoever choose read it, and see how Matthew carries on to the passion and the resurrection the narrative of Him whom He calls the Son of David in the introduction to the genealogy. Of this same Son of David he speaks as being conceived and born of the Virgin Mary by the Holy Ghost. He also applies to this the declaration of the prophet, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and shall bear a son, and they shall call His name Emmanuel, which is being interpreted, God with us."(1) Again, He who was called, even from the Virgin's womb, God-with- us, is said to have heard, when He was baptized by John, a voice from heaven, saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."(2) Will Faustus say that to be called God is less than to be called the Son of God? He seems to think so, for he tries to prove that because this voice came from heaven at the time of the baptism, therefore, according to Matthew, He must then have become the Son of God; whereas the same evangelist, in a previous passage, quotes the sacred announcement made by the prophet, in which the child horn of the Virgin is called God- with-us.

6. It is remarkable how, amid his wild irrelevancies, this wretched trifler loses no available opportunity of darkening the declarations of Scripture by the fabulous creations of his own fancy. Thus he says of Abraham, that when he took his handmaid to wife he disbelieved God's promise that he should have a child by Sarah; whereas, in fact, this promise had not at that time been given. Then he accuses Abraham of falsehood in calling Sarah his sister, not having read what may be learned on the authority of Scripture about the family of Sarah. Abraham's son Isaac also he accuses of falsely calling his wife his sister, though a distinct account is given of her family. Then he accuses Jacob of there being a daily quarrel among his four wives, which should be the first to appropriate him on his return from the field, while nothing of this is said in Scripture. And this is the man who pretends to hate the writers of the sacred books for their falsehood, and who has the effrontery so to misrepresent even the gospel record, though its authority is admitted by all as possessing the most abundant confirmation, as to try to make it appear, not indeed that Matthew himself,--for in that case he would have been forced to yield to apostolic authority,--but that some one under the name of Matthew, has written about Christ what he refuses to believe, and attempts to refute with a contumelious ingenuity!

7. The voice from heaven at the Jordan should be compared with the voice heard on the Mount.(1) In neither case do the words, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," imply that He was not the Son of God before; for He who from the Virgin's womb took the form of a servant "was in the form of God, and thought it no robbery to be equal with God."(2) And the same Apostle Paul himself says distinctly elsewhere," "But in the fullness of time, God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law;"(3) that is, a woman in the Hebrew sense, not a wife, but one of the female sex. The Son of God is both Lord of David in His divine nature, and Son of David as being of the seed of David after the flesh. And if it were not profitable for us to believe this, the same apostle would not have made it so prominent as he does, when he says to Timothy, "Remember that Christ Jesus, of the seed of David, rose from the dead, according to my gospel."(4) And he carefully enjoins believers to regard as accursed whoever preaches another gospel contrary to this.

8. This assailant of the holy Gospel need find no difficulty in the fact that Christ is called the Son of David, though He was born of a virgin, and though Joseph was not His real father; while the genealogy is brought down by the evangelist Matthew, not to Mary, but to Joseph. First of all, the husband, as the man, is the more honorable; and Joseph was Mary's husband, though she did not live with him, for Matthew himself mentions that she was called Joseph's wife by the angel; as it is also from Matthew that we learn that Mary conceived not by Joseph, but by the Holy Spirit. But if this, instead of being a true narrative written by Matthew the apostle, was a false narrative written by some one else under his name, is it likely that he would have contradicted himself in such an apparent manner, and in passages so immediately connected, as to speak of the Son of David as born of Mary without conjugal intercourse, and then, in giving His genealogy, to bring it down to the very man with whom the Virgin is expressly said not to have had intercourse, unless he had some reason for doing so? Even supposing there were two writers, one calling Christ the Son of David, and giving an account of Christ's progenitors from David down to Joseph; while the other does not call Christ the Son of David, and says that He was born of the Virgin Mary without intercourse with any man; those statements are not irreconcilable, so as to prove that one or both writers must be false. It will appear on reflection that both accounts might be true; for Joseph might be called the husband of Mary, though she was his wife only in affection, and in the intercourse of the mind, which is more intimate than that of the body. In this way it might be proper that the husband of the virgin-mother of Christ should have a place in the list of Christ's ancestors. It might also be the case that some of David's blood flowed in Mary herself, so that the flesh of Christ, although produced from a virgin, still owed its origin to David's seed. But as, in fact, both statements are made by one and the same writer, who informs us both that Joseph was the husband of Mary and that the mother of Christ was a virgin, and that Christ was of the seed of David, and that Joseph is in the list of Christ's progenitors in the line of David, those who prefer the authority of the sacred Gospel to that of heretical fiction must conclude that Mary was not unconnected with the family of David, and that she was properly called the wife of Joseph, because being a woman she was in spiritual alliance with him, though there was no bodily connection. Joseph, too, it is plain, could not be omitted in the genealogy; for, from the superiority of his sex, such an omission would be equivalent to a denial of his relation to the woman with whom he was inwardly united; and believers in Christ are taught not to think carnal connection the chief thing in marriage, as if without this they could not be man and wife, but to imitate in Christian wedlock as closely as possible the parents of Christ, that so they may have the more intimate union with the members of Christ.

9. We believe that Mary, as well as Joseph, was of the family of David, because we believe the Scriptures, which assert both that Christ was of the seed of David after the flesh, and that His mother was the Virgin Mary, He having no human father. Therefore, whoever denies the relationship of Mary to David, evidently opposes the pre-eminent authority of these passages of Scripture; and to maintain this opposition he must bring evidence in support of his statement from writings acknowledged by the Church as canonical and catholic, not from any writings he pleases. In the matters of which we are now treating, only the canonical writings have any weight with us; for they only are received and acknowledged by the Church spread over all the world, which is itself a fulfillment of the prophecies regarding it contained in these writings. Accordingly, I am not bound to admit the uncanonical account of Mary's birth which Faustus adopts, that her father was a priest of the tribe of Levi, of the name of Joachim. But even were I to admit this account, I should still contend that Joachim must have in some way belonged to the family of David, and had somehow been adopted from the tribe of Judah into that of Levi; or if not he, one of his ancestors; or, at least, that while born in the tribe of Levi, he had still some relation to the line of David; as Faustus himself acknowledges that Mary, though belonging to the tribe of Levi, could be given to a husband of the tribe of Judah; and he expressly says that if Mary were Joseph's daughter, the name Son of David would be applicable to Christ. In this way, by the marriage of Joseph's daughter in the tribe of Levi, her son, though born in the tribe of Levi, might not improperly be called the Son of David. And so, if the mother of that Joachim, who in the passage quoted by Faustus is called the father of Mary, married in the tribe of Levi while she belonged to the tribe of Judah and to the family of David, there would thus be a sufficient reason for speaking of Joachim and Mary and Mary's son as belonging to the seed of David. If I felt obliged to pay any regard to the apocryphal scripture in which Joachim is called the father of Mary, I should adopt some such explanation as the above, rather than admit any falsehood in the Gospel, where it is written both that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and our Saviour, was of the seed of David after the flesh, and that He was born of the Virgin Mary. It is enough for us that the enemies of these Scriptures, which record these truths and which we believe, cannot prove against them any charge of falsehood.

10. Faustus cannot pretend then I am unable to prove that Mary was of the family of David, as I have shown him unable to prove that she was not. I produce the strongest evidence from Scriptures of established authority, which declare that Christ was of the seed of David, and that He was born without a father of the Virgin Mary. Faustus expresses what he considers a most becoming indignation against impropriety when he says, It is an injurious misrepresentation of the writer to make him speak of the Son of God as the inmate of a womb. Of course, the Catholic doctrine which teaches that Christ the Son of God was born in the flesh of a virgin, does not make the Son of God the inmate of her womb in the sense of having no existence beyond it, as if He had abandoned the government of heaven and earth, or as if He had left the presence of the Father. The mistake is with the Manichaeans, whose understanding is so incapable of forming a conception of anything except what is material, that they cannot comprehend how the Word of God, who is the virtue and wisdom of God, while remaining in Himself and with the Father, and while governing the universe, reaches from end to end in strength, and sweetly orders all things.(1) In the faultless procedure of this adorable providence, He appointed for Himself an earthly mother; and to free His servants from the bondage of corruption He took in this mother the form of a servant, that is, a mortal body; and this body which He took He showed openly, and when it had been exposed, even to suffering and death, He raised it again from the dead, and built again the temple which had been destroyed. You who shrink from this doctrine as blasphemous, make the members of your god to be confined not in a virgin's womb, but in the wombs of all female animals, from elephants down to flies. Perhaps you think the less of the true Christ, because the Word is said so to have become incarnate in the Virgin's womb as to provide a temple for Himself in human nature, while His own nature continued unaltered in its integrity; and, on the other hand, you think the more of your god, because in the bonds and pollution of his confinement in flesh, in the part which is to be made fast to the mass of darkness, he seeks for help to no purpose, or is even rendered powerless to ask for help.

BOOK XXIV.

FAUSTUS EXPLAINS THE MANICHAEAN DENIAL THAT MAN WAS MADE BY GOD

AS APPLYING TO THE FLESHLY MAN NOT TO THE SPIRITUAL. AUGUSTIN ELUCIDATES THE APOSTLE PAUL'S CONTRASTS BETWEEN FLESH AND SPIRIT SO AS TO EXCLUDE THE MANICHAEAN VIEW.

1. FAUSTUS said: We are asked the reason But we do not assert that man is in no sense for our denial that man is made by God. made by God; we only ask in what sense, and when, and how. For, according to the apostle, there are two men, one of whom he calls sometimes the outer man, generally the earthy, sometimes, too, the old man: the other he calls the inner or heavenly or new man.(1) The question is, Which of these is made by God? For there are likewise two times of our nativity; one when nature brought us forth into this light, binding us in the bonds of flesh; and the other, when the truth regenerated us on our conversion from error and our entrance into the faith. It is this second birth of which Jesus speaks in the Gospel, when He says, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."(2) Nicodemus, not knowing what Christ meant, was at a loss, and inquired how this could be, for an old man could not enter into his mother's womb and be born a second time. Jesus said in reply, "Except a man be born of water and of the Holy Spirit, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Then He adds, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." Hence, as the birth in which our bodies originate is not the only birth, but there is another in which we are born again in spirit, an important question arises from this distinction as to which of those births it is in which God makes us. The manner of birth also is twofold. In the humiliating process of ordinary generation, we spring from the heat of animal passion; but when we are brought into the faith, we are formed under good instruction in honor and purity in Jesus Christ, by the Holy Spirit. For this reason, in all religion, and especially in the Christian religion, young children are invited to membership. This is hinted at in the words of His apostle: "My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you."(3) The question, then, is not whether God makes man, but what man He makes, and when, and how. For if it is when we are fashioned in the womb that God forms us after His own image, which is the common belief of Gentiles and Jews, and which is also your belief, then God makes the old man, and produces us by means of sensual passion, which does not seem suitable to His divine nature. But if it is when we are converted and brought to a better life that we are formed by God, which is the general doctrine of Christ and His apostles, and which is also our doctrine, in this case God makes us new men, and produces us in honor and purity, which would agree perfectly with His sacred and adorable majesty. If you do not reject Paul's authority, we will prove to you from him what man God makes, and when, and how. He says to the Ephesians, "That ye put off according to your former conversation the old man, which is corrupt through deceitful lusts; and be renewed in the spirit of your mind; and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and holiness of truth."4 This shows that in the creation of man after the image of God, it is another man that is spoken of, and another birth, and another manner of birth. The putting off and putting on of which he speaks, point to the time of the reception of the truth; and the assertion that the new man is created by God implies that the old man is created neither by God nor after God. And when he adds, that this new man is made in holiness and righteousness and truth, he thus points to another manner of birth of which this is the character, and which, as I have said, differs widely from the manner in which bodily generation is effected. And as he declares that only the former is of God, it follows that the latter is not. Again, writing to the Colossians, he uses words to the same effect: "Put off the old man with his deeds, and put on the new man, which is renewed in the knowledge of God according to the image of Him who created Him in you." Here he not only shows that iris the new man that God makes, but he declares the time and manner of the formation, for the words in the knowledge of God point to the time of believing. Then he adds, according to the image of Him who created him, to make it clear that the old man is not the image of God, nor formed by God. Moreover, the following words, "Where there is neither male nor female, Jew nor Greek, Barbarian nor Scythian,"5 show more plainly still that the birth by which we are made male and female, Greeks and Jews, Scythians and Barbarians, is not the birth in which God effects the formation of man; but that the birth with which God has to do is that in which we lose the difference of nation and sex and condition, and become one like Him who is one, that is, Christ. So the same apostle says again, "As many as have been baptized in Christ have put on Christ: there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither male nor female, there is neither bond nor free; but all are one in Christ."6 Man, then, is made by God, not when from one he is divided into many, but when from many he becomes one. The division is in the first birth, or that of the body; union comes by the second, which is immaterial and divine. This affords sufficient ground for our opinion, that the birth of the body should be ascribed to nature, and the second birth to the Supernal Majesty. So the same apostle says again to the Corinthians, "I have begotten you in Christ Jesus by the gospel;"(1) and, speaking of himself, to the Galatians, "When it pleased Him, who separated me from my mother's womb, to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach Him among the Gentiles, immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood."(2) It is plain that everywhere he speaks of the second or spiritual birth as that in which we are made by God, as distinct from the indecency of the first birth, in which we are on a level with other animals as regards dignity and purity, as we are conceived in the maternal womb, and are formed, and brought forth. You may observe that in this matter the dispute between us is not so much about a question of doctrine as of interpretation. For you think that it is the old or outer or earthy man that is said to have been made by God; while we apply this to the heavenly man, giving the superiority to the inner or new man. And our opinion is not rash or groundless, for we have learned it from Christ and His apostles, who are proved to have been the first in the world who thus taught.

2. AUGUSTIN replied: The Apostle Paul certainly uses the expression the inner man for the spirit of the mind, and the outer man for the body and for this mortal life; but we nowhere find him making these two different men, but one, which is all made by God, both the inner and the outer. However, it is made in the image of God only as regards the inner, which, besides being immaterial, is rational, and is not possessed by the lower animals. God, then, did not make one man after His own image, and another man not after that image; but the one man, which includes both the inner and the outer, He made after His own image, not as regards the possession of a body and of mortal life, but as regards the rational mind with the power of knowing God, and with the superiority as compared with all irrational creatures which the possession of reason implies. Faustus allows that the inner man is made by God, when, as he says, it is renewed in the knowledge of God after the image of Him that created him. I readily admit this on the apostle's authority. Why does not Faustus admit on the same authority that "God has placed the members every one in the body, as it has pleased Him"?(3) Here we learn from the same apostle that God is the framer of the outer man too. Why does Faustus take only what he thinks to be in his own favor, while he leaves out or rejects what upsets the follies of the Manichaeans? Moreover, in treating of the earthy and the heavenly man, and making the distinction between the mortal and the immortal, between that which we are in Adam and that which we shall be in Christ, the apostle quotes the declaration of the law regarding the earthy or natural body, referring to the very book and the very passage where it is written that God made the earthy man too. Speaking of the manner in which the dead shall rise again, and of the body with which they shall come, after using the similitude of the seeds of corn, that they are sown bare grain, and that God gives them a body as it pleases Him, and to every seed his own body,--thus, by the way, overthrowing the error of the Manichaeans, who say that grains and plants, and all roots and shoots, are created by the race of darkness, and not by God, who, according to them, instead of exerting power in the production of these objects, is Himself subject to confinement in them,--he goes on, after this refutation of Manichaean impieties, to describe the different kinds of flesh. "All flesh," he says, "is not the same flesh." Then he speaks of celestial and terrestrial bodies, and then of the change of our body by which it will become spiritual and heavenly. "It is sown," he says, "in dishonor, it shall rise in glory; it is sown in weakness, it shall rise in power; it is sown a natural body, it shall rise a spiritual body." Then, in order to show the origin of the animal body, he says, "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body; as it is written, The first man, Adam, was made a living soul."4 Now this is written in Genesis,5 where it is related how God made man, and animated the body which He had formed of the earth. By the old man the apostle simply means the old life, which is a life in sin, and is after the manner of Adam, of whom it is said, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, in that all have sinned."6 Thus the whole of this man, both the inner and the outer part, has become old because of sin, and liable to the punishment of mortality. There is, however, a restoration of the inner man, when it is renewed after the image of its Creator, in the putting off of unrighteousness--that is, the old man, and putting on righteousness--that is, the new man. But when that which is sown a natural body shall rise a spiritual body, the outer man too shall attain the dignity of a celestial character; so that all that has been created may be created anew, and all that has been made be remade by the Creator and Maker Himself. This is briefly explained in the words: "The body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness. But if the Spirit of Him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead will also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit dwelling in you."(1) No one instructed in the Catholic doctrine but knows that it is in the body that some are male and some female, not in the spirit of the mind, in which we are renewed after the image of God. But elsewhere the apostle teaches that God is the Maker of both; for he says, "Neither is the woman without the man, nor the man without the woman, in the Lord; for as the woman is of the man, so is the man by the woman; but all things are of God."(2) The only reply given to this, by the perverse stupidity of those who are alienated from the life of God by the ignorance which is in them, on account of the blindness of their heart, is, that whatever pleases them in the apostolic writings is true, and whatever displeases them is false. This is the insanity of the Manichaeans, who will be wise if they cease to be Manichaeans. As it is, if they are asked whether it is He that remakes and renews the inner man (which they acknowledge to be renewed after the image of God, and they themselves quote the passage in support of this; and, according to Faustus, God makes man when the inner man is renewed in the image of God), they will answer, yes. And if we then go on to ask when God made what He now renews, they must devise some subterfuge to prevent the exposure of their absurdities. For, according to them, the inner man is not formed or created or originated by God, but is part of His own substance sent against His enemies; and instead of becoming old by sin, it is through necessity captured and damaged by the enemy. Not to repeat all the nonsense they talk, the first man they speak of is not the man of the earth earthy that the apostle speaks of,(3) but an invention proceeding from their own magazine of untruths. Faustus, though he chooses man as a subject for discussion, says not a word of this first man; for he is afraid that his opponents in the discussion might come to know something about him.

BOOK XXV.

FAUSTUS SEEKS TO BRING INTO RIDICULE THE ORTHODOX CLAIM TO BELIEVE IN THE INFINITY OF GOD BY CARICATURING THE ANTHROPOMORPHIC REPRESENTATIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. AUGUSTIN EXPRESSES HIS DESPAIR OF BEING ABLE TO INDUCE THE MANICHAEANS TO ADOPT RIGHT VIEWS OF THE INFINITUDE OF GOD SO LONG AS THEY CONTINUE TO REGARD THE SOUL AND GOD AS EXTENDED IN SPACE.

1. FAUSTUS said: Is God finite or infinite? He must be finite unless you are mistaken in addressing Him as the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob; unless, indeed, the being thus addressed is different from the God you call infinite. In the case of the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, the mark of circumcision, which separated these men from fellowship with other people, marked also the limit of God's power as extending only to them. And a being whose power is finite cannot himself be infinite. Moreover, in this address, you do not mention even the ancients before Abraham, such as Enoch, Noah, and Shem, and others like them, whom you allow to have been righteous though in uncircumcision; but because they lacked this distinguishing mark, you will not call God their God, but only of Abraham and his seed. Now, if God is one and infinite, what need of such careful particularity in addressing Him, as if it was not enough to name God, without adding whose God He is--Abraham's, namely, and Isaac's and Jacob's; as if Abraham were a landmark to steer by in your invocation, to escape shipwreck among a shoal of deities? The Jews, who are circumcised, may very properly address this deity, as having a reason for it, because they call God the God of circumcision, in contrast to the gods of uncircumcision. But why you should do the same, it is difficult to understand; for you do not pretend to have Abraham's sign, though you invoke his God. If we understand the matter rightly, the Jews and their God seem to have set marks upon one another for the purpose of recognition, that they might not lose each ether. So God gave them the disgusting mark of circumcision, that, in whatever land or among whatever people they might be, they might by being circumcised be known to be His.

They again marked God by calling Him the God of their fathers, that, wherever He might be, though among a crowd of gods, He might, on hearing the name God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob, know at once that He was addressed. So we often see, in a number of people of the same name, that no one answers till called by his surname. In the same way the shepherd or herdsman makes use of a brand to prevent his property being taken by others. In thus marking God by calling Him the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, you show not only that He is finite, but also that you have no connection with Him, because you have not the mark of circumcision by which He recognizes His own. Therefore, if this is the God you worship, there can be no doubt of His being finite. But if you say that God is infinite, you must first of all give up this finite deity, and by altering your invocation, show your penitence for your past errors. We have thus proved God to be finite, taking you on your own ground. But to determine whether the supreme and true God is infinite or not, we need only refer to the opposition between good and evil. If evil does not exist, then certainly God is infinite; otherwise He must be finite. Evil, however, undoubtedly exists; therefore God is not infinite. It is where good stops that evil begins.

2. AUGUSTIN replied: No one that knows you would dream of asking you about the infinitude of God, or of discussing the matter with you. For, before there can be any degree of spirituality in any of your conceptions, you must first have your minds cleared by simple faith, and by some elementary knowledge, from the illusions of carnal and material ideas. This your our heresy prevents you from doing, for it invariably represents the body and the soul and God as extended in space, either finite or infinite, while the idea of space is applicable only to the body. As long as this is the case, it will be better for you to leave this matter alone; for you can teach no truth regarding it, any more than in other matters; and in this you are unfit for learning, as you might do in other things, if you were not proud and quarrelsome. For in such questions as how God can be finite, when no space can contain Him; how He can be infinite, when the Son knows Him perfectly; how He can be finite, and yet unbounded; how He can be infinite, and yet perfect; how He can be finite, who is without measure; how He can be infinite, who is the measure of all things--all carnal ideas go for nothing; and if the carnality is to be removed, it must first become ashamed of itself. Accordingly, your best way of ending the matter you have brought forward of God as finite or infinite, is to say no more about it till you cease going so far astray from Christ, who is the end of the law. Of the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob we have already said enough to show why He who is the true God of all creatures wished to be familiarly known by His people under this name. On circumcision, too, we have already spoken in several places in answer to ignorant reproaches. The Manichaeans would find nothing to ridicule in this sign if they would view it as appointed by God, to be an appropriate symbol of the putting off of the flesh. They ought thus to consider the rite with a Christian instead of a heretical mind; as it is written, "To the pure all things are pure." But, considering the truth of the following words, "To the unclean and unbelieving nothing is pure, but even their mind and conscience are defiled,"(1) we must remind our witty opponents, that if circumcision is indecent, as they say it is, they should rather weep than laugh at it; for their god is exposed to restraint and contamination in conjunction both with the skin which is cut and with the blood which is shed.

BOOK XXVI.

FAUSTUS INSISTS THAT JESUS MIGHT HAVE DIED THOUGH NOT BORN, BY THE EXERCISE OF DIVINE POWER, YET HE REJECTS BIRTH AND DEATH ALIKE. AUGUSTIN MAINTAINS THAT THERE ARE SOME THINGS THAT EVEN GOD CANNOT DO, ONE OF WHICH IS TO DIE. HE REFUTES THE DOCETISM OF THE MANICHAEANS.

1. FAUSTUS said: You ask, If Jesus was not born, how did He die? Well this is a probability, such as one makes use of in want of proofs. We will, however, answer the question by examples taken from what you generally believe. If they are true, they will prove our case; if they are false, they will help you no more than they will us. You say then,

How could Jesus die, if He were not man? In return, I ask you, How did Elias not die, though he was a man? Could a mortal encroach upon the limits of immortality, and could not Christ add to His immortality whatever experience of death was required? If Elias, contrary to nature, lives for ever, why not allow that Jesus, with no greater contrariety to nature, could remain in death for three days? Besides that, it is not only Elias, but Moses and Enoch you believe to be immortal, and to have been taken up with their bodies to heaven. Accordingly, if it is a good argument that Jesus was a man because He died, it is an equally good argument that Elias was not a man because he did not die. But as it is false that Elias was not a man, notwithstanding his supposed immortality, so it is false that Jesus was a man, though He is considered to have died. The truth is, if you will believe it, that the Hebrews were in a mistake regarding both the death of Jesus and the immortality of Elias. For it is equally untrue that Jesus died and that Elias did not die. But you believe whatever you please; and for the rest, you appeal to nature. And, allowing this appeal, nature is against both the death of the immortal and the immortality of the mortal. And if we refer to the power of effecting their purpose as possessed by God and by man, it seems more possible for Jesus to die than for Elias not to die; for the power of Jesus is greater than that of Elias. But if you exalt the weaker to heaven, though nature is against it, and, forgetting his condition as a mortal, endow him with eternal felicity, why should I not admit that Jesus could die if He pleased, even though I were to grant His death to have been real, and not a mere semblance? For, as from the outset of His taking the likeness of man He underwent in appearance all the experiences of humanity, it was quite consistent that He should complete the system by appearing to die.

2. Moreover, it is to be remembered that this reference to what nature grants as possible, should be made in connection with all the history of Jesus, and not only with His death. According to nature, it is impossible that a man blind from his birth should see the light; and yet Jesus appears to have performed a miracle of this kind, so that the Jews themselves exclaimed that from the beginning of the world it was not seen that one opened the eyes of a man born blind.(1) So also healing a withered hand, giving the power of utterance and expression to those born dumb, restoring animation to the dead, with the recovery of their bodily frame after dissolution had begun, produce a feeling of amazement, and must seem utterly incredible in view of what is naturally possible and impossible. And yet, as Christians, we believe all the things to have been done by the same person; for we regard not the law of nature, but the powerful operation of God. There is a story, too, of Jesus having been cast from the brow of a hill, and having escaped unhurt. If, then, when thrown down from a height He did not die, simply because He chose not to die, why should He not have had the power to die when He pleased? We take this way of answering you because you have a fancy for discussion, and affect to use logical weapons not properly belonging to you. As regards our own belief, it is no more true that Jesus died than that Elias is immortal.

3. AUGUSTIN replied: As to Enoch and Elias and Moses, our belief is determined not by Faustus' suppositions, but by the declarations of Scripture, resting as they do on foundations of the strongest and surest evidence. People in error, as you are, are unfit to decide what is natural, and what contrary to nature. We admit that what is contrary to the ordinary course of human experience is commonly spoken of as contrary to nature. Thus the apostle uses the words, "If thou art cut out of the wild olive, and engrafted contrary to nature in the good olive."(2) Contrary to nature is here used in the sense of contrary to human experience of the course of nature; as that a wild olive engrafted in a good olive should bring forth the fatness of the olive instead of wild berries. But God, the Author and Creator of all natures, does nothing contrary to nature; for whatever is done by Him who appoints all natural order and measure and proportion must be natural in every case. And man himself acts contrary to nature only when he sins; and then by punishment he is brought back to nature again. The natural order of justice requires either that sin should not be committed or that it should not go unpunished. In either case, the natural order is preserved, if not by the soul, at least by God. For sin pains the conscience, and brings grief on the mind of the sinner, by the loss of the light of justice, even should no physical sufferings follow, which are inflicted for correction, or are reserved for the incorrigible. There is, however, no impropriety in saying that God does a thing contrary to nature, when it is contrary to what we know of nature. For we give the name nature to the usual common course of nature; and whatever God does contrary to this, we call a prodigy, or a miracle. But against the supreme law of nature, which is beyond the knowledge both of the ungodly and of weak believers, God never acts, any more than He acts against Himself. As regards spiritual and rational beings, to which class the human soul belongs, the more they partake of this unchangeable law and light, the more clearly they see what is possible, and what impossible; and again, the greater their distance from it, the less their perception of the future, and the more frequent their surprise at strange occurrences.

4. Thus of what happened to Elias we are ignorant; but still we believe the truthful declarations of Scripture regarding him. Of one thing we are certain, that what God willed happened, and that except by God s will nothing can happen to any one. So, if I am told that it is possible that the flesh of a certain man shall be changed into a celestial body, I allow the possibility, but I cannot tell whether it will be done; and the reason of my ignorance is, that I am not acquainted with the will of God in the matter. That it will be done if it is God's will, is perfectly clear and indubitable. Again, if I am told that something would happen if God did not prevent it from happening, I reply confidently that what is to happen is the action of God, not the event which might otherwise have happened. For God knows His own future action, and therefore He knows also the effect of that action in preventing the happening of what would otherwise have happened; and, beyond all question, what God knows is more certain than what man thinks. Hence it is as impossible for what is future not to happen, as for what is past not to have happened; for it can never be God's will that anything should, in the same sense, be both true and false. Therefore all that is properly future cannot but happen; what does not happen never was future; even as all things which are properly in the past did indubitably take place.

5. Accordingly, to say, if God is almighty, let Him make what has been done to be undone, is in fact to say, if God is almighty, let Him make a thing to be in the same sense both true and false. God can put an end to the existence of anything, when the thing to be put an end to has a present existence; as when He puts an end by death to the existence of any one who has been brought into existence in birth; for in this case there is an actual existence which may be put a stop to. But when a thing does not exist, the existence cannot be put a stop to. Now, what is past no longer exists and whatever has an existence which can be put an end to cannot be past. What is truly past is no longer present; and the truth of its past existence is in our judgment, not in the thing itself which no longer exists. The proposition asserting anything to be past is true when the thing no longer exists. God cannot make such a proposition false, because He cannot contradict the truth. The truth in this case, or the true judgment, is first of all in our own mind, when we know and give expression to it. But should it disappear from our minds by our forgetting it, it would still remain as truth. It will always be true that the past thing which is no longer present had an existence; and the truth of its past existence after it has stopped is the same as the truth of its future existence before it began to be. This truth cannot be contradicted by God, in whom abides the supreme and unchangeable truth, and whose illumination is the source of all the truth to be found in any mind or understanding. Now God is not omnipotent in the sense of being able to die; nor does this inability prevent His being omnipotent. True omnipotence belongs to Him who truly exists, and who alone is the source of all existence, both spiritual and corporeal. The Creator makes what use He pleases of all His creatures; and His pleasure is in harmony with true and unchangeable justice, by which, as by His own nature, He, Himself unchangeable, brings to pass the changes of all changeable things according to the desert of their natures or of their actions. No one, therefore, would be so foolish as to deny that Elias being a creature of God could be changed either for the worse or for the better; or that by the will of the omnipotent God he could be changed in a manner unusual among men. So we can have no reason for doubting what on the high authority of Scripture is related of him, unless we limit the power of God to things which we are familiar with.

6. Faustus' argument is, If Elias who was a man could escape death, why might not Christ have the power of dying, since He was more than man? This is the same as to say, If human nature can be changed for the better, why should not the divine nature be changed for the worse?--a weak argument, seeing that human nature is changeable, while the divine nature is not. Such a method of inference would lead to the glaring absurdity, that if God can bestow eternal glory on man, He must also have the power of consigning Himself to eternal misery. Faustus will reply that his argument refers only to three days of death for God, as compared with eternal life for man. Well, if you understood the three days of death in the sense of the death of the flesh which God took as a part of our mortal nature, you would be quite correct; for the truth of the gospel makes known that the death of Christ for three days was for the eternal life of men. But in arguing that there is no impropriety in asserting a death of three days of the divine nature itself, without any assumption of mortality, because human nature can be endowed with immortality, you display the folly of one who knows neither God nor the gifts of God. And indeed, since you make part of your god to be fastened to the mass of darkness for ever, how can you escape the absurd conclusion already mentioned, that God consigns Himself to eternal misery,? You will then require to prove that part of light is light, while part of God is not God. To give you in a word, without argument, the true reason of our faith, as regards Elias having been caught up to heaven from the earth, though only a man, and as regards Christ being truly born of a virgin, and truly dying on the cross, our belief in both cases is grounded on the declaration of Holy Scripture,(1) which it is piety to believe, and impiety to disbelieve. What is said of Elias you pretend to deny, for you will pretend anything. Regarding Christ, although even you do not go the length of saying that He could not die, though He could be born, still you deny His birth from a virgin, and assert His death on the cross to have been feigned, which is equivalent to denying it too, except as a mockery for the delusion of men; and you allow so much merely to obtain indulgence for your own falsehoods from the believers in these fictions.

7. The question which Faustus makes it appear that he is asked by a Catholic, If Jesus was not born, how could He die? could be asked only by one who overlooked the fact that Adam died, though he was not born. Who will venture to say that the Son of God could not, if He had pleased, have made for Himself a true human body in the same way as He did for Adam; for all things were made by Him?(2) or who will deny that He who is the Almighty Son of the Almighty could, if He had chosen, have taken a body from a heavenly substance, or from air or vapor, and have so changed it into the precise character of a human body, as that He might have lived as a man, and have died in it? Or, once more, if He had chosen to take a body of none of the material substances which He had made, but to create for Himself from nothing real flesh, as all things were created by Him from nothing, none of us will oppose this by saying that He could not have done it. The reason of our believing Him to have been born of the Virgin Mary, is not that He could not otherwise have appeared among men in a true body, but because it is so written in the Scripture, which we must believe in order to be Christians, or to be saved. We believe, then, that Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, because it is so written in the Gospel; we believe that He died on the cross, because it is so written in the Gospel; we believe that both His birth and death were real, because the Gospel is no fiction. Why He chose to suffer all these things in a body taken from a woman is a matter known only to Himself. Perhaps He took this way of giving importance and honor to both the sexes which He had created, taking the form of a man, and being born of a woman; or there may have been some other reason, we cannot tell. But this may be confidently affirmed, that what took place was exactly as we are told in the Gospel narrative, and that what the wisdom of God determined upon was exactly what ought to have happened. We place the authority of the Gospel above all heretical discussions; and we admire the counsel of divine wisdom more than any counsel of any creature.

8. Faustus calls upon us to believe him, and says, The truth is, if you will believe it, that the Hebrews were in a mistake regarding both the death of Jesus and the immortality of Elias. And a little after he adds, As from the outset of His taking the likeness of man He underwent in appearance all the experiences of humanity, it was quite consistent that He should seal the dispensation by appearing to die. How can this infamous liar, who declares that Christ feigned death, expect to be believed? Did Christ utter falsehood when He said, "It behoves the Son of man to be killed, and to rise the third day?"(3) And do you tell us to believe what you say, as if you utter no falsehoods? In that case, Peter was more truthful than Christ when he said to Him, "Be it far from Thee, Lord; this shall not be unto Thee;" for which it was said to him, "Get thee behind me, Satan."(4) This rebuke was not lost upon Peter, for, after his correction and full preparation, he preached even to his own death the truth of the death of Christ. But if Peter deserved to be called Satan for thinking that Christ would not die, what should you be called, when you not only deny that Christ died, but assert that He reigned death? You give, as a reason for Christ's appearing to die, that He underwent in appearance all the experiences of humanity. But that He reigned all the experiences of humanity is only your opinion in opposition to the Gospel. In reality, when the evangelist says that Jesus slept,(1) that He was hungry,(2) that He was thirsty,(3) that He was sorrowful,(4) or glad, and so on,--these things are all true in the sense of not being feigned, but actual experiences; only that they were undergone, not from a mere natural necessity, but in the exercise of a controlling will, and of divine power. In the case of a man, anger, sorrow, sleeping, being hungry and thirst, are often involuntary; in Christ they were acts of His own will. So also men are born without any act of their own will, and suffer against their will; while Christ was born and suffered by His own will. Still, the things are true; and the accurate narrative of them is intended to instruct whoever believes in Christ's gospel in the truth, not to delude him with falsehoods.

BOOK XXVII.

FAUSTUS WARNS AGAINST PRESSING TOO FAR THE ARGUMENT, THAT IF JESUS WAS NOT BORN HE CANNOT HAVE SUFFERED. AUGUSTIN ACCEPTS THE BIRTH AND DEATH ALIKE ON THE TESTIMONY OF THE GOSPEL NARRATIVE, WHICH IS HIGHER AUTHORITY THAN THE FALSEHOOD OF MANICHAEUS.

1. FAUSTUS said: If Jesus was not born, He cannot have suffered; but since He did suffer, He must have been born. I advise you not to have recourse to logical inference in these matters, or else your whole faith will be shaken. For, even according to you, Jesus was born miraculously of a virgin; which the argument from consequents to antecedents shows to be false. For your argument might thus be turned against you: If Jesus was born of a woman, He must have been begotten by a man; but He was not begotten by a man, therefore He was not born of a woman. If, as you believe, He could be born without being begotten, why could He not also suffer without being brought forth?

2. AGUSTIN replied: The argument which you here reply to is one which could be used only by such ignorant people as you succeed in misleading, not by those who know enough to refute you. Jesus could both be born without being begotten and suffer without being brought forth. His being one and not the other was the effect of His own will. He chose to be born without being begotten, and not to suffer without being brought forth. And if you ask how I know that He was brought forth, and that He suffered, I read this in the faithful Gospel narrative. If I ask how you know what you state, you bring forward the authority of Manichaeus, and charge the Gospel with falsehood. Even if Manichaeus did not set forth falsehood as an excellence in Christ, I should not believe his statements. His praise of falsehood comes from nothing that he found in Christ, but from his own moral character.

BOOK XXVIII.

FAUSTUS RECURS TO THE GENEALOGY AND INSISTS UPON EXAMINING IT AS REGARDS ITS CONSISTENCY WITH ITSELF. AUGUSTIN TAKES HIS STAND ON SCRIPTURE AUTHORITY AND MAINTAINS THAT MATTHEW"S STATEMENTS AS TO THE BIRTH OF CHRIST MUST BE ACCEPTED AS FINAL.

1. FAUSTUS said: Christ, you say, could not have died, had He not been born. I reply, If He was born, He cannot have been God; or if He could both be God and be born, why could He not both be born and die? Plainly, arguments and necessary consequences are not applicable to those matters, where the question is of the account to be given of Jesus. The answer must be obtained from His own statements, or from the statements of His apostles regarding Him. The genealogy must be examined as regards its consistency with itself, instead Of arguing from the supposition of Christ's death to the fact of His birth; for He might have suffered without having been born, or He might have been born, and yet never have suffered; for you yourselves acknowledge that with God nothing is impossible, which is inconsistent with the denial that Christ could have suffered without having been born.

2. AUGUSTIN replied: You are always answering arguments which no one uses, instead of our real arguments, which you cannot answer. No one says that Christ could not die if He had not been born; for Adam died though he had not been born. What we say is, Christ was born, because this is said not by this or that heretic, but in the holy Gospel; and He died, for this too is written, not in some heretical production, but in the holy Gospel. You set aside argument on the question of the true account to be given of Jesus, and refer to what He says of Himself, and what His apostles say of Him; and yet, when I begin to quote the Gospel of His apostle Matthew, where we have the whole narrative of Christ's birth, you forthwith deny that Matthew wrote the narrative, though this is affirmed by the continuous testimony of the whole Church, from the days of apostolic presidency to the bishops of our own time. What authority will you quote against this? Perhaps some book of Manichaeus, where it is denied that Jesus was born of a virgin. As, then, I believe your book to be the production of Manichaeus, since it has been kept and handed down among the disciples of Manichaeus, from the time when he lived to the present time, by a regular succession of your presidents, so I ask you to believe the book which I quote to have been written by Matthew, since it has been handed down from the days of Matthew in the Church, without any break in the connection between that time and the present. The question then is, whether we are to believe the statements of an apostle who was in the company of Christ while He was on earth, or of a man away in Persia, born long after Christ. But perhaps you will quote some other book bearing the name of an apostle known to have been chosen by Christ; and you will find there that Christ was not born of Mary. Since, then, one of the books must be false, the question in this case is, whether we are to yield our belief to a book acknowledged and approved as handed down from the beginning in the Church founded by Christ Himself, and maintained through the apostles and their successors in an unbroken connection all over the world to the present day; or to a book which this Church condemns as unknown, and which, moreover, is brought forward by men who prove their veracity by praising Christ for falsehood.

3. Here you will say, Examine the genealogy as given in the two Gospels, and see if it is consistent with itself. The answer to this has been given already.(1) Your difficulty is how Joseph could have two fathers. But even if you could not have thought of the explanation, that one was his own father, and the other adopted, you should not have been so ready to put yourself in opposition to such high authority. Now that this explanation has been given you, I call upon you to acknowledge the truth of the Gospel, and above all to cease your mischievous and unreasonable attacks upon the truth.

4. Faustus most plausibly refers to what Jesus said of Himself. But how is this to be known except from the narratives of His disciples? And if we do not believe them when they tell us that Christ was born of a virgin, how shall we believe what they record as said by Christ of Himself? For, as regards any writing professing to come immediately from Christ Himself, if it were really His, how is it not read and acknowledged and regarded as of supreme authority in the Church, which, beginning with Christ Himself, and continued by His apostles, who were succeeded by the bishops, has been maintained and extended to our own day, and in which is found the fulfillment of many former predictions. while those concerning the last days are sure to be accomplished in the future? In regard to the appearance of such a writing, it would require to be considered from what quarter it issued. Supposing it to have issued from Christ Himself, those in immediate connection with Him might very well have received it, and have transmitted it to others. In this case, the authority of the writing would be fully established by the traditions of various communities, and of their presidents, as I have already said. Who, then, is so infatuated as in our day to believe that the Epistle of Christ issued by Manichaeus is genuine, or to disbelieve Matthew's narrative of Christ's words and actions? Or, if the question is of Matthew being the real author, who would not, in this also, believe what he finds in the Church, which has a distinct history in unbroken connection from the days of Matthew to the present time, rather than a Persian interloper, who comes more than two hundred years after, and wishes us to believe his account of Christ's words and actions rather than that of Matthew; whereas, even in the case of the Apostle Paul, who was called from heaven after the Lord's ascension, the Church would not have believed him, had there not been apostles in life with whom he might communicate, and compare his gospel with theirs, so as to be recognized as belonging to the same society? When it was ascertained that Paul preached what the apostles preached, and that he lived in fellowship and harmony with them, and when God's testimony was added by Paul's working miracles like those done by the apostles, his authority became so great, that his words are now received in the Church, as if, to use his own appropriate words, Christ were speaking in him.(1) Manichaeus, on the other hand, thinks that the Church of Christ should believe what he says in opposition to the Scriptures, which are supported by such strong and continuous evidence, and in which the Church finds an emphatic injunction, that whoever preaches to her differently from what she has received must be anathema.(2)

5. Faustus tells us that he has good grounds for concluding that these Scriptures are unworthy of credit. And yet he speaks of not using arguments. But the argument too shall be refuted. The end of the whole argument is to bring the soul to believe that the reason of its misery in this world is, that it is the means of preventing God from being deprived of His kingdom, and that God's substance and nature is so exposed to change, corruption, injury, and contamination, that part of it is incurably defiled, and is consigned by Him self to eternal punishment in the mass of darkness, though, when it was in harmless union with Himself, and guilty of no crime, He knowingly sent it where it was to suffer defilement. This is the end of all your arguments and fictions; and would that there were an end of them as regards your heart and your lips, that you might sometime desist from believing and uttering those execrable blasphemies! But, says Faustus, I prove from the writings themselves that they cannot be in all points trustworthy, for they contradict one another. Why not say, then, that they are wholly untrustworthy, if their testimony is inconsistent and self-contradictory? But, says Faustus, I say what I think to be in accordance with truth. With what truth? The truth is only your own fiction, which begins with God's battle, goes on to His contamination, and ends with His damnation. No one, says Faustus, believes writings which contradict themselves. But if you think they do this, it is because you do not understand them; for your ignorance has been manifested in regard to the passages you have quoted in support of your opinion, and the same will appear in regard to any quotations you may still make. So there is no reason for our not believing these writings, supported as they are by such weighty testimony; and this is itself the best reason for pronouncing accursed those whose preaching differs from what is there written.

BOOK XXIX.

FAUSTUS SEEKS TO JUSTIFY THE DOCETISM OF THE MANICHAEANS. AUGUSTIN INSISTS THAT THERE IS NOTHING DISGRACEFUL IN BEING BORN.

1. FAUSTUS said: If Christ was visible, and suffered without having been born, this was sorcery. This argument of yours may be turned against you, by replying that it was sorcery if He was conceived or brought forth without being begotten. It is not in accordance with the law of nature that a virgin should bring forth, and still less that she should still be a virgin after bringing forth. Why, then, do you refuse to admit that Christ, in a preternatural manner, suffered without submitting to the condition of birth? Believe me: in substance, both our beliefs are contrary to nature; but our belief is decent, and yours is not. We give an explanation of Christ's passion which is at least probable, while the only explanation you give of His birth is false. In fine, we hold that He suffered in appearance, and did not really die; you believe in an actual birth, and conception in the womb. If it is not so, you have only to acknowledge that the birth too was a delusion, and our whole dispute will be at an end. As to what you frequently allege, that Christ could not have appeared or spoken to men without having been born, it is absurd; for, as our teachers have shown, angels have often appeared and spoken to men.

2. AUGUSTIN replied: We do not say that to die without having been born is sorcery; for, as we have said already, this happened in the case of Adam. But, though it had never happened, who will venture to say that Christ could not, if He had so pleased, have come without taking His body from a virgin, and yet appearing in a true booty to redeem us by a true death? However, it was better that He should be, as He actually was, born of a virgin, and, by His condescension, do honor to both sexes, for whose deliverance He was to die, by taking a man's body born of a woman. In this He testifies emphatically against you, and refutes your doctrine, which makes the sexes the work of the devil. What we call sorcery in your doctrine is your making Christ's passion and death to have been only in appearance, so that, by a spectral illusion, He seemed to die when He did not. Hence you must also make His resurrection spectral and illusory and false; for if there was no true death, there could not be a real resurrection. Hence also the marks which He showed to His doubting disciples must have been false; and Thomas was not assured by truth, but cheated by a lie, when he exclaimed, "My Lord, and my God."(1) And yet you would have us believe that your tongue utters truth, though Christ's whole body was a falsehood. Our argument against you is, that the Christ you make is such that you cannot be His true disciples unless you too practise deceit. The fact that Christ's body was the only one born of a virgin does not prove that there was sorcery in His birth, any more than there is sorcery in its being the only body to rise again on the third day, never to die any more. Will you say that there was sorcery in all the Lord's miracles because they were unusual? They really happened, and their appearance, as seen by men, was true, and not an illusion; and when they are said to be contrary to nature, it is not that they oppose nature, but that they transcend the method of nature to which we are accustomed. May God keep the minds of His people who are still babes in Christ from being influenced by Faustus, when he recommends as a duty that we should acknowledge Christ's birth to have been illusory and not real, that so we may end our dispute Nay, verily, rather let us continue to contend for the truth against them, than agree with them in falsehood.

3. But if we are to end the controversy by saying this, why do not our opponents themselves say it? While they assert the death of Christ to have been not real but feigned, why do they make out that He had no birth at all, not even of the same kind as His death? If they had so much regard for the authority of the evangelist as to oblige them to admit that Christ suffered, at least in appearance, it is the same authority which testifies to His birth. Two evangelists, indeed, give the story of the birth;(2) but in all we read of Jesus having a mother.(3) Perhaps Faustus was unwilling to make the birth an illusion, because the difference of the genealogies given in Matthew and Luke causes an apparent discrepancy. But, supposing a man ignorant, there are many things also relating to the passion of Christ in which he will think the evangelists disagree; suppose him instructed, he finds entire agreement. Can it be right to feign death, and wrong to feign birth? And yet Faustus will have us acknowledge the birth to be feigned, in order to put an end to the dispute. It will appear presently in our reply to another objection what we think to be the reason why Faustus will not admit of any birth, even a feigned one.

4. We deny that there is anything disgraceful in the bodies of saints. Some members, indeed, are called uncomely, because they have not so pleasing an appearance as those constantly in view.(4) But attend to what the apostle says, when from the unity and harmony of the body he enjoins charity on the Church: "Much more those members of the body, which seem to be feeble, are necessary: and those members of the body, which we think to be less honorable, upon these we bestow more abundant honor; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honor to that part which lacked: that there should be no schism in the body."(5) The licentious and intemperate use of those members is disgraceful, but not the members themselves; for they are preserved in purity not only by the unmarried, but also by wedded fathers and mothers of holy life, in whose case the natural appetite, as serving not lust, but an intelligent purpose in the production of children, is in no way disgraceful. Still more, in the holy Virgin Mary, who by faith conceived the body of Christ, there was nothing disgraceful in the members which served not for a common natural conception, but for a miraculous birth. In order that we might conceive Christ in sincere hearts, and, as it were, produce Him in confession, it was meet that His body should come from the substance of His mother without injury to her bodily purity. We cannot suppose that the mother of Christ suffered loss by His birth, or that the gift of productiveness displaced the grace of virginity. If these occurrences, which were real and no illusion, are new and strange, and contrary to the common course of nature, the reason is, that they are great, and amazing, and divine; and all the more on this account are they true, and firm, and sure. Angels, says Faustus, appeared and spoke without having been born. As if we held that Christ could not have appeared or spoken without having been born of a woman! He could, but He chose not; and what He chose was best. And that He chose to do what He did is plain, because He acted, not like your god, from necessity, but voluntarily. That He was born we know, because we put faith not in a heretic, but in Christ's gospel.

BOOK XXX.

FAUSTUS REPELS THE INSINUATION THAT THE PROPHECY OF PAUL WITH REFERENCE TO THOSE THAT SHOULD FORBID TO MARRY, ABSTAIN FROM MEATS, ETC., APPLIES TO THE MANICHAEANS MORE THAN TO THE CATHOLIC ASCETICS, WHO ARE HELD IN THE HIGHEST ESTEEM IN THE CHURCH. AUGUSTIN JUSTIFIES THIS APPLICATION OF THE PROPHECY, AND SHOWS THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN MANICHAEAN AND CHRISTIAN ASCETICISM.

1. FAUSTUS said: You apply to us the words of Paul: "Some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to lying spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their consciences seared as with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, abstaining from meats, which God has created to be received with thanksgiving by believers."(1) I refuse to admit that the apostle said this, unless you first acknowledge that Moses and the prophets taught doctrines of devils, and were the interpreters of a lying and malignant spirit; since they enjoin with great emphasis abstinence from swine's flesh and other meats, which they call unclean. This case must first be settled; and you must consider long and carefully how their teaching is to be viewed: whether they said these things from God, or from the devil. As regards these matters, either Moses and the prophets must be condemned along with us; or we must be acquitted along with them. You are unjust in condemning us, as you do now, as followers of the doctrine of devils, because we require the priestly class to abstain from animal food; for we limit the prohibition to the priesthood, while you hold that your prophets, and Moses himself, who forbade all classes of men to eat the flesh of swine, and hares, and conies, besides all varieties of cuttle-fish, and all fish wanting scales, said this not in a lying spirit, nor in the doctrine of devils, but from God, and in the Holy Spirit. Even supposing, then, that Paul said these words, you can convince me only by condemning Moses and the prophets; and so, though you will not do it for reason or truth, you will contradict Moses for the sake of your belly.

2. Besides, you have in your Book of Daniel the account of the three youths, which you will find it difficult to reconcile with the opinion that to abstain from meats is the doctrine of devils. For we are told that they abstained not only from what the law forbade, but even from what it allowed;(2) and you are wont to praise them, and count them as martyrs; though they too followed the doctrine of devils, if this is to be taken as the apostle's opinion. And Daniel himself declares that he fasted for three weeks, not eating flesh or drinking wine, while he prayed for his people.(3) How is it that he boasts of this doctrine of devils, and glories in the falsehood of a lying spirit?

3. Again, what are we to think of you, or of the better class of Christians among you, some of whom abstain from swine's flesh, some from the flesh of quadrupeds, and some from all animal food, while-all the Church admires them for it, and regards them with profound veneration, as only not gods? You obstinately refuse to consider that if the words quoted from the apostle are true and genuine, these people too are misled by doctrines of devils. And there is another observance which no one will venture to explain away or to deny, for it is known to all, and is practised yearly with particular attention in the congregation of Catholics all over the world--I mean the fast of forty days, in the due observance of which a man must abstain from all the things which, according to this verse, were created by God that we might receive them, while at the same time he calls this abstinence a doctrine of devils. So, my dear friends, shall we say that you too, during this fast, while celebrating the mysteries of Christ's passion, live after the manner of devils, and are deluded by a seducing spirit, and speak lies in hypocrisy, and have your conscience seared with a hot iron? If this does not apply to you, neither does it apply to us. What is to be thought of this verse, or its author; or to whom does it apply, since it agrees neither with the traditions of the Old Testament, nor with the institutions of the New? As regards the New Testament, the proof is from your own practice; and though the Old requires abstinence only from certain things, still it requires abstinence. On the other hand, this opinion of yours makes all abstinence from animal food a doctrine of devils. If this is your belief, once more I say it, you must condemn Moses, and reject the prophets, and pass the same sentence on yourselves; for, as they always abstained from certain kinds of food, so you sometimes abstain from all food.

4. But if you think that in making a distinction in food, Moses and the prophets established a divine ordinance, and not a doctrine of devils; if Daniel in the Holy Spirit observed a fast of three weeks; if the youths Ananias, Azarias, and Mishael, under divine guidance, chose to live on cabbage or pulse; if, again, those among you who abstain, do it not at the instigation of devils; if your abstinence from wine and flesh for forty days is not superstitious, but by divine command,- consider, I beseech you, if it is not perfect madness to suppose these words to be Paul's that abstinence from food and forbidding to marry are doctrines of devils. Paul cannot have said that to dedicate virgins to Christ is a doctrine of devils. But you read the words, and inconsiderately, as usual, apply them to us, without seeing that this stamps your virgins too as led away by the doctrine of devils, and that you are the functionaries of the devils in your constant endeavors to induce virgins to make this profession, so that in all your churches the virgins nearly outnumber the married women. Why do you still adhere to such practises? Why do you ensnare wretched young women, if it is the will of devils, and not of Christ, that they fulfill? But, first of all, I wish to know if making virgins is, in all cases, the doctrine of devils, or only the prohibition of marriage. If it is the prohibition, it does not apply to us, for we too hold it equally foolish to prevent one who wishes, as it is criminal and impious to force one who has some reluctance. But if you say that to encourage the proposal, and not to resist such a desire, is all the doctrine of devils, to say nothing of the consequence as regards you, the apostle himself will be thus brought into danger, if he must be considered as having introduced the doctrines of devils into Iconium, when Thecla, after having been betrothed, was by his discourse inflamed with the desire of perpetual virginity.(1) And what shall we say of Jesus, the Master Himself, and the source of all sanctity, who is the unwedded spouse of the virgins who make this profession, and who, when specifying in the Gospel three kinds of eunuchs, natural, artificial, and voluntary, gives the palm to those who have "made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven,"(2) meaning the youths of both sexes who have extirpated from their hearts the desire of marriage, and who in the Church act as eunuchs of the King's palace? Is this also the doctrine of devils? Are those words, too, spoken in a seducing spirit? And if Paul and Christ are proved to be priests of devils, is not their spirit the same that speaks in God? I do not mention the other apostles of our Lord, Peter, Andrew, Thomas, and the example of celibacy, the blessed John, who in various ways commended to young men and maidens the excellence of this profession, leaving to us, and to you too, the form for making virgins. I do not mention them, because you do not admit them into the canon, and so you will not scruple impiously to impute to them doctrines of devils. But will you say the same of Christ, or of the Apostle Paul, who, we know, everywhere expressed the same preference for unmarried women to the married, and gave an example of it in the case of the saintly Thecla? But if the doctrine preached by Paul to Thecla, and which the other apostles also preached, was not the doctrine of devils, how can we believe that Paul left on record his opinion, that the very exhortation to sanctity is the injunction and the doctrine of devils? To make virgins simply by exhortation, without forbidding to marry, is not peculiar to you. That is our principle too; and he must be not only a fool, but a madman, who thinks that a private law can forbid what the public law allows. As regards marriage, therefore, we too encourage virgins to remain as they are when they are willing to do so; we do not make them virgins against their will. For we know the force of will and of natural appetite when opposed by public law; much more when the law is only private, and every one is at liberty to disobey it. If, then, it is no crime to make virgins in this manner, we are guiltless as well as you. If it is wrong to make virgins in any way, you are guilty as well as we. So that what you mean, or intend, by quoting this verse against us, it is impossible to say.

5. AUGUSTIN replied: Listen, and you shall hear what we mean and intend by quoting this verse against you, since you say that you do not know. It is not that you abstain from animal food; for, as you observe, our ancient fathers abstained from some kinds of food, not, however, as condemning them, but with a typical meaning, which you do not understand, and of which I have said already in this work all that appeared necessary. Besides, Christians, not heretics, but Catholics, in order to subdue the body, that the soul may be more humbled in prayer, abstain not only from animal food, but also from some vegetable productions, without, however, believing them to be unclean. A few do this always; and at certain seasons or days, as in Lent, almost all, more or less, according to the choice or ability of individuals. You, on the other hand, deny that the creature is good, and call it unclean, saying that animals are made by the devil of the worst impurities in the substance of evil and so you reject them with horror, as being the most cruel and loathsome places of confinement of your god. You, as a concession, allow your followers, as distinct from the priests, to eat animal food; as the apostle allows, in certain cases, not marriage in the general sense, but the indulgence of passion m marriage.(1) It is only sin which is thus made allowance for. This is the feeling you have toward all animal food; you have learned it from your heresy, and you teach it to your followers. You make allowance for your followers, because, as I said before, they supply you with necessaries; but you grant them indulgence without saying that it is not sinful. For yourselves, you shun contact with this evil and impurity; and hence our reason for quoting this verse against you is found in the words of the apostle which follow those with which you end the quotation. Perhaps it was for this reason that you left out the words, and then say that you do not know what we mean or intend by the quotation; for it suited you better to omit the account of our intention than to express it. For, after speaking of abstaining from meats, which God has created to be received with thanksgiving by believers, the apostle goes on, "And by them who know the truth; for every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving: for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer."(2) This you deny; for your idea, and motive, and belief in abstaining from such food is, that they are not typically, but naturally, evil and impure. In this assuredly you blaspheme the Creator; and in this is the doctrine of devils. You need not be surprised that, so long before the event, this prediction regarding you was made by the Holy Spirit.

6. So, again, if your exhortations to virginity resembled the teaching of the apostle, "He who giveth in marriage doeth well, and he who giveth not in marriage doeth better;"(3) if you taught that marriage is good, and virginity better, as the Church teaches which is truly Christ's Church, you would not have been described in the Spirit's prediction as forbidding to marry. What a man forbids he makes evil; but a good thing may be placed second to a better thing without being forbidden. Moreover, the only honorable kind of marriage, or marriage entered into for its proper and legitimate purpose, is precisely that you hate most. So, though you may not forbid sexual intercourse, you forbid marriage; for the peculiarity of marriage is, that it is not merely for the gratification of passion, but, as is written in the contract, for the procreation of children. And, though you allow many of your followers to retain their connection with you in spite of their refusal, or their inability, to obey you, you cannot deny that you make the prohibition. The prohibition is part of your false doctrine, while the toleration is only for the interests of the society. And here we see the reason, which I have delayed till now to mention, for your making not the birth but only the death of Christ reigned and illusory. Death being the separation of the soul, that is, of the nature of your god, from the body which belongs to his enemies, for it is the work of the devil, you uphold and approve of it; and thus, according to your creed, it was meet that Christ, though He did not die, should commend death by appearing to die. In birth, again, you believe your god to be bound instead of released; and so you will not allow that Christ was born even in this illusory fashion. You would have thought better of Mary had she ceased to be a virgin without being a mother, than as being a mother without ceasing to be a virgin. You see, then, that there is a great difference between exhorting to virginity as the better of two good things, and forbidding to marry by denouncing the true purpose of marriage; between abstaining from food as a symbolic observance, or for the mortification of the body, and abstaining from food which God has created for the reason that God did not create it. In one case, we have the doctrine of the prophets and apostles; in the other, the doctrine of lying devils.

BOOK XXXI.

THE SCRIPTURE PASSAGE: "TO THE PURE ALL THINGS ARE PURE, BUT TO THE IMPURE AND DEFILED IS NOTHING PURE; BUT EVEN THEIR MIND AND CONSCIENCE ARE DEFILED," IS DISCUSSED FROM BOTH THE MANICHAEAN AND THE CATHOLIC POINTS OF VIEW, FAUSTUS OBJECTING TO ITS APPLICATION TO HIS PARTY AND AUGUSTIN INSISTING ON ITS APPLICATION.

1. FAUSTUS said: "To the pure all things are pure. But to the impure and defiled is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience are defiled." As regards this verse, too, it is very doubtful whether, for your own sake, you should believe it to have been written by Paul. For it would follow that Moses and the prophets were not only influenced by devils in making so much in their laws of the distinctions in food, but also that they themselves were impure and defiled in their mind and conscience, so that the following words also might properly be applied to them: "They profess to know God, but in works deny Him."(1) This is applicable to no one more than to Moses and the prophets, who are known to have lived very differently from what was becoming in men knowing God. Up to this time I have thought only of adulteries and frauds and murders as defiling the conscience of Moses and the prophets; but now, from what this verse says, it is plain that they were also defiled, because they looked upon something as defiled. How, then, can you persist in thinking that the vision of the divine majesty can have been bestowed on such men, when it is written that only the pure in heart can see God? Even supposing that they had been pure from unlawful crimes, this superstitious abstinence from certain kinds of food, if it defiles the mind, is enough to debar them from the sight of deity. Gone for ever, too, is the boast of Daniel, and of the three youths, who, till now that we are told that nothing is unclean, have been regarded among the Jews as persons of great purity and excellence of character, because, in observance of hereditary customs, they carefully avoided defiling themselves with Gentile food, especially that of sacrifices.(2) Now it appears that they were defiled in mind and conscience most of all when they were closing their mouth against blood and idol-feasts.

2. But perhaps their ignorance may excuse them; for, as this Christian doctrine of all things being pure to the pure had not then appeared, they may have thought some things impure. But there can be no excuse for you in the face of Paul's announcement, that there is nothing which is not pure, and that abstinence from certain food is the doctrine of devils, and that those who think anything defiled are polluted in their mind, if you not only abstain, as we have said, but make a merit of it, and believe that you become more acceptable to Christ in proportion as you are more abstemious, or, according to this new doctrine, as your minds are defiled and your conscience polluted. It should also be observed that, while there are three religions in the world which, though in a very different manner, appoint chastity and abstinence as the means of purification of the mind, the religions, namely, of the Jews, the Gentiles, and the Christians, the opinion that everything is pure cannot have come from any one of the three. It is certainly not from Judaism, nor from Paganism, which also makes a distinction of food; the only difference being, that the Hebrew classification of animals does not harmonize with the Pagan. Then as to the Christian faith, if you think it peculiar to Christianity to consider nothing defiled, you must first of all confess that there are no Christians among you. For things offered to idols, and what dies of itself, to mention nothing else, are regarded by you all as great defilement. If, again, this is a Christian practice, on your part, the doctrine which is opposed to all abstinence from impurities cannot be traced to Christianity either. How, then, could Paul have said what is not in keeping with any religion? In fact, when the apostle from a Jew became a Christian, it was a change of customs more than of religion. As for the writer of this verse, there seems to be no religion which favors his opinion.

3. Be sure, then, whenever you discover anything else in Scripture to assail our faith with, to see, in the first place, that it is not against you, before you commence your attack on us. For instance, there is the passage you continually quote about Peter, that he once saw a vessel let down from heaven in which were all kinds of animals and serpents, and that, when he was surprised and astonished, a voice was heard, saying to him, Peter, kill and eat whatsoever thou seest in the vessel, and that he replied, Lord I will not touch what is common or unclean. On this the voice spoke again, What I have cleansed, call not unclean.(1) This, indeed, seems to have an allegorical meaning, and not to refer to the absence of distinction in food. But as you choose to give it this meaning, you are bound to feed upon all wild animals, and scorpions, and snakes, and reptiles in general, in compliance with this vision of Peter's. In this way, you will show that you are really obedient to the voice which Peter is said to have heard. But you must never forget that you at the same time condemn Moses and the prophets, who considered many things polluted which, according to this utterance, God has sanctified.

4. AUGUSTIN replied: When the apostle says, "To the pure all things are pure," he refers to the natures which God had created,--as it is written by Moses in Genesis, "And God made all things; and behold they were very good,"(2)--not to the typical meanings, according to which God, by the same Moses, distinguished the clean from the unclean. Of this we have already spoken at length more than once, and need not dwell on it here. It is clear that the apostle called those impure who, after the revelation of the New Testament, still advocated the observance of the shadows of things to come, as if without them the Gentiles could not obtain the salvation which is in Christ, because in this they were carnally minded; and he called them unbelieving, because they did not distinguish between the time of the law and the time of grace. To them, he says, nothing is pure, because they made an erroneous and sinful use both of what they received and of what they rejected; which is true of all unbelievers, but especially of you Manichaeans, for to you nothing whatever is pure. For, although you take great care to keep the food which you use separate from the contamination of flesh, still it is not pure to you, for the only creator of it you allow is the devil. And you hold, that, by eating it, you release your god, who suffers confinement and pollution in it. One would think you might consider yourselves pure, since your stomach is the proper place for purifying your god. But even your own bodies, in your opinion, are of the nature and handiwork of the race of darkness; while your souls are still affected by the pollution of your bodies. What, then, is pure to you? Not the things you eat; not the receptacle of your food; not yourselves, by whom it is purified. Thus you see against whom the words of the apostle are directed; he expresses himself so as to include all who are impure and unbelieving, but first and chiefly to condemn you. To the pure, therefore, all things are pure, in the nature in which they were created; but to the ancient Jewish people all things were not pure in their typical significance; and, as regards bodily health, or the customs of society, all things are not suitable to us. But when things are in their proper places, and the order of nature is preserved, to the pure all things are pure; but to the impure and unbelieving, among whom you stand first, nothing is pure. You might make a wholesome application to yourselves of the following words of the apostle, if you desired a cure for your seared consciences. The words are: "Their very mind and conscience are defiled."

BOOK XXXII.

FAUSTUS FAILS TO UNDERSTAND WHY HE SHOULD BE REQUIRED EITHER TO ACCEPT OR REJECT THE NEW TESTAMENT AS A WHOLE, WHILE THE CATHOLICS ACCEPT OR REJECT THE VARIOUS PARTS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT AT PLEASURE. AUGUSTIN DENIES THAT THE CATHOLICS TREAT THE OLD TESTAMENT ARBITRARILY, AND EXPLAINS THEIR ATTITUDE TOWARDS IT.

1. FAUSTUS said: You say, that if we believe the Gospel, we must believe everything that is written in it. Why, then, since you believe the Old Testament, do you not believe all that is found in any part of it? Instead of that, you cull out only the prophecies telling of a future King of the Jews, for you suppose this to be Jesus, along with a few precepts of common morality, such as, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery; and all the rest you pass over, thinking of the other things as Paul thought of the things which he held to be dung.(1) Why, then, should it seem strange or singular in me that I select from the New Testament whatever is purest, and helpful for my salvation, while I set aside the interpolations of your predecessors, which impair its dignity and grace?

2. If there are parts of the Testament of the Father which we are not bound to observe (for you attribute the Jewish law to the Father, and it is well known that many things in it shock you, and make you ashamed, so that in heart you no longer regard it as free from corruption, though, as you believe, the Father Himself partly wrote it for you with His own finger while part was written by Moses, who was faithful and trustworthy), the Testament of the Son must be equally liable to corruption, and may equally well contain objectionable things; especially as it is allowed not to have been written by the Son Himself, nor by His apostles, but long after, by some unknown men, who, lest they should be suspected of writing of things they knew nothing of, gave to their books the names of the apostles, or of those who were thought to have followed the apostles, declaring the contents to be according to these originals. In this, I think, they do grievous wrong to the disciples of Christ, by quoting their authority for the discordant and contradictory statements in these writings, saying that it was according to them that they wrote the Gospels, which are so full of errors and discrepancies, both in facts and in opinions, that they can be harmonized neither with themselves nor with one another. This is nothing else than to slander good men, and to bring the charge of dissension on the brotherhood of the disciples. In reading the Gospels, the clear intention of our heart perceives the errors, and, to avoid all injustice, we accept whatever is useful, in the way of building up our faith, and promoting the glory of the Lord Christ, and of the Almighty God, His Father, while we reject the rest as unbecoming the majesty of God and Christ, and inconsistent with our belief.

3. To return to what I said of your not accepting everything in the Old Testament. You do not admit carnal circumcision, though that is what is written;(1) nor resting from all occupation on the Sabbath, though that is enjoined;(2) and instead of propitiating God, as Moses recommends, by offerings and sacrifices, you cast these things aside as utterly out of keeping with Christian worship, and as having nothing at all to recommend them. In some cases, however, you make a division, and while you accept one part, you reject the other. Thus, in the Passover, which is also the annual feast of the Old Testament, while it is written that in this observance you must slay a lamb to be eaten in the evening, and that you must abstain from leaven for seven days, and be content with unleavened bread and bitter herbs,(3) you accept the feast, but pay no attention to the rules for its observance. It is the same with the feast of Pentecost, or seven weeks, and the accompaniment of a certain kind and number of sacrifices which Moses enjoins:(4) you observe the feast, but you condemn the propitiatory rites, which are part of it, because they are not in harmony with Christianity. As regards the command to abstain from Gentile food, you are zealous believers in the uncleanness of things offered to idols, and of what has died of itself; but you are not so ready to believe the prohibition of swine's flesh, and hares, and conies, and mullets, and cuttle-fish, and all the fish that you have a relish for, although Moses pronounces them all unclean.

4. I do not suppose. that you will consent, or even listen, to such things as that a father-in-law should lie with his daughter-in-law, as Judah did; or a father with his daughters, like Lot; or prophets with harlots, like Hosea; or that a husband should sell his wife for a night to her lover, like Abraham; or that a man should marry two sisters, like Jacob; or that the rulers of the people and the men you consider as most inspired should keep their mistresses by hundreds and thousands; or, according to the provision made in Deuteronomy about wives, that the wife of one brother, if he dies without children, should marry the surviving brother, and that he should raise up seed from her instead of his brother; and that if the man refuses to do this, the fair plaintiff should bring her case before the elders, that the brother may be called and admonished to perform this religious duty; and that, if he persists in his refusal, he must not go unpunished, but the woman must loose his shoe from his right foot, and strike him in the face, and send him away, spat upon and accursed, to perpetuate the reproach in his family.(5) These, and such as these, are the examples and precepts of the Old Testament. If they are good, why do you not practise them? If they are bad, why do you not condemn the Old Testament, in which they are found? But if you think that these are spurious interpolations, that is precisely what we think of the New Testament. You have no right to claim from us an acknowledgment for the New Testament which you yourselves do not make for the Old.

5. Since you hold to the divine authorship of the Old as well as of the New Testament, it would surely be more consistent and more becoming, as you do not obey its precepts, to confess that it has been corrupted by improper additions, than to treat it so contemptuously, if it is genuine and uncorrupted. Accordingly, my explanation of your neglect of the requirements of the Old Testament has always been, and still is, that you are either wise enough to reject them as spurious, or that you have the boldness and irreverence to disregard them if they are true. At any rate, when you would oblige me to believe everything contained in the documents of the New Testament because I receive the Testament itself, you should consider that, though you profess to receive the Old Testament, you in your heart disbelieve many things in it. Thus, you do not admit as true or authoritative the declaration of the Old Testament, that every one that hangeth on a tree is accursed,(1) for this would apply to Jesus; or that every man is accursed who does not raise up seed in Israel,(2) for that would include all of both sexes devoted to God; or that whoever is not circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin will be cut off from among his people,(3) for that would apply to all Christians; or that whoever breaks the Sabbath must be stoned to death;(4) or that no mercy should be shown to the man who breaks a single precept of the Old Testament. If you really believe these things as certainly enjoined by God, you would, in the time of Christ, have been the first to assail Him, and you would now have no quarrel with the Jews, who, in persecuting Christ with heart and soul, acted in obedience to their own God.

6. I am aware that instead of boldly pronouncing these passages spurious, you make out that these things were required of the Jews till the coming of Jesus; and that now that He is come, according, as you say, to the predictions of this Old Testament, He Himself teaches what we should receive, and what we should set aside as obsolete. Whether the prophets predicted the coming of Jesus we shall see presently. Meanwhile, I need say no more than that if Jesus, after being predicted in the Old Testament, now subjects it to this sweeping criticism, and teaches us to receive a few things and to throw over many things, in the same way the Paraclete who is promised in the New Testament teaches us what part of it to receive, and what to reject; as Jesus Himself says in the Gospel, when promising the Paraclete, "He shall guide you into all truth, and shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance."(5) So then, with the help of the Paraclete, we may take the same liberties with the New Testament as Jesus enables you to take with the Old, unless you suppose that the Testament of the Son is of greater value than that of the Father, if it is really the Father's; so that while many parts of the one are to be condemned, the other must be exempted from all disapproval; and that, too, when we know, as I said before, that it was not written by Christ or by His apostles.

7. Hence, as you receive nothing in the Old Testament except the prophecies and the common precepts of practical morality, which we quoted above, while you set aside circumcision, and sacrifices, and the Sabbath and its observance, and the feast of unleavened bread, why should not we receive nothing in the New Testament but what we find said in honor and praise of the majesty of the Son, either by Himself or by His apostles, with the proviso, in the case of the apostles, that it was said by them after reaching perfection, and when no longer in unbelief; while we take no notice of the rest, which, if said at the time, was the utterance of ignorance or inexperience, or, if not, was added by crafty opponents with a malicious intention, or was stated by the writers without due consideration, and so handed down as authentic? Take as examples, the shameful birth of Jesus from a woman, His being circumcised like the Jews, His offering sacrifice like the Gentiles, His being baptized in a humiliating manner, His being led about by the devil in the wilderness, and His being tempted by him in the most distressing way. With these exceptions, besides whatever has been inserted under the pretence of being a quotation from the Old Testament, we believe the whole, especially the mystic nailing to the cross, emblematic of the wounds of the soul in its passion; as also the sound moral precepts of Jesus, and His parables, and the whole of His immortal discourse, which sets forth especially the distinction of the two natures, and therefore must undoubtedly be His. There is, then, no reason for your thinking it obligatory in me to believe all the contents of the Gospels; for you, as has been proved, take so dainty a sip from the Old Testament, that you hardly, so to speak, wet your lips with it.

8. AUGUSTIN replied: We give to the whole Old Testament Scriptures their due praise as true and divine; you impugn the Scriptures of the New Testament as having been tampered with and corrupted. Those things in the Old Testament which we do not observe we hold to have been suitable appointments for the time and the people of that dispensation, besides being symbolical to us of truths in which they have still a spiritual use, though the outward observance is abolished; and this opinion is proved to be the doctrine of the apostolic writings. You, on the other hand, find fault with everything in the New Testament which you do not receive, and assert that these passages were not spoken or written by Christ or His apostles. In these respects there is a manifest difference between us. When, therefore, you are asked why you do not receive all the contents of the New Testament, but, while you approve of some things, reject a great many in the very same books as false and spurious interpolations, you must not pretend to imitate us in the distinction which we make, reverently and in faith, but must give account of your own presumption.

9. If we are asked why we do not worship God as the Hebrew fathers of the Old Testament worshipped Him, we reply that God has taught us differently by the New Testament fathers, and yet in no opposition to the Old Testament, but as that Testament itself predicted. For it is thus foretold by the prophet: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant which I made with their fathers when I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt."(9) Thus it was foretold that that covenant would not continue, but that there would be a new one. And to the objection that we do not belong to the house of Israel or to the house of Judah, we answer according to the teaching of the apostle, who calls Christ the seed of Abraham, and says to us, as belonging to Christ's body, "Therefore ye are Abraham's seed."(2) Again, if we are asked why we regard that Testament as authoritative when we do not observe its ordinances, we find the answer to this also in the apostolic writings; for the apostle says, "Let no man judge you in meat or drink, or in respect of a holiday, or a new moon, or of Sabbaths, which are a shadow of things to come."(3) Here we learn both that we ought to read of these observances, and ackowledge them to be of divine institution, in order to preserve the memory of the prophecy, for they were shadows of things to come; and also that we need pay no regard to those who would judge us for not continuing the outward observance; as the apostle says elsewhere to the same purpose, "These things happened to them for an example; and they are written for our admonition, on whom the end of the ages are come."(4) So, when we read anything in the books of the Old Testament which we are not required to observe in the New Testament, or which is even forbidden, instead of finding fault with it, we should ask what it means; for the very discontinuance of the observance proves it to be, not condemned, but fulfilled. On this head we have already spoken repeatedly.

10. To take, for example, this requirement on which Faustus ignorantly grounds his charge against the Old Testament, that a man should take his brother's wife to raise up seed for his brother, to be called by his name; what does this prefigure, but that every preacher of the gospel should so labor in the Church as to raise up seed to his deceased brother, that is, Christ, who died for us, and that this seed should bear His name? Moreover, the apostle fulfills this requirement not now in the typical observance, but in the spiritual reality, when he reproves those of whom he says that he had begotten them in Christ Jesus by the gospel,(5) and points out to them their error in wishing to be of Paul. "Was Paul," he says, "crucified for you? Or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?"(6) As if he should say, I have begotten you for my deceased brother; your name is Christian, not Paulian. Then, too, whoever refuses the ministry of the gospel when chosen by the Church, justly deserves the contempt of the Church. So we see that the spitting in the face is accompanied with a sign of reproach in loosing a shoe from one foot, to exclude the man from the company of those to whom the apostle says, "Let your feet be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;"(9) and of whom the prophet thus speaks "How beautiful are the feet of them who publish peace, who bring good tidings of good!"(8) The man who holds the faith of the gospel so as both to profit himself and to be ready when called to serve the Church, is properly represented as shod on both feet. But the man who thinks it enough to secure his own safety by believing, and shirks the duty of benefiting others, has the reproach of being unshod, not in type, but in reality.

11. Faustus needlessly objects to our observance of the passover, taunting us with differing from the Jewish observance: for in the gospel we have the true Lamb, not in shadow, but in substance; and instead of prefiguring the death, we commemorate it daily, and especially in the yearly festival. Thus also the day of our paschal feast does not correspond with the Jewish observance, for we take in the Lord's day, on which Christ rose. And as to the feast of unleavened bread, all Christians sound in the faith keep it, not in the leaven of the old life, that is, of wickedness, but in the truth and sincerity of the faith; not for seven days, but always, as was typified by the number seven, for days are always counted by sevens. And if this observance is somewhat difficult in this world since the way which leads to life is strait and narrow,(2) the future reward is sure; and this difficulty is typified in the bitter herbs, which are a little distasteful.

12. The Pentecost, too, we observe, that is, the fiftieth day from the passion and resurrection of the Lord, for on that day He sent to us the Holy Paraclete whom He had promised; as was prefigured in the Jewish passover, for on the fiftieth day after the slaying of the lamb, Moses on the mount received the law written with the finger of God.(3) If you read the Gospel, you will see that the Spirit is there called the finger of God.(4) Remarkable events which happened on certain days are annually commemorated in the Church, that the recurrence of this festival may preserve the recollection of things so important and salutary. If you ask, then, why we keep the passover, it is because Christ was then sacrificed for us. If you ask why we do not retain the Jewish ceremonies, it is because they prefigured future realities which we commemorate as past; and the difference between the future and the past is seen in the different words we use for them. Of this we have already said enough.

13. Again, if you ask why, of all the kinds of food prohibited in the former typical dispensation, we abstain only from food offered to idols and from what dies of itself, you shall hear, if for once you will prefer the truth to idle calumnies. The reason why it is not expedient for a Christian to eat food offered to idols is given by the apostle: "I would not," he says, "that ye should have fellowship with demons." Not that he finds fault with sacrifice itself, as offered by the fathers to typify the blood of the sacrifice with which Christ has redeemed us. For he first says, "The things which the Gentiles offer, they offer to demons, and not to God;" and then adds these words: "I would not that ye should have fellowship with demons."(5) If the uncleanness were in the nature of sacrificial flesh. it would necessarily pollute even when eaten in ignorance. But the reason for not partaking knowingly is not in the nature of the food, but, for conscience sake, not to seem to have fellowship with demons. As regards what dies of itself, I suppose the reason why such food was prohibited was that the flesh of animals which have died of themselves is diseased, and is not likely to be wholesome, which is the chief thing in food. The observance of pouring out the blood which was enjoined in ancient times upon Noah himself after the deluge,(6) the meaning of which we have already explained, is thought by many to be what is meant in the Acts of the Apostles, where we read that the Gentiles were required to abstain from fornication, and from things sacrificed, and from blood,(7) that is, from flesh of which the blood has not been poured out. Others give a different meaning to the words, and think that to abstain from blood means not to be polluted with the crime of murder. It would take too long to settle this question, and it is not necessary. For, allowing that the apostles did on that occasion require Christians to abstain from the blood of animals, and not to eat of things strangled, they seem to me to have consulted the time in choosing an easy observance that could not be burdensome to any one, and which the Gentiles might have in common with the Israelities, for the sake of the Corner-stone, who makes both one in Himself;(8) while at the same time they would be reminded how the Church of all nations was prefigured by the ark of Noah, when God gave this command,- -a type which began to be fulfilled in the time of the apostles by the accession of the Gentiles to the faith. But since the close of that period during which the two walls of the circumcision and the uncircumcision, although united in the Corner-stone, still retained some distinctive peculiarities, and now that the Church has become so entirely Gentile that none who are Outwardly Israelites are to be found in it, no Christian feels bound to abstain from thrushes or small birds because their blood has not been poured out, or from hares because they are killed by a stroke on the neck without shedding their blood. Any who still are afraid to touch these things are laughed at by the rest: so general is the conviction of the truth, that "not what entereth into the mouth defileth you, but what cometh out of it;"(9) that evil lies in the commission of sin, and not in the nature of any food in ordinary use.

14. As regards the deeds of the ancients, both those which seem sinful to foolish and ignorant people, when they are not so, and those which really are sinful, we have already explained why they have been written, and how this rather adds to than impairs the dignity of Scripture. So, too, about the curse on him who hangeth on a tree, and on him who raises not up seed in Israel, our reply has already been given in the proper place, when meeting Faustus' objections.(1) And in reply to all objections whatsoever, whether we have already answered them separately, or whether they are contained in the remarks of Faustus which we are now considering, we appeal to our established principles, on which we maintain the authority of sacred Scripture. The principle is this, that all things written in the books of the Old Testament are to be received with approval and admiration, as most true and most profitable to eternal life; and that those precepts which are no longer observed outwardly are to be understood as having been most suitable in those times, and are to be viewed as having been shadows of things to come, of which we may now perceive the fulfillments. Accordingly, whoever in those times neglected the observance of these symbolical precepts was righteously condemned to suffer the punishment required by the divine statute, as any one would be now if he were impiously to profane the sacraments of the New Testament, which differ from the old observances only as this time differs from that. For as praise is due to the righteous men of old who refused not to die for the Old Testament sacraments, so it is due to the martyrs of the New Testament. And as a sick man should not find fault with the medical treatment, because one thing is prescribed to-day and another to-morrow, and what was at first required is afterwards forbidden, since the method of cure depends on this; so the human race, sick and sore as it is from Adam to the end of the world, as long as the corrupted body weighs down the mind,(2) should not find fault with the divine prescriptions, if sometimes the same observances are enjoined, and sometimes an old observance is exchanged for one of a different kind; especially as there was a promise of a change in the appointments.

15. Hence there is no force in the analogy which Faustus institutes between Christ's pointing out to us what to believe and what to reject in the Old Testament, in which He Himself is predicted, and the Paraclete's doing the same to you as regards the New Testament, where there is a similar prediction of Him. There might have been some plausibility in this, had there been anything in the Old Testament which we denounced as a mistake, or as not of divine authority, or as untrue. We do nothing of the kind; we receive everything, both what we observe as rules of conduct, and what we no longer observe, but still recognize as having been prophetical observances, once enjoined and now fulfilled. And besides, the promise of the Paraclete is found in those books, all the contents of which you do not accept; and His mission is recorded in the book which you shrink from even naming. For, as is stated above, and has been said repeatedly, there is a distinct narrative in the Acts of the Apostles of the mission of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and the effect produced showed who it was. For all who first received Him spoke with tongues;(3) and in this sign there was a promise that in all tongues, or in all nations, the Church of after times would faithfully proclaim the doctrine of the Spirit as well as of the Father and of the Son.

16. Why, then, do you not accept everything in the New Testament? Is it because the books have not the authority of Christ's apostles, or because the apostles taught what was wrong? You reply that the books have not the authority of the apostles. That the apostles were wrong in their teaching is what Pagans say. But what can you say to prove that the publication of these books cannot be traced to the apostles? You reply that in many things they contradict themselves and one another. Nothing could be more untrue; the fact is, you do not understand. In every case where Faustus has brought forward what you think a discrepancy, we have shown that there was none; and we will do the same in every other case. It is intolerable that the reader or learner should dare to lay the blame on Scriptures of such high authority, instead of confessing his own stupidity. Did the Paraclete teach you that these writings are not of the apostles' authorship, but written by others under their names? But where is the proof that it was the Paraclete from whom you learned this? If you say that the Paraclete was promised and sent by Christ, we reply that your Paraclete was neither promised nor sent by Christ; and we also show you when He sent the Paraclete whom He promised. What proof have you that Christ sent your Paraclete? Where do you get the evidence in support of your informant, or rather misinformant? You reply that you find the proof in the Gospel. In what Gospel? You do not accept all the Gospel, and you say that it has been tampered with. Will you first accuse your witness of corruption, and then call for his evidence? To believe him when you wish it, and then disbelieve him when you wish it, is to believe nobody but yourself. If we were prepared to believe you, there would be no need of a witness at all. Moreover, in the promise of the Holy Spirit as the Paraclete, it is said, "He shall lead you into all truth;"(1) but how can you be led into all truth by one who teaches you that Christ was a deceiver? And again, if you were to prove that all that is said in the Gospel of the promise of the Paraclete could apply to no one but Manichaeus, as the predictions of the prophets are applicable to Christ; and if you quoted passages from those manuscripts which you say are genuine, we might say that on this very point, as proving Manichaeus to be the only person intended, the passages have been altered in the interest of your sect. Your only answer to this would be, that you could not possibly alter documents already in the possession of all Christians; for at the very outset of such an attempt, it would be met by an appeal to older copies. But if this proves that the books could not be corrupted by you, it also proves that they could not be corrupted by any one. The first person who ventured to do such a thing would be convicted by a comparison of older manuscripts; especially as the Scripture is to be found not in one language only, but in many. As it is, false readings are sometimes corrected by comparing older copies or the original language. Hence you must either acknowledge these documents as genuine, and then your heresy cannot stand a moment; or if they are spurious, you cannot use their authority in support of your doctrine of the Paraclete, and so you refute yourselves.

17. Further, what is said in the promise of the Paraclete shows that it cannot possibly refer to Manichaeus, who came so many years after. For it is distinctly said by John, that the Holy Spirit was to come immediately after the resurrection and ascension of the Lord: "For the Spirit was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified."(2) Now, if the reason why the Spirit was not given was, that Jesus was not glorified, He would necessarily be given immediately on the glorification of Jesus. In the same way, the Cataphrygians(3) said that they had received the promised Paraclete; and so they fell away from the Catholic faith, forbidding what Paul allowed, and condemning second marriages, which he made lawful. They turned to their own use the words spoken of the Spirit, "He shall lead you into all truth," as if, forsooth, Paul and the other apostles had not taught all the truth, but had left room for the Paraclete of the Cataphrygians. The same meaning they forced from the words of Paul: "We know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away;"(4) making out that the apostle knew and prophesied in part, when he said, "Let him do what he will; if he marries. he sinneth not,"(5) and that this is done away by the perfection of the Phrygian Paraclete.(6) And if they are told that they are condemned by the authority of the Church, which is the subject of such ancient promises, and is spread all over the world, they reply that this is in exact fulfillment of what is said of the Paraclete, that the world cannot receive Him.(7) And are not those passages, "He shall lead you into all truth," and, "When that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall be done away," and, "The world cannot receive Him," precisely those in which you find a prediction of Manichaeus? And so every heresy arising under the name of the Paraclete will have the boldness to make an equally plausible application to itself of such texts. For there is no heresy but will call itself the truth; and the prouder it is, the more likely it will be to call itself perfect truth: and so it will profess to lead into all truth; and since that which is perfect has come by it, it will try to do away with the doctrine of the apostles, to which its own errors are opposed. And as the Church holds by the earnest admonition of the apostle, that "whoever preaches another gospel to you than that which ye have received, let him be accursed;"(8) when the heretical preacher begins to be pronounced accursed by all the world, will he not forthwith exclaim, This is what is written, "The world cannot receive Him"?

18. Where, then, will you find the proof required to show that it is from the Paraclete that you have learned that the Gospels were not written by the apostles? On the other hand, we have proof that the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete, came immediately after the glorification of Jesus. For "He was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified." We have proof also that He leads into all truth, for the only way to truth is by love, and "the love of God,': says the apostle, "is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost who is given unto us."(9) We show, too, that in the words, "when that which is perfect is come," Paul spoke of the perfection in the enjoyment of eternal life. For in the same place he says: "Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face."(10) You cannot reasonably maintain that we see God face to face here. Therefore that which is perfect has not come to you. It is thus clear what the apostle thought on this subject. This perfection will not come to the saints till the accomplishment of what John speaks of: "Now we are the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when it shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is."(1) Then we shall be led into all truth by the Holy Spirit, of which we have now received the pledge. Again, the words, "The world cannot receive Him," plainly point to those who are usually called the world in Scripture--the lovers of the world, the wicked, or carnal; of whom the apostle says: "The natural man perceiveth not the things which are of the Spirit of God."(2) Those are said to be of this world who can understand nothing beyond material things, which are the objects of sense in this world; as is the case with you, when, in your admiration of the sun and moon, you suppose all divine things to resemble them. Deceivers. and being deceived, you call the author of this silly theory the Paraclete. But as you have no proof of his being the Paraclete, you have no reliable ground for the statement that the Gospel writings, which you receive only in part, are not of apostolic authorship. Thus your only remaining argument is, that these writings contain things disparaging to the glory of Christ; such as, that He was born of a virgin, that He was circumcised, that the customary sacrifice was offered for Him, that He was baptized, that He was tempted of the devil.

19. With those exceptions, including also the testimonies quoted from the Old Testament, you profess, to use the words of Faustus, to receive all the rest, especially the mystic nailing to the cross, emblematic of the wounds of the soul in its passion; as also the sound moral precepts of Jesus, and the whole of His immortal discourse, which sets forth especially the distinction of the two natures, and therefore must undoubtedly be His. Your design clearly is to deprive Scripture of all authority, and to make every man's mind the judge what passage of Scripture he is to approve of, and what to disapprove of. This is not to be subject to Scripture in matters of faith, but to make

Scripture subject to you. Instead of making the high authority of Scripture the reason of approval, every man makes his approval the reason for thinking a passage correct. If, then, you discard authority, to what, poor feeble soul, darkened by the mists of carnality, to what, I beseech you, will you betake yourself? Set aside authority, and let us hear the reason of your beliefs. Is it by a logical process that your long story about the nature of God concludes necessarily with this startling announcement, that this nature is subject to injury and corruption? And how do you know that there are eight continents and ten heavens, and that Atlas bears up the world, and that it hangs from the great world-holder, and innumerable things of the same kind? Who is your authority? Manichaeus, of course, you will say. But, unhappy being, this is not sight, but faith. If, then, you submit to receive a load of endless fictions at the bidding of an obscure and irrational authority, so that you believe all those things because they are written in the books which your misguided judgment pronounces trustworthy, though there is no evidence of their truth, why not rather submit to the authority of the Gospel, which is so well founded, so confirmed, so generally acknowledged and admired, and which has an unbroken series of testimonies from the apostles down to our own day, that so you may have an intelligent belief, and may come to know that all your objections are the fruit of folly and perversity; and that there is more truth in the opinion that the unchangeable nature of God should take part of mortality, so as, without injury to itself from this union, to do and to suffer not feignedly, but really, whatever it behoved the mortal nature to do and to suffer for the salvation of the human race from which it was taken, than in the belief that the nature of God is subject to injury and corruption, and that, after suffering pollution and captivity, it cannot be wholly freed and purified, but is condemned by a supreme divine necessity to eternal punishment in the mass of darkness?

20. You say, in reply, that you believe in what Manichaeus has not proved, because he has so clearly proved the existence of two natures, good and evil, in this world. But here is the very source of your unhappy delusion; for as in the Gospels, so in the world, your idea of what is evil is derived entirely from the effect on your senses of such disagreeable things as serpents, fire, poison, and so on; and the only good you know of is what has an agreeable effect on your senses, as pleasant flavors, and sweet smells, and sunlight, and whatever else recommends itself strongly to your eyes, or your nostrils, or your palate, or any other organ of sensation. But had you begun with looking on the book of nature as the production of the Creator of all, and had you believed that your own finite understanding might be at fault wherever anything seemed to be amiss, instead of venturing to find fault with the works of God, you would not have been led into these impious follies and blasphemous fancies with which, in your ignorance of what evil really is, you heap all evils upon God.

21. We can now answer the question, how we know that these books were written by the apostles. In a word, we know this in the same way that you know that the books whose authority you are so deluded as to prefer were written by Manichaeus. For, suppose some one should raise a question on this point, and should contend, in arguing with you, that the books which you attribute to Manichaeus are not of his authorship; your only reply would be, to ridicule the absurdity of thus gratuitously calling in question a matter confirmed by successive testimonies of such wide extent. As, then, it is certain that these books are the production of Manichaeus, and as it is ridiculous in one born so many years after to start objections of his own, and so raise a discussion on the point; with equal certainty may we pronounce it absurd, or rather pitiable, in Manichaeus or his followers to bring such objections against writings originally well authenticated, and carefully handed down from the times of the apostles to our own day through a constant succession of custodians.

22. We have now only to compare the authority of Manichaeus with that of the apostles. The genuineness of the writings is equally certain in both cases. But no one will compare Manichaeus to the apostles, unless he ceases to be a follower of Christ, who sent the apostles. Who that did not misunderstand Christ's words ever found in them the doctrine of two natures opposed to one another, and having each its own principle? Again, the apostles, as becomes the disciples of truth, declare the birth and passion of Christ to have been real events; while Manichaeus, who boasts that he leads into all truth, would lead us to a Christ whose very passion he declares to have been an illusion. The apostles say that Christ was circumcised in the flesh which He took of the seed of Abraham; Manichaeus says that God, in his own nature, was cut in pieces by the race of darkness. The apostles say that a sacrifice was offered for Christ as an infant in our nature, according to the institutions of the time; Manichaeus, that a member, not of humanity, but of the divine substance itself, must be sacrificed to the whole host of demons by being introduced into the nature of the hostile race. The apostles say that Christ, to set us an example, was baptized in the Jordan; Manichaeus, that God immersed himself in the pollution of darkness, and that he will never wholly emerge, but that the part which cannot be purified will be condemned to eternal punishment. The apostles say that Christ, in our nature, was tempted by the chief of the demons; Manichaeus, that part of God was taken captive by the race of demons. And in the temptation of Christ He resists the tempter; while in the captivity of God, the part taken captive cannot be restored to its origin even after victory. To conclude, Manichaeus, under the guise of an improvement, preaches another gospel, which is the doctrine of devils; and the apostles, after the doctrine of Christ, enjoin that whoever preaches another gospel shall be accursed.(1)

BOOK XXXIII.

FAUSTUS DOES NOT THINK IT WOULD BE A GREAT HONOR TO SIT DOWN WITH ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB, WHOSE MORAL CHARACTERS AS SET FORTH IN THE OLD TESTAMENT HE DETESTS. HE JUSTIFIES HIS SUBJECTIVE CRITICISM OF SCRIPTURE. AUGUSTIN SUMS UP THE ARGUMENT, CLAIMS THE VICTORY, AND EXHORTS THE MANICHAEANS TO ABANDON THEIR OPPOSITION TO THE OLD TESTAMENT NOTWITHSTANDING THE DIFFICULTIES THAT IT PRESENTS, AND TO RECOGNIZE THE AUTHORITY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

1. FAUSTUS said: You quote from the Gospel the words, "Many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven,"(1) and ask why we do not acknowledge the patriarchs. Now, we should be the last to grudge to any human being that God should have compassion on him, and bring him out of perdition to salvation. At the same time, we should acknowledge in such a case the clemency shown in this act of compassion, and not the merit of the person whose life is undeniably blameworthy. Thus, in the case of the Jewish fathers, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, who are mentioned by Christ in this verse, supposing it to be genuine, although they led wicked lives, as we may learn from their descendant Moses, or whoever was the author of the history called Genesis, which describes their conduct as having been most shocking and detestable we are ready to allow that they may, after all, be in the kingdom of heaven, in the place which they neither believed in, nor hoped for, as is plain enough from their books. But then it must be kept in mind that, as you yourselves confess, if they did attain to what is spoken of in this verse, it was something very different from the nether dungeons of woe to which their own deserts consigned them, and that their deliverance was the work of our Lord Christ, and the result of His mystic passion. Who would grudge to the thief on the cross that deliverance was granted to him by the same Lord, and that Christ said that on that very day he should be with Him in the paradise of His Father?(1) Who is so hard-hearted as to disapprove of this act of benevolence? Still, it does not follow that, because Jesus pardoned a thief, we must approve of the habits and practices of thieves; any more than of the publicans and harlots, whose faults Jesus pardoned, declaring that they would go into the kingdom of heaven before those who behaved proudly.(2) For, when He acquitted the woman accused by the Jews as sinful, and as having been caught in adultery, He told her to sin no more.(3) If, then, He has done something of the same kind in the case of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, all the praise is His; for such actions towards souls are becoming in Him who maketh His sun to rise upon the evil and upon the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.(4) One thing perplexes me in your doctrine: why you limit your statements to the fathers of the Jews, and are not of opinion that the Gentile patriarchs had also a share in this grace of our Redeemer; especially as the Christian Church consists of their children more than of the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. You will say that the Gentiles worshipped idols, and the Jews the Almighty God, and that therefore Jesus had regard only to the Jews. It would seem from this that the worship of the Almighty God is the sure way to hell, and that the Son must come to the aid of the worshipper of the Father. That is as you please. For my part, I am ready to join you in the belief that the fathers reached heaven, not by any merit of their own, but by that divine mercy which is stronger than sin.

2. However, there is a difficulty in deciding as regards this verse too, whether the words were really spoken to Christ, for there is a discrepancy in the narratives. For while two evangelists, Matthew and Luke, both alike tell of the centurion whose servant was sick, and to whom these words of Jesus are supposed to have applied, that He had not seen so great faith, no, not in Israel, as in this man, though a Gentile and a Pagan, because he said that he was not worthy that Jesus should come under his roof, but wished Him only to speak the word, and his servant should be healed; Matthew alone adds that Jesus went on to say, "Verily I say unto you, that many shall come from the east and from the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven; but the children of the kingdom shall be cast into outer darkness." By the many who should come are meant the Pagans, on account of the centurion, in whom, although he was a Gentile, so great faith was found; and the children of the kingdom are the Jews, in whom there was no faith found. Luke, again, though he too mentions the occurrence in his Gospel as part of the narrative of the miracles of Christ, says nothing of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. If it is said that he omitted it because it had been already said by Matthew, why does he tell the story at all of the centurion and his servant, since that, too, has the advantage of being recorded at length in Matthew's ingenious narrative? But the passage is corrupt. For, in describing the centurion's application to Jesus, Matthew says that he came himself to ask for a cure; while Luke says he did not, but sent elders of the Jews, and that they, in case Jesus should despise the centurion as a Gentile (for they will have Jesus to be a thorough Jew), set about persuading Him, by saying that he was worthy for whom He should do this, because he loved their nation, and had built them a synagogue;(5) here again taking for granted that the Son of God was concerned in a pagan centurion having thought it proper to build a synagogue for the Jews. The words in question are, indeed, found in Luke also, perhaps because on reflection he thought they might be genuine; but they are found in another place, and in a connection altogether different. The passage is where Jesus says to His disciples, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many shall come seeking to enter in, and shall not be able. When once the Master of the house has entered in, and has shut to the door, ye shall begin to stand without, and to knock, saying Lord, open to us. And He shall answer and say, I know you not. Then ye shall begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in Thy presence, and Thou hast taught in our streets and synagogues; but He shall say unto you, I know not whence ye are; depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, entering into the kingdom of God, and you yourselves cast out. And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God."(1) The part where it is said that many shall be shut out of the kingdom of God, who have only borne the name of Christ, without doing His works, is not left out by Matthew; but he makes no mention here of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. In the same way, Luke mentions the centurion and his servant, without alluding in that connection to Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. Since it is uncertain when the words were spoken, we are at liberty to doubt whether they were spoken at all.

3. It is not without reason that we bring a critical judgment to the study of Scriptures where there are such discrepancies and contradictions. By thus examining everything, and comparing one passage with another, we determine which contains Christ's actual words, and what may or may not be genuine. For your predecessors have made many interpolations in the words of our Lord, which thus appear under His name, while they disagree with His doctrine. Besides, as we have proved again and again, the writings are not the production of Christ or of His apostles, but a compilation of rumors and beliefs, made, long after their departure, by some obscure semi-Jews, not in harmony even with one another, and published by them under the name of the apostles, or of those considered the followers of the apostles, so as to give the appearance of apostolic authority to all these blunders and falsehoods. But whatever you make of that, as regards this verse, I repeat that I do not insist on rejecting it. It is enough for my position, that, as I said before, and as you are obliged to confess, before the coming of our Lord all the patriarchs and prophets of Israel lay in infernal darkness for their sins. Even though they may have been restored to light and liberty by Christ, that has nothing to do with the hateful character of their lives. We hate and eschew not their persons, but their characters; not as they are now, when they are purified, but as they were, when impure. So, whatever you think of this verse, it does not affect us: for if it is genuine, it only illustrates Christ's goodness and compassion; and if it is spurious, those who wrote it are to blame. Our cause is as safe as it always is.

4. AUGUSTIN replied: Poor safety, indeed! when you contradict yourself by hating the patriarchs as impure, at the same time that you grieve for your impure god. You allow that, since the advent of the Saviour, the patriarchs have had purity restored, and have enjoyed the rest of the blessed; while your god, even after the Saviour's advent, still lies in darkness, is still sunk in the ocean of iniquity, still wallows in the mire of all uncleanness. These men, therefore, were not only better than your god in their lives, but also happier in their death. Where was the abode of the just who departed from this life before Christ's coming in the flesh, and whether their condition also was improved by the passion of Christ, in whom they had believed as to come, and to suffer, and to rise again, and had, moreover, foretold this in suitable language under the guidance of the Spirit of prophecy, is to be discovered from the Holy Scriptures, if any clear discovery in this matter is possible; we are not called on to adopt the crude notions of all and sundry, still less the heretical opinions of men who have gone astray into such egregious error. There is a vain attempt here on the part of Faustus to introduce by a side-door the idea that we may obtain something after this life besides the due reward of our conduct in this life. It will be better for you to abandon your error while you are still alive, and to embrace and hold the truths of the Catholic faith. Otherwise the expectations of the unrighteous will be sadly disappointed when God begins to fulfill His threatenings to the unrighteous.

5. I have already given what I considered a sufficient answer to Faustus' calumnies of the lives of the patriarchs. That they were punished at their death, or that they were justified after the Lord's passion, is not what we learn from His commendation of them, when He admonished the Jews that, if they were Abraham's children, they should do the works of Abraham, and said that Abraham desired to see His day, and was glad when he saw it;(2) and that it was into his bosom, that is, some deep recess of blissful repose, that the angels carried the poor sufferer who was despised by the proud rich man.(1) And what are we to make of the Apostle Paul? Is there any idea of justification after death in his praise of Abraham, when he says that before he was circumcised he believed God, and that it was counted to him for righteousness?(2) And so much importance does he attach to this, that the single ground which he specifies for our becoming Abraham's children, though not descended from him in the flesh, is, that we follow the footsteps of his faith.

6. You are so hardened in your errors against the testimonies of Scripture, that nothing can be made of you; for whenever anything is quoted against you, you have the boldness to say that it is written not by the apostle, but by some pretender under his name. The doctrine of demons which you preach is so opposed to Christian doctrine, that you could not continue, as professing Christians, to maintain it, unless you denied the truth of the apostolic writings. How can you thus do injury to your own souls? Where will you find any authority, if not in the Gospel and apostolic writings? How can we be sure of the authorship of any book, if we doubt the apostolic origin of those books which are attributed to the apostles by the Church which the apostles themselves rounded, and which occupies so conspicuous a place in all lands, and if at the same time we acknowledge as the undoubted production of the apostles what is brought forward by heretics in opposition to the Church, whose authors, from whom they derive their name, lived long after the apostles? And do we not see in profane literature that there are well-known authors under whose names many things have been published after their time which have been rejected, either from inconsistency with their ascertained writings, or from their not having been known in the lifetime of the authors, so as to be banded down with the confirmatory statement of the authors themselves, or of their friends? To give a single example, were not some books published lately under the name of the distinguished physician Hippocrates, which were not received as authoritative by physicians? And this decision remained unaltered in spite of some similarity in style and matter: for, when compared to the genuine writings of Hippocrates, these books were found to be inferior; besides that they were not recognized as his at the time when his authorship of his genuine productions was ascertained. Those books, again, from a comparison with which the productions of questionable origin were rejected, are with certainty attributed to Hippocrates; and any one who denies their authorship is answered only by ridicule, simply because there is a succession of testimonies to the books from the time of Hippocrates to the present day, which makes it unreasonable either now or hereafter to have any doubt on the subject. How do we know the authorship of the works of Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Varro, and other similar writers, but by the unbroken chain of evidence? So also with the numerous commentaries on the ecclesiastical books, which have no canonical authority, and yet show a desire of usefulness and a spirit of inquiry. How is the authorship ascertained in each case, except by the author's having brought his work into public notice as much as possible in his own lifetime. and, by the transmission of the information from one to another in continuous order, the belief becoming more certain as it becomes more general, up to our own day; so that, when we are questioned as to the authorship of any book, we have no difficulty in answering? But why speak of old books? Take the books now before us: should any one, after some years, deny that this book was written by me, or that Faustus' was written by him, where is evidence for the fact to be found but in the information possessed by some at the present time, and transmitted by them through successive generations even to distant times? From all this it follows, that no one who has not yielded to the malicious and deceitful suggestions of lying devils, can be so blinded by passion as to deny the ability of the Church of the apostles--a community of brethren as numerous as they were faithful--to transmit their writings unaltered to posterity, as the original seats of the apostles have been occupied by a continuous succession of bishops to the present day, especially when we are accustomed to see this happen in the case of ordinary writings both in the Church and out of it.

7. But Faustus finds contradictions in the Gospels. Say, rather, that Faustus reads the Gospels in a wrong spirit, that he is too foolish to understand, and too blind to see. If you were animated with piety instead of being misled by party spirit, you might easily, by examining these passages, discover a wonderful and most instructive harmony among the writers. Who, in reading two narratives of the same event, would think of charging one or both of the authors with error or falsehood, because one omits what the other mentions, or one tells concisely, but with substantial agreement, what the other relates in detail, so as to indicate not only what was done, but also how it was done? This is what Faustus does in his attempt to impeach the truth of the Gospels; as if Luke's omitting some saying of Christ recorded in Matthew implied a denial on the part of Luke of Matthew's statement. There is no real difficulty in the case; and to make a difficulty shows want of thought, or of the ability to think. There is, indeed, a point in the narrative of the centurion which is discussed among believers, and on which objections are raised by unbelievers of no great learning, who prove their quarrelsomeness, when, after being instructed, they do not give up their errors. The point is, that Matthew says that the centurion came to Jesus "beseeching Him, and saying;" while Luke says that he sent to Jesus the elders of the Jews with this same request, that He would heal his servant who was sick; and that when He came near the house he sent others, through whom he said that he was not worthy that Jesus should come into his house, and that he was not worthy to come himself to Jesus. How, then, do we read in Matthew, "He came to Him, beseeching Him, and saying, My servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, and grievously tormented?"(1) The explanation is, that Matthew's narrative is correct, but brief, mentioning the centurion's coming to Jesus, without saying whether he came himself or by others, or whether the words about his servant were spoken by himself or through others. But is it not common to speak of a person as coming near to a thing, although he may not reach it? And even the word reach, which is the strongest form of expression, is frequently used in cases where the person spoken of acts through others, as when we say he took his case to court, he reached the presence of the judge; or, again, he reached the presence of some man in power, although it may probably have been through his friends, and the person may not have seen him whose presence he is said to have reached. And from the word for to reach we give the name of Perventors to those who by ambitious arts gain access, either personally or through friends, to the, so to speak, inaccessible minds of the great. Are we, then, in reading to forget the common usage of speech? Or must the sacred Scripture have a language of its own? The cavils of forward critics are thus met by a reference to the usual forms of speech.

8. Those who examine this matter not in a disputatious but in a calm believing spirit are invited to come to Jesus, not outwardly but in heart, not in bodily presence but in the power of faith, as the centurion did, and then they will better understand Matthew's narrative. To such it is said in the Psalm "Come unto Him, and be enlightened; and your faces shall not be ashamed."(2) Hence we learn that the centurion, whose faith was so highly spoken of, came to Christ more truly than the people who carried his message. We find an analogous case in the woman with the issue of blood, who was healed by touching the hem of Christ's garment. when Christ said, "Some one hath touched me." The disciples wondered what Christ meant by saying, "Who hath touched me?" "Some one hath touched me," when the crowd was thronging Him. In fact, they made this reply: "The crowd throngeth Thee, and sayest Thou, Who hath touched me?"(3) Now, as the people thronged Christ while the woman touched Him, so the messengers were sent to Christ, but the centurion really came to Him. In Matthew we have a not infrequent form of expression, and at the same time a symbolical import; while in Luke there is a simple narrative of the whole event, such as to draw our attention to the manner in which Matthew has recorded it. I wish one of those people who found their silly objections to the Gospels on such trifling difficulties would himself tell a story twice over, honestly giving a true account of what happened, and that his words were written down and read over to him. We should then see whether he would not say more or less at one time than at another; and whether the order would not be changed, not only of words, but of things; and whether he would not put some opinion of his own into the mouth of another, because, though he never heard him say it, he knew it perfectly well to be in his mind; and whether he would not sometimes put in a few words what he had before related at length. In these and other ways, which might perhaps be reduced to rule, the narratives of the same thing by two persons, or two narratives by the same person, might differ in many things without being opposed, might be unlike without being contradictory. Thus are undone all the bandages with which poor Manichaeans stifle themselves to keep in the spirit of error, and to keep out all that might lead to their salvation.

9. Now that all Faustus' calumnies have been refuted, those at least on the subjects here treated of at large and explained fully as the Lord has enabled me, I close with a word of counsel to you who are implicated in those shocking and damnable errors, that, if you acknowledge the supreme authority of Scripture, you should recognise that authority which from the time of Christ Himself, through the ministry of His apostles, and through a regular succession of bishops in the seats of the apostles, has been preserved to our own day throughout the whole world, with a reputation known to all. There the Old Testament too has its difficulties solved, and its predictions fulfilled. If you ask for demonstration, consider first what you are, how unfit for comprehending the nature of your own soul, not to speak of God; I mean an intelligent comprehension, such as you profess to desire, or to have once desired, and not the notions of a credulous fancy. Admitting this incompetency, which must continue while you remain as you are, you may at least be referred to the natural conviction of every human mind, unless it is corrupted by error, of the perfect unchangeableness and incorruptibility of the nature and substance of God. Admit this, or believe it, and you will no longer be Manichaeans, so that in course of time you may become Catholics.

[DE NATURA BONI CONTRA MANICHAEOS.]
c. A.D. 405.

[Written after the year 404. It is put in the Retractations immediately after the De Actis cure Felice Manichaeo, which was written about the end of the year 404. It is one of the most argumentative of the Anti-Manichaean treatises, and so one of the most abstruse and difficult. The lines of argument here pursued have already been employed in part in the earlier treatises. The most interesting portions of the contents of the treatise, and the most damaging to the Manichaeans, are the long extracts from Mani's Thesaurus, and his Fundamental Epistle.-- A. H. N.]

CHAP. 1.--GOD THE HIGHEST AND UNCHANGEABLE GOOD, FROM WHOM ARE

ALL OTHER GOOD THINGS, SPIRITUAL AND CORPOREAL.

THE highest good, than which there is no higher, is God, and consequently He is unchangeable good, hence truly eternal and truly immortal. All other good things are only from Him, not of Him. For what is of Him, is Himself. And consequently if He alone is unchangeable, all things that He has made, because He has made them out of nothing, are changeable. For He is so omnipotent, that even out of nothing, that is out of what is absolutely non-existent, He is able to make good things both great and small, both celestial and terrestrial, both spiritual and corporeal. But because He is also just, He has not put those things that He has made out of nothing on an equality with that which He begat out of Himself. Because, therefore, no good things whether great or small, through whatever gradations of things, can exist except from God; but since every nature, so far as it is nature, is good, it follows that no nature can exist save from the most high and true God: because all things even not in the highest degree good, but related to the highest good, and again, because all good things, even those of most recent origin, which are far from the highest good, can have their existence only from the highest good. Therefore every spirit, though subject to change, and every corporeal entity, is from God, and all this, having been made, is nature. For every nature is either spirit or body. Unchangeable spirit is God, changeable spirit, having been made, is nature, but is better than body; but body is not spirit, unless when the wind, because it is invisible to us and yet its power is felt as something not inconsiderable, is in a certain sense called spirit.

CHAP. 2.--HOW THIS MAY SUFFICE FOR CORRECTING THE MANICHAEANS.

But for the sake of those who, not being able to understand that all nature, that is, every spirit and every body, is naturally good, are moved by the iniquity of spirit and the mortality of body, and on this account endeavor to bring in another nature of wicked spirit and mortal body, which God did not make, we determine thus to bring to their understanding what we say can be brought. For they acknowledge that no good thing can exist save from the highest and true God, which also is true and suffices for correcting them, if they are willing to give heed.

CHAP. 3.--MEASURE, FORM, AND ORDER, GENERIC GOODS IN THINGS MADE BY GOD.

For we Catholic Christians worship God, from whom are all good things whether great or small; from whom is all measure great or small; from whom is all form great or small; from whom is all order great or small. For all things in proportion as they are better measured, formed, and ordered, are assuredly good in a higher degree; but in proportion as they are measured, formed, and ordered in an inferior degree, are they the less good. These three things, therefore, measure, form, and order,--not to speak of innumerable other things that are shown to pertain to these three,--these three things, therefore, measure, form, order, are as it were generic goods in things made by God, whether in spirit or in body. God is, therefore, above every measure of the creature, above every form, above every order, nor is He above by local spaces, but by ineffable and singular potency, from whom is every measure, every form, every order. These three things, where they are great, are great goods, where they are small, are small goods; where they are absent, there is no good. And again where these things are great, there are great natures, where they are small, there are small natures, where they are absent, there is no nature. Therefore all nature is good.

CHAP. 4.--EVIL IS CORRUPTION OF MEASURE, FORM, OR ORDER,

When accordingly it is inquired, whence is evil, it must first be inquired, what is evil, which is nothing else than corruption, either of the measure, or the form, or the order, that belong to nature. Nature therefore which has been corrupted, is called evil, for assuredly when incorrupt it is good; but even when corrupt, so far as it is nature it is good, so far as it is corrupted it is evil.

CHAP. 5.--THE CORRUPTED NATURE OF A MORE EXCELLENT ORDER SOMETIMES BETTER THAN AN INFERIOR NATURE EVEN UNCORRUPTED.

But it may happen, that a certain nature which has been ranked as more excellent by reason of natural measure and form, though corrupt, is even yet better than another incorrupt which has been ranked lower by reason of an inferior natural measure and form: as in the estimation of men, according to the quality which presents itself to view, corrupt gold is assuredly better than incorrupt silver, and corrupt silver than incorrupt lead; so also in more powerful spiritual natures a rational spirit even corrupted through an evil will is better than an irrational though incorrupt, and better is any spirit whatever even corrupt than any body whatever though incorrupt. For better is a nature which, when it is present in a body, furnishes it with life, than that to which life is furnished. But however corrupt may be the spirit of life that has been made, it can furnish life to a body, and hence, though corrupt, it is better than the body though incorrupt.

CHAP. 6.--NATURE WHICH CANNOT BE CORRUPTED IS THE HIGHEST GOOD;

THAT WHICH CAN, IS SOME GOOD.

But if corruption take away all measure, all form, all order from corruptible things, no nature will remain. And consequently every nature which cannot be corrupted is the highest good, as is God. But every nature that can be corrupted is also itself some good; for corruption cannot injure it, except by taking away from or diminishing that which is good.

CHAP. 7.--THE CORRUPTION OF RATIONAL SPIRITS IS ON THE ONE HAND VOLUNTARY, ON THE OTHER PENAL.

But to the most excellent creatures, that is, to rational spirits, God has offered this, that if they will not they cannot be corrupted; that is, if they should maintain obedience under the Lord their God, so should they adhere to his incorruptible beauty; but if they do not will to maintain obedience, since willingly they are corrupted in sins, unwillingly they shall be corrupted in punishment, since God is such a good that it is well for no one who deserts Him, and among the things made by God the rational nature is so great a good, that there is no good by which it may be blessed except God. Sinners, therefore, are ordained to punishment; which ordination is punishment for the reason that it is not conformable to their nature, but it is justice because it is conformable to their fault.

CHAP. 8.--FROM THE CORRUPTION AND DESTRUCTION OF INFERIOR THINGS IS THE BEAUTY OF THE UNIVERSE.

But the rest of things that are made of nothing, which are assuredly inferior to the rational soul, can be neither blessed nor miserable. But because in proportion to their fashion and appearance are things themselves good, nor could there be good things in a less or the least degree except from God, they are so ordered that the more infirm yield to the firmer, the weaker to the stronger, the more impotent to the more powerful; and so earthly things harmonize with celestial, as being subject to the things that are pre-eminent. But to things falling away, and succeeding, a certain temporal beauty in its kind belongs, so that neither those things that die, or cease to be what they were, degrade or disturb the fashion and appearance and order of the universal creation; as a speech well composed is assuredly beautiful, although in. it syllables and all sounds rush past as it were in being born and in dying.

CHAP. 9.--PUNISHMENT IS CONSTITUTED FOR THE SINNING NATURE THAT IT MAY BE RIGHTLY ORDERED.

What sort of punishment, and how great, is due to each fault, belongs to Divine judgment, not to human; which punishment assuredly when it is remitted in the case of the converted, there is great goodness on the part of God, and when it is deservedly inflicted, there is no injustice on the part of God; because nature is better ordered by justly smarting under punishment than by rejoicing with impunity in sin; which nature nevertheless, even thus having some measure, form, and order, in whatever extremity there is as yet some good, which things, if they were absolutely taken away, and utterly consumed, there will be accordingly no good, because no nature will remain.

CHAP. 10.--NATURES CORRUPTIBLE, BECAUSE MADE OF NOTHING.

All corruptible natures therefore are natures at all only so far as they are from God, nor would they be 'corruptible if' they were of Him; because they would be what He himself is. Therefore of whatever measure, of whatever form, of whatever order, they are, they are so because it is God by whom they were made; but they are not immutable, because it is nothing of which they were made. For it is sacrilegious audacity to make nothing and God equal, as when we wish to make what has been born of God such as what has been made by Him out of nothing.

CHAP. 11.--GOD CANNOT SUFFER HARM, NOR CAN ANY OTHER NATURE EXCEPT BY HIS PERMISSION.

Wherefore neither can God's nature suffer harm, nor can any nature under God suffer harm unjustly: for when by sinning unjustly some do harm, an unjust will is imputed to them; but the power by which they are permitted to do harm is from God alone, who knows, while they themselves are ignorant, what they ought to suffer, whom He permits them to harm.

CHAP. 12.--ALL GOOD THINGS ARE FROM GOD ALONE.

All these things are so perspicuous, so assured, that if they who introduce another nature which God did not make, were willing to give attention, they would not be filled with so great blasphemies, as that they should place so great good things in supreme evil, and so great evil things in God. For what the truth compels them to acknowledge, namely, that all good things are from God alone, suffices for their correction, if they were willing to give heed, as I said above. Not, therefore, are great good things from one, and small good things from another; but good things great and small are from the supremely good alone, which is God.

CHAP. 13.--INDIVIDUAL GOOD THINGS, WHETHER SMALL OR GREAT, ARE FROM GOD.

Let us, therefore, bring before our minds good things however great, which it is fitting that we attribute to God as their author, and these having been eliminated let us see whether any nature will remain. All life both great and small, all power great and small, all safety great and small, all memory great and small, all virtue great and small, all intellect great and small, all tranquillity great and small, all plenty great and small, all sensation great and small, all light great and small, all suavity(1) great and small, all measure great and small, all beauty great and small, all peace great and small, and whatever other like things may occur, especially such as are found throughout all things, whether spiritual or corporeal, every measure, every form, every order both great and small, are from the Lord God. All which good things whoever should wish to abuse, pays the penalty by divine judgment; but where none of these things shall have been present at all, no nature will remain.

CHAP. 14.--SMALL GOOD THINGS IN COMPARISON WITH GREATER ARE CALLED BY CONTRARY NAMES.

But in all these things, whatever are small are called by contrary names in comparison with greater things; as in the form of a man because the beauty is greater, the beauty of the ape in comparison with it is called deformity. And the imprudent are deceived, as if the former is good, and the latter evil, nor do they regard in the body of the ape its own fashion, the equality of members on both sides, the agreement of parts, the protection of safety, and other things which it would be tedious to enumerate.

CHAP. 15.--IN THE BODY OF THE APE THE GOOD OF BEAUTY IS PRESENT, THOUGH IN A LESS DEGREE.

But that what we have said may be understood, and may satisfy those too slow of comprehension, or that even the pertinacious and those repugnant to the most manifest truth may be compelled to confess what is true, let them be asked, whether corruption can harm the body of an ape? But if it can, so that it may become more hideous, what diminishes but the good of beauty? Whence as long as the nature of the body subsists, so long something will remain. If, accordingly, good having been consumed, nature is consumed, the nature is therefore good. So also we say that slow is contrary to swift, but yet he who does not move at all cannot even be called slow. So we say that a heavy voice is contrary to a sharp voice, or a harsh to a musical; but if you completely remove any kind of voice, there is silence where there is no voice, which silence, nevertheless, for the simple reason that there is no voice, is usually opposed to voice as something contrary thereto. So also lucid and obscure are called as it were two contrary things, yet even obscure things have something of light, which being absolutely wanting, darkness is the absence of light in the same way in which silence is the absence of voice.

CHAP. 16.--PRIVATIONS IN THINGS ARE FIT-TINGLY ORDERED BY GOD.

Yet even these privations of things are so ordered in the universe of nature, that to those wisely considering they not unfittingly have their vicissitudes. For by not illuminating certain places and times, God has also made the darkness as fittingly as the day. For if we by restraining the voice fittingly interpose silence in speaking, how much more does He, as the perfect framer of all things, fittingly make privations of things? Whence also in the hymn of the three children, light and darkness alike praise God,(1) that is, bring forth praise in the hearts of those who well consider.

CHAP. 17.--NATURE, IN AS FAR AS IT IS NATURE, NO EVIL.

No nature, therefore, as far as it is nature, is evil; but to each nature there is no evil except to be diminished in respect of good. But if by being diminished it should be consumed so that there is no good, no nature would be left; not only such as the Manichaeans introduce, where so great good things are found that their exceeding blindness is wonderful, but such as any one can introduce.

CHAP. 18.--HYLE, WHICH WAS CALLED BY THE ANCIENTS THE FORMLESS MATERIAL OF THINGS, IS NOT AN EVIL.

For neither is that material, which the ancients called Hyle, to be called an evil. I do not say that which Manichaeus with most senseless vanity, not knowing what he says, denominates Hyle, namely, the former of corporeal beings; whence it is rightly said to him, that he introduces another god. For nobody can form and create corporeal beings but God alone; for neither are they created unless there subsist with them measure, form, and order, which I think that now even they themselves confess to be good things, and things that cannot be except from God. But by Hyle I mean a certain material absolutely formless and without quality, whence those qualities that we perceive are formed, as the ancients said. For hence also wood is called in Greek ulh, because it is adapted to workmen, not that itself may make anything, but that it is the material of which something may be made. Nor is that Hyle, therefore, to be called an evil which cannot be perceived through any appearance, but can scarcely be thought of through any sort of privation of appearance. For this has also a capacity of forms; for if it cannot receive the form imposed by the workman, neither assuredly may it be called material. Hence if form is some good, whence those who excel in it are called beautiful,(2) as from appearance they are called handsome,(3) even the capacity of form is undoubtedly something good. As because wisdom is a good, no one doubts that to be capable of wisdom is a good. And because every good is from God, no one ought to doubt that even matter, if there is any, has its existence from God alone.

CHAP. 19.--TO HAVE TRUE EXISTENCE IS AN EXCLUSIVE PREROGATIVE OF GOD.

Magnificently and divinely, therefore, our God said to his servant: "I am that I am," and "Thou shalt say to the children of Israel. He who is sent me to you."(1) For He truly is because He is unchangeable. For every change makes what was not, to be: therefore He truly is, who is unchangeable; but all other things that were made by Him have received being form Him each in its own measure. To Him who is highest, therefore nothing can be contrary, save what is not; and consequently as from Him everything that is good has its being, so from Him is everything that by nature exists; since everything that exists by nature is good. Thus every nature is good, and everything good is from God; therefore every nature is from God.

CHAP. 20.--PAIN ONLY IN GOOD NATURES.

But pain which some suppose to be in an especial manner an evil, whether it be in mind or in body, cannot exist except in good natures. For the very fact of resistance in any being leading to pain, involves a refusal not to be what it was, because it was something good; but when a being is compelled to something better, the pain is useful, when to something worse, it is useless. Therefore in the case of the mind, the will resisting a greater power causes pain; in the case of the body, sensation resisting a more powerful body causes pain. But evils without pain are worse: for it is worse to rejoice iniquity than to bewail corruption; yet even such rejoicing cannot exist save from the attainment of inferior good things. But iniquity is the desertion of better things. Likewise in a body, a wound with pain is better than painless putrescence, which is especially called the corruption which the dead flesh of the Lord did not see, that is, did not suffer, as was predicted in prophecy: "Thou shall not suffer Thy Holy one to see corruption."(2) For who denies that He was wounded by the piercing of the nails, and that He was stabbed with the lance?(3) But even what is properly called by men corporeal corruption, that is, putrescence itself, if as yet there is anything left to consume, increases by the diminution of the good. But if corruption shall have absolutely consumed it, so that there is no good, no nature will remain, for there will be nothing that corruption may corrupt; and so there will not even be putrescence, for there will be nowhere at all for it to be.

CHAP. 21.--FROM MEASURE THINGS ARE SAID

TO BE MODERATE-SIZED.(4)

Therefore now by common usage things small and mean are said to have measure, because some measure remains in them, without which they would no longer be moderate-sized, but would not exist at all. But those things that by reason of too much progress are called immoderate, are blamed for very excessiveness; but yet it is necessary that those things themselves be restrained in some manner under God who has disposed all things in extension, number, and weight.(5)

CHAP. 22.--MEASURE IN SOME SENSE IS SUITABLE TO GOD HIMSELF.

But God cannot be said to have measure, lest He should seem to be spoken of as limited. Yet He is not immoderate by whom measure is bestowed upon all things, so that they may in any measure exist. Nor again ought God to be called measured, as if He received measure from any one. But if we say that He is the highest measure, by chance we say something; if indeed in speaking of the highest measure we mean the highest good. For every measure in so far as it is a measure is good; whence nothing can be called measured, modest, modified, without praise, although in another sense we use measure for limit, and speak of no measure where there is no limit, which is sometimes said with praise as when it is said: "And of His kingdom there shall be no limit."(6) For it might also be said, "There shall be no measure," so that measure might be used in the sense of limit; for He who reigns in no measure, assuredly does not reign at all.

CHAP. 23.--WHENCE A BAD MEASURE, A BAD FORM, A BAD ORDER MAY SOMETIMES BE SPOKEN OF.

Therefore a bad measure, a bad form, a bad order, are either so called because they are less than they should be, or because they are not adapted to those things to which they should be adapted; so that they may be called bad as being alien and incongruous; as if any one should be said not to have done in a good measure because he has done less than he ought, or because he has done in such a thing as he ought not to have done, or more than was fitting, or not conveniently; so that the very fact of that being reprehended which is done in a bad measure, is justly reprehended for no other cause than that the measure is not there maintained. Likewise a form is called bad either in comparison with something more handsome or more beautiful, this form being less, that greater, not in size but in comeliness; or because it is out of harmony with the thing to which it is applied, so that it seems alien and unsuitable. As if a man should walk forth into a public place naked, which nakedness does not offend if seen in a bath. Likewise also order is called bad when order itself is maintained in an inferior degree. Hence not order, but rather disorder, is bad; since either the ordering is less than it should be, or not as it should be. Yet where there is any measure, any form, any order, there is some good and some nature; but where there is no measure, no form, no order, there is no good, no nature.

CHAP. 24.--IT IS PROVED BY THE TESTIMONIES OF SCRIPTURE THAT GOD IS UNCHANGEABLE. THE SON OF GOD BEGOTTEN, NOT MADE.

Those things which our faith holds and which reason in whatever way has traced out, are fortified by the testimonies of the divine Scriptures, so that those who by reason of feebler intellect are not able to comprehend these things, may believe the divine authority, and so may deserve to know. But let not those who understand, but are less instructed in ecclesiastical literature, suppose that we set forth these things from our own intellect rather than what are in those Books. Accordingly, that God is unchangeable is written in the Psalms: "Thou shalt change them and they shall be changed; but Thou thyself art the same."(1) And in the book of Wisdom, concerning wisdom: "Remaining in herself, she renews all things."(2) Whence also the Apostle Paul: "To the invisible, incorruptible, only God."(3) And the Apostle James: "Every best giving and every perfect gift is from above, descending from the Father of light, with whom there is no changeableness, neither obscuring of influence."(4) Likewise because what He begat of Himself is what He Himself is, it is said in brief by the Son Himself: "I and the Father are one."(5) But because the Son was not made, since through Him were all things made, thus it is written "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word; this was in the beginning with God. All things were made through Him, and without Him was made nothing;"(6) that is, without Him was not anything made.

CHAP. 25.--THIS LAST EXPRESSION MISUNDERSTOOD BY SOME.

For no attention should be paid to the ravings of men who think that nothing should be understood to mean something, and moreover think to compel any one to vanity of this kind on the ground that nothing is placed at the end of the sentence. Therefore, they say, it was made, and because it was made, nothing is itself something. They have lost their senses by zeal in contradicting, and do not understand that it makes no difference whether it be said: "Without Him was made nothing," or "without Him nothing was made." For even if the order were the last mentioned, they could nevertheless say, that nothing is itself something because it was made. For in the case of what is in truth something, what difference does it make if it be said "Without him a house was made," so long as it is understood that something was made without him, which something is a house? So also because it is said: "Without Him was made nothing," since nothing is assuredly not anything, when it is truly and properly spoken, it makes no difference whether it be said: "Without Him was made nothing or Without Him nothing was made," or "nothing was made." But who cares to speak with men who can say of this very expression of mine "It makes no difference," "Therefore it makes some difference, for nothing itself is something?" But those whose brains are not addled, see it as a thing most manifest that this something is to be understood when it says "It makes no difference," as when I say "It matters in no respect." But these, if they should say to any one, "What hast thou done?" and he should reply that he has done nothing, would, according to this mode of disputation, falsely accuse him saying, "Thou hast done something, therefore, because thou hast done nothing; for nothing is itself something." But they have also the Lord Himself placing this word at the end of a sentence, when He says: "And in secret have I spoken nothing."(7) Let them read, therefore, and be silent.(8)

CHAP. 26.--THAT CREATURES ARE MADE OF NOTHING.

Because therefore God made all things which He did not beget of Himself, not of those things that already existed, but of those things that did not exist at all, that is, of nothing," the Apostle Paul says: "Who calls the things that are not as if they are."(9) But still more plainly it is written in the book of Maccabees: "I pray thee, son, look at the heaven and the earth and all the things that are in them; see and know that it was not these of which the Lord God made us."(1) And from this that is written in the Psalm: "He spake, and they were made."(2) It is manifest. that not of Himself He begat these things, but that He made them by word and command. But what is not of Himself is assuredly of nothing. For there was not anything of which he should make them, concerning which the apostle says most openly: "For from Him, and through Him, and in Him are all things."(3)

CHAP. 27.--"FROM HIM" AND "OF HIM" DO NOT MEAN THE SAME THING.

But "from Him" does not mean the same as "of Him."(4) For what is of Him may be said to be from Him; but not everything that is from Him is rightly said to be of Him. For from Him are heaven and earth, because He made them; but not of Him because they are not of His substance. As in the case of a man who begets a son and makes a house, from himself is the son, from himself is the house, but the son is of him, the house is of earth and wood. But this is so, because as a man he cannot make something even of nothing; but God of whom are all things, through whom are all things, in whom are all things, had no need of any material which He had not made to assist His omnipotence.

CHAP. 28.--SIN NOT FROM GOD, BUT FROM THE WILL OF THOSE SINNING.

But when we hear: "All things are from Him, and through Him, and in Him," we ought assuredly to understand all natures which naturally exist. For sins, which do not preserve but vitiate nature, are not from Him; which sins, Holy Scripture in many ways testifies, are from the will of those sinning, especially in the passage where the apostle says: "But dost thou suppose this, O man, that judgest those who do such things, and doest them, that thou shall escape the judgment of God? Or dost thou despise the riches of His goodness, and patience, and long- suffering, not knowing that the patience of God leadeth thee to repentance? But according to the hardness of thy heart and thy impenitent heart, thou treasurest up for thyself wrath against the day of wrath and of the revelation of the just judgment of God, who will render unto every one according to his works."(5)

CHAP. 29.--THAT GOD IS NOT DEFILED BY OUR SINS.

And yet, though all things that He established are in Him, those who sin do not defile Him, of whose wisdom it is said: "She touches all things by reason of her purity, and nothing defiled assails her."(6) For it behooves us to believe that as God is incorruptible and unchangeable, so also is He consequently undefilable.

CHAP. 30.--THAT GOOD THINGS, EVEN THE LEAST, AND THOSE THAT ARE EARTHLY, ARE BY GOD.

But that God made even the least things, that is, earthly and mortal things, must undoubtedly be understood from that passage of the apostle, where, speaking of the members of our flesh: "For if one member is glorified, all the members rejoice with it, and if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it;" also this he then says: "God has placed the members each one of them in the body as he willed;" and "God has tempered the body, giving to that to which it was wanting greater honor, that there should be no schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care one for another."(7) But what the apostle thus praises in the measure and form and order of the members of the flesh, you find in the flesh of all animals, alike the greatest and the least; for all flesh is among earthly goods, and consequently is esteemed among the least.

CHAP. 31.--TO PUNISH AND TO FORGIVE SINS BELONG EQUALLY TO GOD.

Likewise because it belongs to divine judgment, not human, what sort of punishment and how great is due to every. fault, it is thus written: "O the height of the riches of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! how inscrutable are His judgments and his ways past finding out!"(8) Likewise because by the goodness of God sins are forgiven to the converted, the very fact that Christ was sent sufficiently shows, who not in His own nature as God, but in our nature, which He assumed from a woman, died for us; which goodness of God with reference to us, and which love of God, the apostle thus sets forth: "But God commendeth His love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us; much more now being justified in His blood we shall be saved from wrath through Him. For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son, much more being reconciled we shall be saved in His life."(1) But because even when due punishment is rendered to sinners, there is no unrighteousness on God's part, he thus says: "What shall we say? Is God unrighteous who visiteth with wrath?"(2) But in one place he has briefly admonished that goodness and severity are alike from Him, saying: "Thou sceNt then the goodness and severity of God; toward them that have fallen, severity, but towards thee goodness, if thou shouldst continue in goodness.(3)

CHAP. 32.--FROM GOD ALSO IS THE VERY POWER TO BE HURTFUL.

Likewise because the power even of those that are hurtful is from God alone, thus it stands written, Wisdom speaking: "Through me kings reign and tyrants hold the land through me."(4) The apostle also says: "For there is no power but of God."(5) But that it is worthily done is written in the book of Job: "Who maketh to reign a man that is a hypocrite. on account of the perversity of the people."(6) And concerning the people of Israel God says: "I gave them a king in my wrath."(7) For it is not unrighteous, that the wicked receiving the power of being hurtful, both the patience of the good should be proved and the iniquity of the evil punished. For through power given to the Devil both Job was proved so that he might appear righteous,(8) and Peter was tempted lest he should be presumptuous,(9) and Paul was buffeted lest he should be exalted,(10) and Judas was damned so that he should hang himself.(11) When, therefore, through the power which He has given the Devil, God Himself shall have done all things righteously, nevertheless punishment shall at last be rendered to the Devil not for these things justly done, but for the unrighteous willing to be hurtful, which belonged to himself, when it shall be said to the impious who persevered in consenting to his wickedness, "Go ye into everlasting fire which my God has prepared for the Devil and his angels."(12)

CHAP. 33.--THAT EVIL ANGELS HAVE BEEN MADE EVIL, NOT BY GOD, BUT BY SINNING.

But because evil angels also were not constituted evil by God, but were made evil by sinning, Peter in his epistle says: "For if God spared not angels when they sinned, but casting them down into the dungeons of smoky hell, He delivered them to be reserved for punishment in judgment."(13) Hence Peter shows that there is still due to them the penalty of the last judgment, concerning which the Lord says: "Go ye into everlasting fire, which has been prepared for the Devil and his angels." Although they have already penally received this hell, that is, an inferior smoky air as a prison, which nevertheless since it is also called heaven, is not that heaven in which there are stars, but this lower heaven by the smoke of which the clouds are conglobulated, and where the birds fly; for both a cloudy heaven is spoken of, and flying things are called heavenly. As when the Apostle Paul calls those evil angels, against whom as enemies by living piously we contend, "spiritual things of wickedness in heavenly places."(14) That this may not be understood of the upper heavens, he plainly says elsewhere: "According to the presence of the prince of this air, who now worketh in the sons of disobedience."(15)

CHAP. 34.--THAT SIN IS NOT THE STRIVING FOR AN EVIL NATURE, BUT THE DESERTION OF A BETTER.

Likewise because sin, or unrighteousness, is not the striving after evil nature but the desertion of better, it is thus found written in the Scriptures: "Every creature of God is good."(16) And accordingly every tree also which God planted in Paradise is assuredly good. Man did not therefore strive after an evil nature when he touched the forbidden tree; but by deserting what was better, he committed an evil deed. Since the Creator is better than any creature which He has made, His command should not have been deserted, that the thing forbidden, however good, might be touched; since the better having been deserted, the good of the creature was striven for, which was touched contrary to the command of the Creator. God did not plant an evil tree in Paradise; but He Himself was better who prohibited its being touched.

CHAP. 35.--THE TREE WAS FORBIDDEN TO ADAM NOT BECAUSE IT WAS EVIL, BUT BECAUSE IT WAS GOOD FOR MAN TO BE SUBJECT TO GOD.

For besides, He had made the prohibition, in order to show that the nature of the rational soul ought not to be in its own power, but in subjection to God, and that it guards the order of its salvation through obedience, corrupting it through disobedience. Hence also He called the tree, the touching of which He forbade, the tree "of the knowledge of good and evil;"(1) because when man should have touched it in the face of the prohibition, he would experience the penalty of sin, and so would know the difference between the good of obedience, and the evil of disobedience.

CHAP. 36.--NO CREATURE OF GOD IS EVIL, BUT TO ABUSE A CREATURE OF GOD IS EVIL.

For who is so foolish as to think a creature of God, especially one planted in Paradise, blameworthy; when indeed not even thorns and thistles, which the earth brought forth, according to the judiciary judgment of God, for wearing out the sinner in labor, should be blamed? For even such herbs have their measure and form and order, which whoever considers soberly will find praiseworthy; but they are evil to that nature which ought thus to be restrained as a recompense for sin. Therefore, as I have said, sin is not the striving after an evil nature, but the desertion of a better, and so the deed itself is evil, not the nature which the sinner uses amiss. For it is evil to use amiss that which is good. Whence the apostle reproves certain ones as condemned by divine judgment, "Who have worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator."(2) He does not reprove the creature, which he who should do would act injuriously towards the Creator, but those who, deserting the better, have used amiss the good.

CHAP. 37.--GOD MAKES GOOD USE OF THE EVIL DEEDS OF SINNERS.

Accordingly, if all natures should guard their own proper measure and form and order, there would be no evil: but if any one should wish to misuse these good things, not even thus does he vanquish the will of God, who knows how to order righteously even the unrighteous; so that if they themselves through the iniquity of their will should misuse His good things, He through the righteousness of His power may use their evil deeds, tightly ordaining to punishment those who have perversely ordained themselves to sins.

CHAP 38.--ETERNAL FIRE TORTURING THE WICKED, NOT EVIL.

For neither is eternal fire itself, which is to torture the impious, an evil nature, since it has its measure, its form and its order depraved by no iniquity; but it is an evil torture for the damned, to whose sins it is due. For neither is yonder light, because it tortures the blear-eyed, an evil nature.

CHAP. 39.--FIRE IS CALLED ETERNAL, NOT AS GOD IS, BUT BECAUSE WITHOUT END.

without beginning; but God is also without beginning. Then, although it may be employed perpetually for the punishment of sinners, yet it is mutable nature. But that is true eternity which is true immortality, that is that highest immutability, which cannot be changed at all. For it is one thing not to suffer change, when change is possible, and another thing to be absolutely incapable of change. Therefore, just as man is called good, yet not as God, of whom it was said, "There is none good save God alone;"(3) and just as the soul is called immortal, yet not as God, of whom it was said, "Who alone hath immortality;"(4) and just as a man is called wise, yet not as God, of whom it was said, "To God the only wise;"(5) so fire is called eternal, yet not as God, whose alone is immortality itself and true eternity.

CHAP. 40.--NEITHER CAN GOD SUFFER HURT, NOR ANY OTHER, SAVE BY THE JUST ORDINATION OF GOD.

Since these things are so, according to the Catholic faith, and wholesome doctrine, and truth perspicuous to those of good understanding, neither can any one hurt the nature of God, nor can the nature of God unrighteously hurt any one, or suffer any one to do hurt with impunity. "For he that doeth hurt shall receive," says the apostle, "according to the hurt that he has done; and there is no accepting of persons with God."(6)

But if the Manichaeans were willing, without pernicious zeal for defending their error, and with the fear of God, to think, they would not most criminally blaspheme by supposing two natures, the one good, which they call God, the other evil, which God did not make: so erring, so delirious, nay so insane, are they that they do not see, that even in what they call the nature of supreme evil they place so great good things: life, power safety, memory, intellect, temperance, virtue, plenty, sense, light, suavity, extensions, numbers, peace, measure, form, order; but in what they call supreme good, so many evil things: death, sickness, forgetfulness, foolishness, confusion, impotence, need, stolidity, blindness, pain, unrighteousness, disgrace, war, intemperance, deformity, perversity. For they say that the princes of darkness also have been alive in their own nature, and in their own kingdom were safe, and remembered and understood. For they say that the Prince of Darkness harangued in such a manner, that neither could he have said such things, nor could he have been heard by those by whom he was said to have been heard, without memory and understanding; and to have had a temper suitable to his mind and body, and to have ruled by virtue of power, and to have had abundance and fruitfulness with respect; to his elements, and they are said to have perceived themselves mutually and the light as near at hand, and to have had eyes by which they could see the light afar off; which eyes assuredly could not have seen the light without some light (whence also they are rightly called light); and they are said to have enjoyed exceedingly the sweetness of their pleasures, and to have been determined by measured members and dwelling-places. But unless there had been some sort of beauty there, they would not have loved their wives, nor would their bodies have been steady by adaptation of parts; without which, those things could not have been done there which the Manichaeans insanely say were done. And unless some peace had been there, they would not have obeyed their Prince. Unless measure had been there, they would have done nothing else than eat or drink, or rage, or whatever they might have done, without any society: although not even those that did these things would have had determinate forms, unless measure had been there. But now the Manichaeans say that they did such things that they cannot be denied to have had in all their actions measures suitable to themselves. But if form had not been there, no natural quality would have there subsisted. But if there had been no order there, some would not have ruled, others been ruled; they would not have lived harmoniously in their element; in fine, they would not have that the Manichaeans vainly fable. But if they say that God's nature does not die, what according to their vanity does Christ raise from the dead? If they say that it does not grow sick, what does He cure? If they say that it is not subject to forgetfulness, what does He remind? If they say that it is not deficient in wisdom, what does He teach? If they say that it is not confused, what does He restore? If they say that it was not vanquished and taken captive, what does He liberate? If they say that it was not in need, to what does He minister aid? If they say that it did not lose feeling, what does He animate? If they say that it has not been blinded,what does He illuminate? If it is not in pain, to what does He give relief? If it is not unrighteous, what does He correct through precepts? If it is not in disgrace, what does He cleanse? If it is not in war, to what does He promise peace? If it is not deficient in moderation, upon what does He impose the measure of law? If it is not deformed, what does He reform? If it is not attributed not to that thing which was made by God, and which has become depraved by its own free choice in sinning, but to the very nature, yea to the very substance of God, which is what God Himself is.

CHAP. 42. ---MANICHAEAN BLASPHEMIES CONCERNING THE NATURE OF GOD.

What can be compared to those blasphemies? Absolutely nothing, unless the errors of other sectaries be considered; but if that error be compared with itself in another aspect, of which we have not yet spoken, it will be convicted of far worse and more execrable blasphemy. For they say that some souls, which they will have to be of the substance of God and of absolutely the same nature, which have not sinned of their own accord, but have been overcome and oppressed by the race of darkness, which they call evil, for combating which they descended not of their own accord, but at the command of the Father, are lettered forever in the horrible sphere of darkness. So according to their sacrilegious vaporings, God liberated Himself in a certain part from a great evil, but again condemned Himself in another part, which He could not liberate, and triumphed over the enemy itself as if it had been vanquished from above. O criminal, incredible audacity, to believe, to speak, to proclaim such things about God! Which when they endeavor to defend, that with their eyes shut they may rush headlong into yet worse things, they say that the commingling of the evil nature does these things, in order that the good nature of God may suffer so great evils: for that this good nature were lauded as incorruptible, because it does not hurt itself, and not because it cannot suffer hurt from another. Then if the nature of God hurt the nature of darkness, and the nature of God, there are therefore two evil things which hurt each other in turn, and the race of darkness was the better disposed, because if it committed hurt it did it unwillingly; for it did not wish to commit hurt, but to enjoy the good which belonged to God. But God wished to extinguish it, as Manichaeus most openly raves forth in his epistle of the ruinous Foundation. For forgetting that he had shortly before said: "But His most resplendent realms were so founded upon the shining and happy land, that they could never be either moved or shaken by any one;" he afterwards said: "But the Father of the most blessed light, knowing that great ruin and desolation which would arise from the darkness, threaten his holy worlds, unless he should send in opposition a deity excellent and renowned, mighty in strength, by whom he might at the same time overcome and destroy the race of darkness, which having been extinguished, the inhabitants of light would enjoy perpetual rest." Behold, he feared ruin and desolation that threatened his worlds! Assuredly they were so founded upon the shining and happy land that they never could be either moved or shaken by any one? Behold, from fear he wished to hurt the neighboring race, which he endeavored to destroy and extinguish, in order that the inhabitants of light might enjoy perpetual rest. Why did he not add, and perpetual bondage? Were not these souls that he fettered forever in the sphere of darkness, the inhabitants of light, of whom he says plainly, that "they have suffered themselves to err from their former bright nature?" when against his will he is compelled to say, that they sinned by free will, while he wishes to ascribe sin only to the necessity of the contrary nature: everywhere ignorant what to say, and as if he were himself already in the sphere of darkness which he invented, seeking, and not finding, how he may escape. But let him say what he will to the seduced and miserable men by whom he is honored far more highly than Christ, that at this price he may sell to them such long and sacrilegious fables. Let him say what he will, let him shut up, as it were, in a sphere, as in a prison, the race of darkness, and let him fasten outside the nature of light, to which he promised perpetual rest on the extinction of the enemy: behold, the penalty of light is worse than that of darkness; the penalty of the divine nature is worse than that of the adverse race. But since although the latter is in the midst of darkness it pertains to its nature to dwell in darkness; but souls which are the very same thing that God is, cannot be received, he says, into those peaceful realms, and are alienated from the life and liberty of the holy light, and are fettered in the aforesaid horrible sphere: whence he says, "Those souls shall adhere to the things that they have loved, having been left in the same sphere of darkness, bringing this upon themselves by their own deserts." Is not this assuredly flee voluntary choice? See how insanely he ignores what he says, and by making self-contradictory statements wages a worse war against himself than against the God of the race of darkness itself. Accordingly, if the souls of light are damned, because they loved darkness, the race of darkness, which loved light, is unjustly damned. And the race of darkness indeed loved light from the beginning, violently, it may be, but yet so as to wish for its possession, not its extinction: but the nature of light wished to extinguish in war the darkness; therefore when vanquished it loved darkness. Choose which you will: whether it was compelled by necessity to love darkness, or seduced by free will. If by necessity, wherefore is it damned? if by free will, wherefore is the nature of God involved in so great iniquity? If the nature of God was compelled by necessity to love darkness, it did not vanquish, but was vanquished: if by free will, why do the wretches hesitate any longer to attribute the will to sin to the nature which God made out of nothing, lest they should thereby attribute it to the light which He begat?

What if we should also show that before the commingling of evil, which stupid fable they have most madly believed, great evils were in what they call the nature of light? what will it scum possible to add to these blasphemies? For before the conflict, there was the hard and inevitable necessity of fighting: here is truly a great evil, before evil is commingled with good. Let them say whence this is, when as yet no commingling had taken place? But if there was no necessity, there was therefore free will: whence also this so great evil, that God himself should wish to hurt his own nature, which could not be hurt by the enemy, by sending it to be cruelly commingled, to be basely purged, to be unjustly damned? Behold, the great evil of a pernicious, noxious, and savage will, before any evil from the contrary nature was mingled with it! Or perchance he did not know that this would happen to his members, that they should love darkness and become hostile to holy light, as Manichaeus says, that is, not only to their own God, but also to the Father from whom they had their being? Whence therefore this so great evil of ignorance, before any evil from the nature of darkness was mingled with it? But if he knew that this would happen, either there was in him everlasting cruelty, if he did not grieve over the contamination and damnation of his own nature that was to take place, or everlasting misery, if he did so grieve: whence also this so great evil of your supreme good before any commingling with your supreme evil? Assuredly that part of the nature itself which was fettered in the eternal chain of that sphere, if it knew not that this fate awaited it, even so was there everlasting ignorance in the nature of God, but if it knew, then everlasting misery: whence this so great evil before any evil from the contrary nature was commingled? Or perchance did it, in the greatness of its love (charity), rejoice that through its punishment perpetual rest was prepared for the residue of the inhabitants of light? Let him who sees how abominable it is to say this, pronounce an anathema. But if this should be done so that at least the good nature itself should not become hostile to the light, it might be possible, perchance, not for the nature of God indeed, but for some man, as it were, to be regarded as praiseworthy, who for the sake of his country should be willing to suffer something of evil, which evil indeed could be only for a time, and not forever: but now also they speak of that fettering in the sphere of darkness as eternal, and not indeed of a certain thing but of the nature of God; and assuredly it were a most unrighteous, and execrable, and ineffably sacrilegious joy, if the nature of God rejoiced that it should love darkness, and should become hostile to holy light. Whence this so monstrous and abominable evil before any evil from the contrary nature was commingled? Who can endure insanity so perverse and so impious, as to attribute so great good things to supreme evil, and so great evils to supreme good, which is God?

CHAP. 44.--INCREDIBLE TURPITUDES IN GOD IMAGINED BY MANICHAEUS.

But now when they speak of that part of the nature of God as everywhere mixed up in heaven, in earth, in all bodies dry and moil, in all sorts of flesh, in all seeds of trees, herbs, men, and animals: not as present by the power of divinity, for administering and ruling all things, undefilably, inviolably, incorruptibly, without any connection with them, which we say of God; but fettered, oppressed, polluted, to be loosed and liberated, as they say, not only through the running to and fro of the sun and the moon, and through the powers of light, but also through their Elect: what sacrilegious and incredible turpitudes this kind of error recommends to them even if it does not induce them to accept, it is horrible to speak of. For they say that the powers of light are transformed into beautiful males and are set over against the women of the race of darkness; and that the same powers again are transformed into beautiful females and are set over against the males of the race of darkness; that through their beauty they enkindle the foulest lust of the princes of darkness, and in this manner vital substance, that is, the nature of God, which they say is held lettered in their bodies, having been loosed from their members relaxed through lust, flies away, and when it has been taken up or cleansed, is liberated. This the wretches read, this they say, this they hear, this they believe, this they put as follows, in the seventh book of their Thesaurus (for so they call a certain writing of Manichaeus, in which these blasphemies stand written): "Then the blessed Father, who has bright ships, little apartments, dwelling-places, or magnitudes, according to his in dwelling clemency, brings the help by which he is drawn out and liberated from the impious bonds, straits, and torments of his vital substance. And so by his own invisible nod he transforms those powers of his, which are held in this most brilliant ship, and makes them to bring forth adverse powers, which have been arranged in the various tracts of the heavens. Since these consist of both sexes, male and female, he orders the afore said powers to bring forth partly in the form of beardless youths, for the adverse race of females, partly in the form of bright maidens, for the contrary race of males: knowing that all these hostile powers on account of the deadly and most foul lust innate in them, are very easily taken captive, delivered up to these most beautiful forms which appear, and in this manner they are dissolved. But you may know that this same blessed Father of ours is identical with his powers, which for a necessary reason he transforms into the undefiled likeness of youths and maidens. But these he uses as his own arms, and through them he accomplishes his will. But there are bright ships full of these divine powers, which are stationed after the likeness of marriage over against the infernal races, and who with alacrity and ease effect at the very moment what they have planned. Therefore, when reason demands that these same holy powers should appear to males, straightway also they show by their dress the likeness of most beautiful maidens. Again when females are to be dealt with, putting aside the forms of maidens, they show the forms of beardless youths. But by this handsome appearance of theirs, ardor and lust increase, and in this way the chain of their worst thoughts is loosed, and the living soul which was held by their members, relaxed by this occasion escapes, and is mingled with its own most pure air; when the souls thoroughly cleansed ascend to the bright ships, which have been prepared for conveying them and for ferrying them over to their own country. But that which still bears the stains of the adverse race, descends little by little through billows and fires, and is mingled with trees and other plants and with all seeds, and is plunged into divers fires. And in what manner the figures of youths and maidens from that great and most glorious ship appear to the contrary powers which live in the heavens and have a fiery nature; and from that handsome appearance, par of the life which is held in their members having been released is conducted away through fires into the earth: in the same manner also, that most high power, which dwells in the ship of vital waters appears in the likeness of youths and holy maidens to those powers whose nature is cold and moist, and which are arranged in the heavens. And indeed to those that are females, among these the form of youths appears, but to the males, the form of maidens. By his changing and diversity of divine and most beautiful persons, the princes male and female of the moist and cold race are loosed, and what is vital in them escapes; but whatever should remain, having been relaxed, is conducted into the earth through cold, and is mingled with all the races of darkness" Who can endure this? Who can believe, not indeed that it is true, but that it could even be said? Behold those who fear to anathematize Manichaeus teaching these things, and do not fear to believe in a God doing them and suffering them!

CHAP. 45.--CERTAIN UNSPEAKABLE TURPITUDES BELIEVED, NOT WITHOUT REASON, CONCERNING THE MANICHAEANS THEMSELVES.

But they say, that through their own Elect that same commingled part and nature of God is purged, by eating and drinking forsooth, (because they say that it is held lettered in all foods); that when they are taken up by the Elect for the nourishment of the body in eating and drinking, it is loosed, sealed, and liberated through their sanctity. Nor do the wretches pay heed to the fact that this is believed about them not without good reason, and they deny it in vain, so long as they do not anathematize the books of Manichaeus and cease to be Manichaeans. For if, as they say, a part of God is fettered in all seeds, and is purged by eating on the part of the Elect; who may not properly believe, that they do what they read in the Thesaurus was done among the powers of heaven and the princes of darkness; since indeed they say that their flesh is also from the race of darkness, and since they do not hesitate to believe and to affirm that the vital substance fettered in them is a part of God? Which assuredly if it is to be loosed, and purged by eating, as their lamentable error compels them to acknowledge; who does not see, who does not shudder at the greatness and the unspeakableness of what follows?

CHAP. 46.--THE UNSPEAKABLE DOCTRINE OF THE FUNDAMENTAL EPISTLE.

For they even say that Adam, the first man, was created by certain princes of darkness so that the light might be held by them test it should escape. For in the epistle which they call Fundamental, Manichaeus wrote as follows respecting the way in which the Prince of Darkness, whom they represent as the father of the first man, spoke to the rest of his allied princes of darkness, and how he acted: "Therefore with wicked inventions he said to those present: What does this huge light that is rising seem to you to be? See how the pole moves, how it shakes most of the powers. Wherefore it is right for me rather to ask you beforehand for whatever light you have in your powers: since thus I will form an image of that great one who has appeared in his glory, through which we may be able to rule, freed in some measure from the conversation of darkness. Hearing these things, and deliberating for a long time among themselves, they thought it most just to furnish what was demanded of them. For they did not have confidence in being able to retain the light that they had forever; hence they thought it better to offer it to their Prince, by no means without hope that in this way they would-rule. It must be considered therefore how they furnished the light that they had. For this also is scattered throughout all the divine scriptures and the heavenly secrets; but to the wise it is easy enough to know how it was given: for it is known immediately and openly by him who should truly and faithfully wish to consider. Since there was a promiscuous throng of those who had come together, females and males of course, he impelled them to copulate among themselves: in Which copulation the males emitted seed, the females were made pregnant. But the offspring were like those who had begotten them, the first obtaining as it were the largest portion of the parents' strength. Taking these as a special gift their Prince rejoiced. And just as even now we see take place, that the nature of evil taking thence strength forms the fashioner of bodies, so also the aforesaid Prince, taking the offspring of his companions, which had the senses of their parents, sagacity, light, procreated at the same time with themselves in the process of generation, devoured them; and very many powers having been taken from food of this kind, in which there was present not only fortitude, but much more astuteness and depraved sensibilities from the ferocious race of the progenitors, he called his own spouse to himself, springing from the same stock as himself, emitted, like the rest the abundance of evils that he had devoured, himself also adding something from his own thought and power, so that his disposition became the former and arranger of all the things that he had poured forth; whose consort received these things as soil cultivated in the best way is accustomed to receive seed. For in her were constructed and woven together the images of all heavenly and earthly powers, so that what was formed obtained the likeness, so to speak, of a full orb."

O abominable monger! O execrable perdition and ruin of deluded souls! I am not speaking of the blasphemy of saying these things about the nature of God which is thus fettered. Let the wretches deluded and hunted by deadly error give heed to this at least, that if a part of their God is fettered by the copulation of males and females which they profess to loose and purge by eating it, the necessity of this unspeakable error compels them not only to loose and purge the part of God from bread and vegetables and fruits, which done they are seen publicly to, partake of, but also from that which might be fettered through copulation, if conception should take place. That they do this some are said to have confessed before a public tribunal, not only in Paphlagonia, but also in Gaul, as I heard in Rome from a certain Catholic Christian; and when they were asked by the authority of what writing they did these things, they betrayed this fact concerning the Thesaurus that I have just mentioned. But when this is cast in their teeth, they are in the habit of replying, that some enemy or other has withdrawn from their number, that is from the number of their Elect, and has made a schism, and has founded a most foul heresy of this kind. Whence it is manifest that even if they do not themselves practise this thing, some who do practise it do it on the basis of thor books. Therefore let them reject the books, if they abhor the crime, which they are compelled to commit, if they hold to the books; or if they do not commit them, they endeavor in opposition to the books to live more purely. But what do they do when it is said to them, either purge the light from whatever seeds you can, so that you cannot refuse to do that which you assert that you do not do; or else anathematize Manichaeus, when he says that a part of God is in all seeds, and that it is fettered by copulation, but that whatever of light, that is, of the aforesaid part of God, should become the food of the Elect, is purged by being eaten. Do you see what he compels you to believe, and do you still hesitate to anathematize him? What do they do, I say, when this is said to them? To what subterfuges do they betake themselves, when either so nefarious a doctrine is to be anathematized, or so nefarious a turpitude committed, in comparison with which all those intolerable evils to which I have already called attention, seem tolerable, namely, that they say of the nature of God that it was pressed by necessity to wage war, that it was either secure by everlasting ignorance, or was disturbed by everlasting grief and fear, when the corruption of com-mingling and the chain of everlasting damnation should come upon it, that finally as a result of the conflict it should be taken captive, oppressed, polluted, that after a false victory it should be fettered forever in a horrible sphere and separated from its original blessedness, while if considered in themselves they cannot be endured?

CHAP. 48.--AUGUSTIN PRAYS THAT THE MANICHAEANS MAY BE RESTORED TO THEIR SENSES.

O great is Thy patience, Lord, full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy, and true;(1) who makest Thy sun to rise upon the good and the evil, and who sendest rain upon the just and the unjust;(2) who willest not the death of the sinner, so much as that he return and live;(3) who reproving in parts, dost give place to repentance, that wickedness having been abandoned, they may believe on Thee, O Lord;(1) who by Thy patience dost lead to repentance, although many according to the hardness of their heart and their impenitent heart treasure up for themselves wrath against the day of wrath and of the revelation of Thy righteous judgment, who wilt render to every man according to his works;(2) who in the day when a man shall have turned from his iniquity to Thy mercy and truth, wilt forget all his iniquities:(3) stand before us, grant unto us that through our ministry, by which Thou hast been pleased to refute this execrable and too horrible error, as many have already been liberated, many also may be liberated, and whether through the sacrament Of Thy holy baptism, or through the sacrifice of a broken spirit and a contrite and humbled heart,(4) in the sorrow of repentance, they may deserve to receive the remission of their sins and blasphemies, by which through ignorance they have offended Thee. For nothing is of any avail, save Thy surpassing mercy and power, and the truth of Thy baptism, and the keys of the kingdom of heaven in Thy holy Church; so that we must not despair of men as long as by Thy patience they live on this earth, who even knowing how great an evil it is to think or to say such things about Thee, are detained in that malign profession on account of the use or the attainment of temporal or earthly convenience, if rebuked by Thy reproaches they in any way flee to Thy ineffable goodness, and prefer to all the enticements of the carnal life, the heavenly and eternal life.

Information
Religion Manichaeism
Language Coptic[1]
Period c. 5th century
Kephalaia (Koine Greek and Coptic: ⲕⲉⲫⲁⲗⲁⲓⲁ, lit. 'chapters, headings') is a genre of Manichaean literature represented mainly by two large papyrus codices containing Coptic translations from 5th-century Roman Egypt.[1] The kephalaia are sometimes seen as the actual words or teachings of the prophet Mani, but are probably better viewed as later discourses and interpretations laid upon "an authoritative oral tradition" ostensibly going back to Mani and thus analogous to the Talmud in Judaism and the ḥadīth in Islam.[2]

Although the Kephalaia likely originated, like hadiths, as accounts of the life and actions of Mani, the utility of the genre was such that it came to incorporate a wide variety of literary styles subjected artificially to the constraints of the format: instruction, exegesis, narrative, dialogue, parable, miracle-story, and even epic traditions.[1][3]

The discovery of the Kephalaia has been revolutionary in transforming scholarship on early Manichaean traditions and even the secular history of the Sasanian Empire.[1]

Despite the apocryphal and heavily reworked nature of the available text, most prominently from Coptic translation, it is an authentic representation of traditions first held and developed by the Manichaean communities in the early Sasanian period within the empire. As such, this is a unique source for literature, religion and society from a known context that substantially pre-dates most other available resources concerning the reigns of Shapur II and his successors.[1]

While Jesus is only rarely called Jesus the Splendour in other Manichaen writings, he is commonly called as such in the Kephalaia of the Teacher.[4] In the Kephalaia, Jesus is an emanation of the Father of Greatness and identical with the "Third Envoy" and the "living word," brought forth to restore the damage done by the rebellion of the Archons.[5] When Jesus the Splendour descends to the earth, he later takes on the shape of flesh to manifest himself in the material world.[6]

The descriptions of the Lord of Darkness in chapters 6 and 27 of the Kephalaia have close parallels in chapter 12.6 of the Mandaean Right Ginza.[7]

KEPHALAIA, genre of literature developed by the Manichean communities in the early Sasanian empire that spread with the church across Eurasia and North Africa, primarily preserved by two large papyrus codices in Coptic translation from Egypt dating to the early fifth century CE (see COPTIC MANICHEAN TEXTS).

The Kephalaia (Greek and Coptic: “chapters,” “summaries,” “principal points”) are better characterised as an evolving and open-ended genre of literature than as a single book. The governing features are the formatting of text into numbered chapters each with a header (“This kephalaion tells about such and such”) and a formulaic opening that presents the material as the verbatim teaching of Mani himself, often in response to a question (“Once again, it happened one time while the apostle was sitting in the congregation of his disciples, a catechumen questioned him,” vel sim.). The earliest kephalaic material was primarily doctrinal, the format providing a suitable vehicle for the complex teachings of the community as organised by the scholastic tradition of the elect into elaborate but tersely-expressed taxonomies (e.g., “Concerning the five forms that exist in the rulers of darkness”; “Concerning the three days and the two deaths”). The utility of the genre was such that it came to incorporate a wide variety of literary styles subjected artificially to the constraints of the format: instruction, exegesis, narrative, dialogue, parable, miracle-story, and even epic traditions. Although it is probable that some authentic details of the life and teaching of Mani himself are preserved, the Kephalaia do not belong to his authored canon of scripture. They are apocryphal, heavily-reworked, and came in time to incorporate other bodies of textual material beyond the oral memory of the community concerning its founder and his revelation (Pettipiece, pp. 8-9). Current scholarly research is only beginning to disentangle the redactional layers of the extant texts and attempt an archaeology of the resources preserved (Gardner, 2010, for initial comments; Pedersen, 2017, considered application of the method). The value of the Coptic sources for information regarding Iranian epic traditions (BeDuhn, 2015b), andarz literature and folk-tales at such an early date has not yet been realised.

The earliest evidence is a brief allusion found in a fragmentary passage of the apocalyptic text The Sermon on the Great War (Manichaean Homilies, ed. Pedersen, p. 18, 6): “I weep for the Kephalaia.” This tragic vision of the wrath and suffering visited upon the churches is ascribed to Koustaios (Kuštai), Mani’s scribe according to one of his own Epistles (unpublished, Berlin P. 15998, f. 13). The line is rendered as if spoken by the apostle himself, but notably without the possessive found in the previous line for one of his authentic works (“my Picture-Book”; see ARŽANG). Although the Coptic codex in which the only copy of The Sermon on the Great War is preserved dates to circa 400 CE, the original writing would have been composed in eastern Aramaic in Sasanian Mesopotamia during the persecutions subsequent to the apostle’s martyrdom in 277 CE(?). This would locate the existence and perhaps source of the Kephalaia within Mani’s immediate circle in the late third century or the very start of the fourth; thus during the reign of Bahrām II or his immediate successors as persecutors of the community. The early date appears confirmed by its naming (Lat. Capitula), together with authentic works by Mani in the Acta Archelai (ed. Beeson, 62, 6; see ARCHELAUS), a polemic that must be dated to circa 330-340 CE (Lieu in Vermes, pp. 6-8). Note also the Capitula of the Manichean bishop Faustus of Milevis, written late fourth-century in Latin in Roman North Africa and cited at length by Augustine in his Contra Faustum (for caution as regards dating van den Berg, 2013, pp. 20-21 and for an overview of research van Gaans). G. Wurst has argued for a parallelism between this work and the Kephalaia themselves (also van den Berg, 2010, pp. 181-84) as represented in the Coptic codices; but the broadly Biblical content of Faustus’ book and the fact that the teaching is his own and not cited as the words of Mani makes it preferable to assign it to the erōtapokrisis or question-and-answer literature widespread in late antiquity. The Kephalaia necessarily belong to this category (Pettipiece, pp. 9-10), but they had notable features and possible parallels with Iranian and Buddhist models (Dilley, 2015a, pp. 22-23) that mark them out as a specific, definable sub-group.

In 1929 there appeared on the Cairo antiquities market a cache of large Coptic papyrus codices, two volumes of which included the term Kephalaia (Coptic n-kephalaion) in their titles. The date of the artifacts is most probably between 380-430 CE (BeDuhn and Hodgins, 2017). The exact history of the so-called Medinet Madi (in the Egyptian Fayyum) find, its gradual publication and many problems is exceedingly complicated (see Robinson); but broadly speaking one Kephalaia volume is now preserved in Berlin (1Ke = The Chapters of the Teacher) and the other in the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin (2Ke = The Chapters of the Wisdom of My Lord Mani).

At first the editing and publication of the Coptic text of 1Ke (Berlin P. 15996) in the series Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin with German translation proceeded rapidly, the first half completed by 1940 and edited by H. J. Polotsky (pp. 1-102) and A. Böhlig (pp. 103-244). Publication of the so-called second half by Böhlig commenced in 1966 (to p. 291), although much of the work for this had been prepared earlier; but then nothing further was made available for several decades. As a consequence, the English translation by I. Gardner in 1995 of the edited text to that point (pp. 1-295, chapter 122 completed by means of an unpublished draft provided by Funk) has become the standard means by which the work is accessed and cited in the anglophone world. This is what is commonly glossed as the Kephalaia, but it is misleading as it covers only part of the contents of 1Ke and none of 2Ke; nor is there reason to suppose that these Coptic codices preserve an archetypal version of the work. Funk has now completed the original series published by W. Kohlhammer of Stuttgart (1999, 2000 and 2017) to a final total of 522 pages for the Berlin codex; but these latter sections are less well-known to non-specialists nor widely available. A summary account of the codicology, with indices to the complete Coptic text and extensive addenda and corrigenda to the entirety of 1Ke from its start, is in process by Funk and projected as a final volume of Supplementa.

The contents of 2Ke remained largely unknown until a facsimile edition of the manuscript was made available by S. Giversen in 1986. The publication provided no transcripts, and left many codicological problems unsolved; but the opportunity to view the plates led to a series of articles with readings and discussions of short passages (Böhlig, 1989, 1992; Funk, 1990, 1997, 2002; Gardner, 2005; Gnoli; Sundermann; Tardieu, 1988, 1991). A particular interest was the question of the relationship between 1Ke and 2Ke, noting the different titles. Gh. Gnoli and M. Tardieu argued that the latter codex might represent an eastern or Iranian tradition associated with the apostle's disciple Mār Ammō, whilst the former was associated with Mār Addā/Adimantus and the mission to the west. In 2005 Gardner and BeDuhn, later joined by Dilley, began a new project to edit 2Ke (Gardner, 2015a). An initial part has been published in 2018 (Coptic text and English translation of chapters 321-347, pp. 343-442) with three more in process to complete the edition of the Dublin codex. This on-going work has advanced the understanding of the Coptic Kephalaia corpus as follows.

Despite the different titles it appears that the two volumes were part of a continuous production totalling in excess of one thousand pages on papyrus. Funk (private communication) calculates that 1Ke probably concluded between chapters 205-210; the final identifiable number and header being that for 199. The first kephalaion number in 2Ke as yet read is 220, and the last one in this redaction is 347. The final quires of 1Ke and the earlier of 2Ke are poorly preserved but it is most economic to suppose that the chapter sequencing was continuous between the codices. The primary distinction is not between the two, but rather the entire massive work is composed of a series of separate 'books' so that the chapter numbers and total of 347 can only be a secondary imposition on the whole, and presumably specific to this redaction rather than archetypal of the work as a single-authored composition. The original books are apparent because each of them starts with a version of the text known as On the Coming of the Apostle (kephalaion 1) or some form of duplicate title or contents. The first 'book' begins at chapter 1 and gathers together scholastic teachings concerning cosmology and cosmogony; theology, theogony and demonology; human origins; time and soteriology. It is possible that this was the 'original' Kephalaia, and if the notion of authorship has any meaning it should be found here although a great deal of other material has been added to the core in the only comprehensive version available (i.e., 1Ke). A second 'book' begins in chapter 76 entitled On Lord Mani: How he Journeyed. It deals with topics that can loosely be described as community practice and ethics, although again a great many other text-units and subjects have been collected here. Redaction is very unstable and limited throughout: Some individual chapters clearly contain multiple blocks of material; introductory formulae are mostly artificial; organization according to subject, catchphrase or an overall schema is rudimentary (Gardner, 1995, pp. xix-xxiv).

In 2Ke another block of material is inserted and arranged from chapters 295 ([On Jesus the Christ]: How his Coming to the World Occurred) to 304, which can be dubbed the 'Jesus-book' as it collates traditions about the savior in gospel sequence from his advent to the ascension. At number 305, more than midway through 2Ke, there begins the 'Iranian Kephalaia-book', which contains duplicate material to chapter 1 but here the advent of the apostles is framed by an Iranian genealogy rather than the Biblical history from the antediluvian prophets to Jesus that controls the former. Iranian epic and Buddhist traditions are utilized for parallel purposes to those of the first kephalaion, where the frame was broadly Judeo-Christian, and point to an eastern cultural context for the formation and redaction of the contents that follow. This 'book,' which itself incorporates discrete sources all of a distinct Sasanian cultural and geographical setting, will prove an invaluable resource for Iranian scholarship. Here are found parallels to Manichean Middle Iranian texts previously recovered from Central Asia (BeDuhn, 2015a), as well as entirely unexpected evidence of the use made by the community of andarz literature and folk-tales previously known only from Middle Persian and Arabic sources of a much later date.

Thus the distinguishing features noted by scholars such as Tardieu in their first examination of pages from 2Ke made available by Giversen in 1986 are not between the two Coptic volumes in themselves, but rather between different kephalaia-books that have been incorporated into the collection as it is represented in the Medinet Madi codices that circulated in Egypt at around 400 CE. Finally, it is notable that around the entire corpus there is gathered introductory material provided to frame and justify the work (1Ke, pp. 1-9.10), while after the final kephalaion ends (2Ke, p. 442.6) the compilation concludes with a lengthy version of the literary cycle concerning Mani's last days (Gardner, 2015c) together with comments on the very final page to record the writing of these Kephalaia (unpublished, but see Funk, 1997, pp. 153-54).

Now that the overall construction of the Coptic volumes has become clear it is certain that one cannot speak of this compilation as a single composition with an author to be identified. One could suppose an original redactor, responsible for the distinct features of the genre; and this person might be sought in the first generation of disciples (see above). It is possible that the contents of that primal Kephalaia might be at the core of the first 'book' where there is a somewhat stronger sense of ordering manifested in actual numbers given to the earliest chapters (e.g., The Second: On the Parable of the Tree), but any attempt to reconstruct this would be highly speculative and the idea itself is only an hypothesis. The identification of this person as Addā as first suggested by Tardieu is unprovable, although has been attractive to scholars (Funk, 1997, p. 154; van den Berg, 2010, pp. 208-11 for the proposal that the figure of Adimantus connects it to Faustus as his student and the latter's own Capitula, cf. Augustine c. Faust.1, 2). It is linked to the idea of the work as somehow intrinsically connected to the western mission; but the new identification of an "Iranian Kephalaia-book" embedded in 2Ke reopens this construction. Manichean scholarship has been enormously advanced by the rapid publication of the earlier parts of 1Ke, but this has also prejudiced the meaning given to the term. There are substantial examples of very similar types of textual material circulated by the Manichean communities in Iranian (Sundermann and e.g., Henning) and Chinese (Lieu and Mikkelsen, pp. xxxii-xxxiv); but there has been a noted reluctance to name these as Kephalaia due to comparison with the supposed archetype recovered in the Coptic translation of the first Medinet Madi codex (1Ke). For possible evidence of kephalaic material circulated in Coptic in other formats see the finds at Ismant el-Kharab (in the Dakhleh/Daḵla Oasis), notably T. Kellis II Copt. 1, P. Kellis II Copt. 5 and 8 (Gardner, 1996).

The publication of the Kephalaia has greatly influenced all research on Manicheism since its inception (e.g., major studies by Böhlig, 2013; van Lindt; Pettipiece; Woschitz). Despite the apocryphal and heavily reworked nature of the available text, most prominently from Coptic translation, it is an authentic representation of traditions first held and developed by the Manichean communities in the early Sasanian period and within the Iranian empire. As such, this is a unique source for literature, religion and society from a known context that substantially pre-dates most other available resources concerning the reigns of Šāpur I and his successors. Strictly historical data (though much stylised) is thickest in the biographical sections relating to Mani's call and the announcement of his public mission (chapter 1), his travels (76), and the appendix where community tradition records his final travels, trial and imprisonment. Other notable passages include the apostle witnessing the Tigris in flood (61), his dialogue with a Nazorean (89), his encounter with the King of Ṭurān (323), and the remarkable debate before King Šāpur that is facilitated by the courtier Kirdīr, son of Ardawān (338, see ŠKZ and discussion by Gardner, 2015b). Information on other presumed historical persons and Mazdayasnian festival or ceremony are found in chapters 322 and 326, whilst a written 'law of Zarades' (Coptic p-nomos n-zaradēs) is directly cited in 341 and 345 (Dilley, 2015b). The Iranian epic material with the story of Kay Ḵosrow (here as ‘Chasrō the blessed’) and much more may be 306; but this number is uncertain and awaits final editing. Examples of andarz literature and folk-tales incorporated into the tradition are prevalent in the series of chapters concerning Mani’s debates with Gūndēš and other sages at the Sasanian court (327-340).

Scope and Notes for Contributors Iranian Heritage is a peer-reviewed journal and is published biannually by Shahid Beheshti University. The journal publishes original research in history, culture and civilization of ancient Iran and the Persianate world.
Manuscripts should be submitted electronically as word documents to managing editor at n_miri@sbu.ac.ir or IJIH@sbu.ac.ir; they shall not exceed 10,000 words, including notes. Articles should be double-spaced, with at least one-inch margins. Preferred font is Times New Roman, size 12. Mention any proposed illustrations with the initial submission but do not send the illustration themselves. If the article is accepted, illustrations may be submitted either electronically as TIFF files (300 dpi) or as scanner-ready hard copies (e.g. photographs of artwork).

Style Guidelines The journal follows The Chicago Manual of Style, Sixteenth Edition and prefers citations using author-date system (given below and available at http://www.chicagomanualofstyle.org/tools_citationguide.html). References should be given in the text only with full bibliographic information at the end of each work. Notes other than references will be printed as footnotes, and should be used judiciously. Authors must strictly comply with the journal notation style.
For transliteration of Persian, Arabic and Turkish words authors may follow the transliteration table of the Encyclopedia Iranica but omit the diacritical marks (available at http://www.iranicaonline.org/pages/guidelines). If transliterations are not strictly consistent the paper would be returned to the author.

A Dream-Work: An Analysis of Nāṣer Ḵosrow's Dream and Intellectual Transformation

Yahia Baiza[*]

Abstract
Believing in dreams and dream interpretation is part of the human psyche and human culture across all societies. Prophets, pious men and women are believed to have had the special gift of understanding and interpreting both the manifest and the latent contents of dreams and providing guidance and predictions. This paper presents an analysis of a dream that Nāṣer Ḵosrow experienced in the forty-second year of his life. It analyses the context and the content of this dream, which he describes in his Safar-nāmah (Travelogue), and how this dream turned into a dream-work that transformed Nāṣer Ḵosrow's life and enabled him to leave behind a rich intellectual legacy.[]

Keywords: Nāṣer Ḵosrow, Shiʿite Ismāʿili, Nāṣer Ḵosrow's dream, intellectual transformation.

Introduction

Despite having a long and visible historical presence, the history of the Shīʿa Ismāʿili (hereafter, Ismāʿili) daʿwat (summons) and communities in Khorasan has largely remained unexplored. This is because history as a scholarly discipline is still dominated by conventional historiography, which mainly focuses on 'big narratives', and rarely pays attention to the history and events of minority groups. The lack of attention to the

I would like to thank my friend and colleague, Russell Harris, researcher and editor at The Institute of Ismaili Studies, London, for proofreading and commenting on the first and the final draft, and Shafique N. overall history of the Ismāʿili daʿwat in Khorasan also appears to have had an impact on the study of life, thought and intellectual legacy of Nāṣer Ḵosrow.[1] Therefore, despite an increasing interest in the study of Nāṣer Ḵosrow's thoughts and ideas in Persian and major European languages, the fields of Ismāʿili studies in general and Nāṣer Ḵosrow studies in particular are still explored and discussed in the margins of Islamic studies.

It may sound a strong statement to say that until the late nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries, Nāṣer Ḵosrow was one of the most overlooked literary and religious personalities. Over the past nine centuries since his death in 469/1077 or 486/1093 until the beginning of the twentieth century only a handful of scholars are known to have written about Nāṣer Ḵosrow. Some critics may counter the argument that he has been overlooked by referring to a list of historical sources which refer to Nāṣer Ḵosrow. However, by saying that Nāṣer Ḵosrow was one of the most overlooked personalities until the late nineteenth century, this author does not necessarily mean that Nāṣer Ḵosrow remained unknown as a person. Rather, not only were his ideas, thoughts and legacies left unexplored, but when some small number of writers did pay attention to him we note that a series of fictional and fabricated narratives were developed and attributed to him on the one hand, and many negative views and comments were passed to him on the other. The sources analysed and discussed in this introduction are generally divided into pre-late nineteenth and post-late nineteenth century. The former category of sources often do not exceed a few lines of prose and poetry, with a passing mention to Nāṣer Ḵosrow while at the same time containing mixed polemical and unhistorical views. It is only in the post-nineteenth century literature that Nāṣer Ḵosrow's books, thoughts and ideas have attracted scholars' attention.

The earlier sources paint Nāṣer Ḵosrow's life and thoughts in negative, and positive and neutral pictures. One such early source is a piece of short poetry (qiṭʿa), written by a late sixth-century poet from Samarqand, Dehqān ʿAlī Šaṭranjī, known by his sobriquet Jamāl al-ḥokamāʾ (The

1. I use a simplified version of the name Nāṣer-e Ḵosrow for the ease of reading.

Beauty of Scholars). The poem appears in Muḥammad ʿAwfī's Lobāb al-albāb (the Essence of Intellect), the first Persian biographical work. ʿAwfī (d. 639/1242) dedicates seven pages of his biographical work to Šaṭranjī, who describes Nāṣer Ḵosrow in pejorative terms. Firstly, Šaṭranjī wrongly states that Nāṣer Ḵosrow adopted the sobriquet of Ḥamid al-Dīn (Praiseworthy of Religion) and then muses on how Nāṣer Ḵosrow can deserve such a title, when the dung of the former, i.e., Ḥamid al-Dīn, is far better than the goodness (maḥāsin) of this, i.e., Nāṣer Ḵosrow (ʿAwfī 1903 vol. 2, 202). Nāṣir Khuraw never adopted the sobriquet Ḥamid al-Dīn for himself. Rather it is part of his full name, Abū Moʿīn Ḥamid al-Dīn Nāṣer ibn Ḵosrow. Apparently, Šaṭranjī either mistakenly attributes Nāṣer Ḵosrow's name as his sobriquet, or he purposely plays with words in order to pass a derogatory comment to him.

Another work of the same era belongs to Abū Yaḥyā Zakariyāʾ b.Muḥammad Qazvīnī (d. 681/1283). In his geographical account, Āṯār al-belād wa aḵbār al-ʿebād, Qazvīnī gives a fictional image of Nāṣer Ḵosrow under the geographical account of Yumgān.[2] After describing Yumgān as a valley minerals in Badaḵšān surrounded by mountains full of precious, he describes Nāṣer Ḵosrow's life and activities on the authority of a certain Amīr Ḥesām-al-Dīn Abu'l Moʾayyad b.Noʿmān. Qazvīnī describes Nāṣer Ḵosrow as the king of Balḵ who escaped his kingdom and took refuge in Yumgān because of people's rebellion. In Yumgān, Qazvīnī attributes to Nāṣer Ḵosrow the creation of certain statues and figures that used to move and speak non-human languages, and that people were forbidden to look at them so they could remain safe from potential harm. He also describes the construction of fictional gardens and buildings, mainly mysterious ḥammāms (hot baths), as the works of Nāṣer Ḵosrow (Qazvīnī 1969, 489-90, 1994, 567-68). This would seem to be a purely fictional and unhistorical account, because Nāṣer Ḵosrow was neither the king of Balḵ nor he was the builder of mysterious gardens or structures or figures. However, the reason why Qazvīnī includes fictional narratives and attributes them to Nāṣer

2. The author spells it as Yumkān, instead of Yumgān, because the Arabic alphabet does not have the letter 'gāf'.

Ḵosrow is that he himself was a fiction writer, and loved to give his fiction historical contexts. Qazvīnī is known for his love for fiction which led him to write ʿAjāʾeb al-Maḵlūqāt wa ḡarāʾeb al-mawjūdāt (Marvels of Creatures and Strange Beings) in 678/1280. His passion for fiction is very likely to have been one of the main reasons why he interwove his account of Yumgān and Nāṣer Ḵosrow with fictional narratives.

A third source is that of the eighth-century historian, Ḥamd-Allāh Mostawfī. In his Tārīḵ-e gozīda, Mostawfī gives an account of creation from the beginning to his own time in 730/1330. All the entries in the book are of dubious historical accuracy. This is particularly evident on the history of Fatimid imams and caliphs, namely caliph al-Mostanṣer billāh (r. 427-487/1036-1094), who designated Nāṣer Ḵosrow as his chief dāʿī with the title of ḥujjat for Khorasan. Mostawfī's entry on Nāṣer Ḵosrow contains four short sentences which also include erroneous information. For example, he states that Nāṣer Ḵosrow lived for nearly a hundred years and that he was born in 359/970 (Mostawfī 1960, 514-15, 753-54). A similar historical inaccuracy can be found in the Majmaʿ al-Foṣaḥā of Riżā-qolī Ḵān Hedāyat (1215-1289/1800-1872), who states that Nāṣer Ḵosrow lived in Yumgān for nearly 25 years and died at the age of 140 in 534[/1140] (2003, 2119). These mistakes very likely became introduced because writers did not rigorously research their subject matter. For instance, Mostawfī gives an erroneous year for Nāṣer Ḵosrow's birth, even though Nāṣer Ḵosrow himself records this in his Dīwān as 394/1004. In addition, Mostawfī also mistakenly states that Nāṣer Ḵosrow lived for nearly one hundred years. By contrast, Hedāyat states the correct date of his birth, but erroneously claims that Nāṣer Ḵosrow lived for 140 years. This even contradicts his own account in which he states that Nāṣer Ḵosrow took refuge in Yumgān at the age of 44 and lived there for 25 years, giving an age at death of 69 and not 140.

In addition, Alice Hunsberger also provides a brief survey of several sources, starting from the earliest period and contemporaries of Nāṣer Ḵosrow to the nineteenth century (2000, 18-32). Hunsberger discusses how most of these early accounts present uncritical and often repetitive, pseudo-biographies of Nāṣer Ḵosrow. For instance, Amīr Dowlat Šāh's Taḏkerat al-šoʿarā (893/1487) extensively copies from Qāżī al-Bayżāwi's Niẓām al-tawārīḵ (674/1275). The accounts of many others, such Moḥammad b. Niʿma ibn ʿObaydallāh b. ʿAlī, known as Abu'l-Maʿālī, are clearly influenced by anti-Ismāʿili polemics (Hunsberger 2000, 19-20). Abu'l-Maʿālī's account of Nāṣer Ḵosrow itself belongs to this genre of anti-Ismāʿili literature. From the viewpoint of modern scholarship, such accounts are still valuable, because they inform modern readers about the authors' political and religious perceptions on the one hand, and what kind of image of Nāṣer Ḵosrow these authors were offering their readers on the other hand.

What is important to note is that these major historical sources give only a passing mention to Nāṣer Ḵosrow in the first instance. Secondly, their accounts often contain fictional and polemical statements. Some of the factual errors, such as the years of birth and death, are understandable as these authors may not have had access to Nāṣer Ḵosrow's books. However, they have to bear full responsibility for presenting polemic, judgemental, fictional and distorted accounts. Edward Granville Browne states that most of the historians, chronologists and biographers ignored Nāṣer Ḵosrow because of his Ismāʿili faith (Browne 1905, 325). Undoubtedly, there is an element of truth in this, but the fact that Nāṣer Ḵosrow wrote his prose and poetry in Persian-Dari may have been another reason why Arab, or generally non-Persian speaking, scholars could not write much about him. In addition, for a very long time and mainly for security reasons, the Ismāʿili communities strictly guarded the writings of their dāʿīs from outsiders. Therefore, until the rise of modern scholarship in Europe, Nāṣer Ḵosrow's writings had largely remained unknown.

The field of Nāṣer Ḵosrow studies has been rapidly changing since the second half of the nineteenth century. The key factor that has facilitated this change in Nāṣer Ḵosrow studies is European exploration and translation of the oriental scientific and literary traditions into major European languages. Nāṣer Ḵosrow's books also attracted the attention of European scholars, who made the findings of their research available to the wider scholarly community through academic journals and/or editing and publishing Nāṣer Ḵosrow's book. Prior to this period, Nāṣer Ḵosrow's books existed in the form of hand-copied manuscripts, often preserved by the Ismāʿili communities of modern-day Afghanistan, Tajikistan and the northern parts of Pakistan. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries orientalists noticed the richness, depth, and beauty and eloquence of Nāṣer Ḵosrow's thoughts, and started to translate them into European languages.

The orientalists' interest in Nāṣer Ḵosrow's works and their translations into French, German and English also attracted the attention of his native Persian speakers. The early European orientalists who paid attention to Nāṣer Ḵosrow and wrote about him include Abraham R. Füller (1872), Hermann Ethé (1879 and 1896-1904), Charles H. A. Schefer (1881), Franz Teufel (1882a, b), Guy le Strange (1888), V. Shukovski (1890), Edward G. Browne (1906) inter alia. They often worked with native Persian speakers to explore and understand handwritten manuscripts. Orientalists were particularly enthused by the Safar-nāma, because it contains some very detailed observations on geography, architecture, culture, traditions, markets, trade and people in various cities in Khorasan, modern-day Iran and the Middle East. Nāṣer Ḵosrow's Safar-nāma and poetry, including parts of his Dīwān, rolled off the printing press in the late nineteenth century. These publications raised awareness and scholarly interest among Persian-speakers, who slowly but steadily began to explore, analyse and interpret Nāṣer Ḵosrow's thoughts, a process which gained further momentum from the mid-twentieth century onwards.

Dream: Its Meaning and Function

There has always been a wide range of theories and views about dream, and its meaning and function. From the ancient to the modern time, there has always been a dual view of dream. As Siegmund Freud stated, the meaning and function of dream were subject to scientific theories as well as essential part of folk-belief. He further wrote that Aristotle even believed that the nature of dream is indeed daemonic, but not divine (Freud 1999, 7, 63). On the contrary, popular folk-belief distinguishes between valuable and unimportant dreams. The former is believed to be the divine nature of dream, a gift of the gods for the purpose of directing the actions of men, whereas as the latter is dispensable (Freud 1999, 7). This dual approach to dream continues to engage scientists and the belief of laypeople in the modern era.

In the modern Western literature, the works of the German physician W. Robert followed by Freud are particularly noteworthy. Although neither Robert's nor Freud's works are part of mandatory reading list of psychology courses in modern universities, they are still important in the study of dream and psychology literature (Robertson 1999, xxix). In his Der Traum als Naturnothwendigkeit erklärt, Robert describes dream as an activity of the psyche and a physical process (Robert 1886, 17, 32), without any supra-natural intervention. He states that dream has a two-fold function: an unfinished impression that becomes erased and an in-depth impression that becomes absorbed in the 'memory treasure' (Gedächtnisschatz). The erasure takes place quickly whereas the absorption takes a longer period of time. Following this observation, Robert gave importance to the depth of the impression and the interest the dreamer has in the content of the dream (1886, 20-21). Freud followed Robert's approach and further developed it. He accepted that dream is a psychological process of thought and a physical action, that it is a recollection of memory from everyday life (Freud 1999, 65-66). Pursuing this theory, Freud worked hard to provide a scientific proof that through developing psychological method and technique one can interpret dreams. As Robertson states, Freud's approach argues that dream is principally an expression of a person's unacknowledged feelings like envy, and guilt and desire that appear in dream in a state of suspended laws of logic. While acknowledging some degree of validity of this theory, Robertson doubts its applicability for all dreams (Robertson 1999, xii-xiii).

The Qurʾānic view of dream and the Muslim literature differ from that of scientists. They take a different approach to dream, its meaning and function. They differentiate between dream and vision. Every person dreams, but not every dream is a vision. Dream is a generic term that refers to what a person sees during his/her sleep, whereas a vision is understood to be a dream of a higher status that a person may experience it when asleep or awake, or in an in-between state. The Qurʾān presents prophets both as recipients of visions and as excellent interpreters of dreams. For instance, the Qurʾān narrates that God gave Joseph a special gift of interpreting dreams. Joseph was both a dreamer of true visions and an excellent dream interpreter. In sūra Yūsof, the Qurʾān narrates Joseph's dream of seeing eleven stars, the sun and the moon prostrating before him (Qurʾān 12, 4), God's decision to teach Joseph the interpretation of events (taʾwīl al-aḥādīṯ) (Qurʾān 12, 21), and how Joseph uses this divine gift in interpreting two co-prisoners' dreams and then the dream of the king of Egypt (Qurʾān 12, 36-49). Muslim literature also refers to the Prophet Moḥammad as an interpreter of dreams. The Prophet's night journey to heaven (meʿrāj), which occurred around the year 621, is also recorded in the Qurʾān. The sūra Isrāʾ narrates that:

> Glory be to Him who took his servant (Moḥammad) by night from the sacred mosque (Kaʿba) to the farthest mosque (Masjid al-aqṣā), whose precincts we blessed, during which we showed him some of Our signs, indeed He is the one who is the all-Hearing and the all-Seeing.
> (Qurʾān 17, 1)

Although, prior to this journey, the Prophet had been experiencing prophetic visions by way of receiving revelations through the Angel Gabriel, the meʿrāj was perhaps one of the finest and subtlest prophetic visions the Prophet experienced. Muslims, however, differ in their interpretation of the above quoted verse. While many Muslims believe that the Prophet had made the physical journey to heaven, Nāṣer Ḵosrow adopts a more rationalist and Ismāʿili-specific taʾwil approach to the above verse and argues that the Prophet's journey to heaven was spiritual (1969, 120-21). In the modern Muslim context, too, people continue to regard visions and dreams of subtle qualities as a sign of divine intervention, particularly when the Qurʾān, angels, and the Prophet Moḥammad or someone from his household appear in a person's dream. The same was true for Nāṣer Ḵosrow and the people of his time. However, before analysing Nāṣer Ḵosrow's dream and his intellectual transformation, it is worth analysing the intellectual circumstances of Nāṣer Ḵosrow, which is not without a relevance to the content of this dream.

Nāṣer Ḵosrow and His Intellectual Circumstances

The Safar-nāma and Dīwān are our main sources of knowledge about Nāṣer Ḵosrow's life and intellectual circumstances prior to his dream. Nāṣer Ḵosrow describes himself in his Safar-nāma and Dīwān as a learned man, with a professional position in the local Saljūq administration in Balḵ, an important city in Khorasan (now the northern part of Afghanistan), where he lived a comfortable life. A close reading of Safar-nāma, particularly Nāṣer Ḵosrow's narration of events prior to his dream, suggests that the he was undergoing a personal intellectual crisis. This crisis appears to be the result of his search for a more in-depth source of knowledge. In the words of Nāṣer Ḵosrow himself, he was in search of tawāngarī ḥaqīqī, literally true power (Nāṣer Ḵosrow 1956, 1). Apparently, it was this search for true power and his inability to attain it that brought about a temporary intellectual crisis. As he describes it, his life and everything around him, including his position as a finance officer, his material wealth and his social status did not satisfy his thirst for true power, which I term here true knowledge. Undoubtedly, he was not after more material power or wealth. True power for him meant true knowledge.

The next question is about what kind of knowledge Nāṣer Ḵosrow was pursuing. Apparently, he must have had questions in mind for which he was seeking answers in reliable source of knowledge. One way to look into his intellectual concerns is to read closely the works he produced years after he saw the dream. His writings demonstrate that questions such as why people are born in this world, where they come from, and where they depart to once they leave this mortal coil, what is religion, why God sent prophets and books, why people are divided into different religions and schools of thoughts and the importance of intellect in religion, must all have engaged him prior to seeing the life-changing dream. We know from his philosophical works as well as his Dīwān (2001, 258-59) that these questions concerned him most. In his Dīwān, he states that it was in the forty-second year of his life that he actively sought answers to these questions (Nāṣer Ḵosrow 2001, 258). He further adds that he had exhausted all possible sources of knowledge, including three Sunni schools of jurisprudence, the Ḥanafī, Mālekī, and Šāfeʿī in Khorasan (Nāṣer Ḵosrow 2001, 258-9). It appears that none of the sources of knowledge available to him in Khorasan were convincing and he continued his search further.

He was aware of how the Saljūq sultans and their local administrators and governors were devoid of intellectual thought. He was surrounded by good friends, bureaucrats, and poets, but none appears to have been of any significant intellectual and philosophical level. At the same time, he was apparently suffering from an intellectual void created by the death of the beacons of knowledge of his time, from Avicenna (d. 428/1037) to Ferdowsī (d. 410/1020) and Bīrūnī (d. 439/1048). He had probably met some of these master intellects and had some interaction with them. We know this at least from one of his qaṣīda in his Dīwān, in which calls upon himself: "wake up from your sweet dream, O you asleep for forty years. Look around! None of your close friends is left alive" (Nāṣer Ḵosrow 2001, 258). The qaṣīda also suggests that the intellectual emptiness he was experiencing, after the death of his close friends, could have been one of the key factors contributing to his intellectual sorrow and pain. He tried to ameliorate his situation through quick solution of imbibing wine. He confesses that in Jūzjānān he became a regular wine drinker for at least a month (Nāṣer Ḵosrow 1956, 1). It was within this intellectual and personal context that in the forty-second year of his life he asked God to grant him tawāngarī ḥaqīqī, i.e., the true knowledge, which shows that Nāṣer Ḵosrow gradually refined his search for solution and was became convinced that wine drinking was not necessarily the correct long-term solution.

A Dream-work: An Insight into Nāṣer Ḵosrow's Dream and Intellectual Transformation

Retrospectively, the search for tawāngarī ḥaqīqī (true knowledge) meant a change in the framework of life and thought. Wine drinking could only provide the comfort of temporary oblivion. Similarly, writing poetry, or spending time in the company of learned men, which undoubtedly had always been a popular culture in Khorasan, could only provide fleeting satisfaction, while at the same time prolonging the problem of his crisis. Eventually, he appears to have developed a better understanding of his situation and managed to identify true knowledge as the appropriate intellectual tool to enable him to change, or more precisely to break out of, his existing stasis and to endeavour to create a new framework, which I would term an intellectual framework. His real challenge, which still remained unresolved, was how and where to attain this intellectual framework.

The change of framework might, in other words, be described as a revolution, an intellectual revolution. This was precisely what Nāṣir Ḵosrow meant by asking God to give him true power or true knowledge. It is at this juncture of his life that he saw a life-changing dream which he described in the following words:

One night in a dream I saw someone saying to me, "How long will you continue to drink of this wine, which destroys man's intellect? If you were to stay sober, it would be better for you."

In reply I said, "The wise have not been able to come up with anything other than this to lessen the sorrow of this world".

"To be without one's senses is no repose", he answered me. "He cannot be called wise who leads men to senselessness. Rather, one should seek out that which increases reason and wisdom".

"Where can I find such a thing?" I asked.

"Seek and you shall find", he said, and then he pointed toward the qebla and said nothing more.

(Nāṣer Ḵosrow 1986, 1)

It is this dream that stands at the heart of Nāṣer Ḵosrow's intellectual transformation. The dream, as Nāṣer Ḵosrow himself confesses, left a deep impact on him. He states that:

When I woke up, I remembered everything from the dream, which had truly worked on me. "You have woken up from last night's sleep, now you must wake up from a forty-year dream", I said to myself. "Unless I alter all my deeds and attitudes, I shall not find liberation", I said to myself.

A key point in the above quotation, which supports the main thesis of this paper, is that the dream stands at the centre of Nāṣer Ḵosrow's life and intellectual transformation. The dream becomes a mechanism that translates his search for, and the dream of finding, true knowledge into a reality. Nāṣer Ḵosrow highlights the power and impact of his dream in very clear words: [ḵāb] bar man kār kard, meaning, [the dream] had truly worked, or made a deep impression, on me. There are several pieces of evidence that indicate the influence of the dream in his real life. Firstly, he confesses the psychological impression he had from his dream, as he acknowledges that the dream had truly worked and made a deep impression on him. Secondly, it leads him to make a solemn promise to himself that now was the right time to wake up from a forty-year dream. Thirdly, he also commits himself to changing his way of life and all his past habits, among which wine-drinking was a major issue. Fourthly, he cleanses himself from head to foot, goes to the mosque to pray, and asks God for help and commits himself fulfilling his duties and avoiding whatever is forbidden (Nāṣer Ḵosrow 1956, 2). These points demonstrate that Nāṣer Ḵosrow took his dream seriously, and apparently believed that it was not an ordinary, but a divinely-inspired dream.

The dream becomes a transformative power and a dream-work in Nāṣer Ḵosrow's life. The logic, the latent meaning and the message of the dream create an extraordinary burst of energy in Nāṣer Ḵosrow. This leads him to undertake a long exploratory and often exciting journey towards the qebla and then to Cairo. He leaves behind his past attitudes and way of life, including his position in the Saljūq administration. The dream leads him to an initiation into a new life and a new world. Although the dream itself gradually fades into the background of Nāṣer Ḵosrow's journey in search of reason and intellect, it remains the Wendepunkt in his life. The dream retains its power over him until it completely changes his way of life, intellectual career, and brings his quest for true power and knowledge to fruition.

Nāṣer Ḵosrow experienced the main stage of his transformational journey during his stay in Cairo. Here, he met the Fatimid Ismāʿili chief dāʿī, al-Moʾayyad fi'l-Dīn Šīrāzī (b. 396/1006), who became his personal master and mentor in Ismāʿili esoteric doctrine. His meeting with Moʾayyad, that culminated in his meeting the Fatimid imam-caliph Mostanṣer (427-487/1036-1095) marks the apogee of his life and consequently in the life of Ismāʿilis of Khorasan. Nāṣer Ḵosrow credits Moʾayyad for preparing him to give his beyʿat (oath of allegiance) to Mostanṣer (Nāṣer Ḵosrow 1928, qaṣīda No. 104, 2001, 261), who appointed Nāṣer Ḵosrow as the ḥujjat[3] (proof) for the jazīra (island, pl. jazāʾīr), or region, of Khorasan, a commission to which he dedicated the rest of his life. The Fatimid Ismāʿili imams, as Faquir Hunzai states, divided the world into twelve 'islands', and appointed a ḥujjat for each one to oversee the daʿwat mission and activities (Hunzai 2011, 1). Nāṣer Ḵosrow was one of the twelve ḥujjats and responsible for Khorasan. Since a ḥujjat had full authority over the designated daʿwat territory, Nāṣer Ḵosrow was also known as ṣāḥeb-e jazīra-ye Khorasan (the lord of the region of Khorasan).

Upon his return to Khorasan in 444/1052, Nāṣer Ḵosrow's new task was to disseminate and share the tawāngarī ḥaqīqī (true knowledge) he acquired in Cairo with the world, specifically with the people of Khorasan. He immersed himself in the daʿwat activities, summoning people to the Ismāʿili esoteric doctrine and fostering allegiance to the Ismāʿili Fatimid imam-caliph. As expected, Nāṣer Ḵosrow's new mission soon antagonised the local Sunni clerics, who accused him of being a molḥed (heretic). In order to punish him and put an end to his preaching, they incited people's religious sentiment against him by accusing him of being irreligious (Persian, bad-dīn), a molḥed, a Qermaṭī and a Rāfeżī (rejecter of truth). They also demolished his house, plundered his property, and threatened to assassinate him (Daftary 2007, 206). Consequently, Nāṣer Ḵosrow sought refuge in the valley of Yumgān, a very remote valley in Badaḵšān of Afghanistan. At this time, Yumgān was one of the territories of an autonomous local ruler Amīr Abu'l-Maʿālī ʿAlī b. Asad (Nāṣer Ḵosrow 1953), who was either an Ismāʿili or a sympathiser of the Ismāʿili daʿwat. Apparently, the presence of this Amīr and probably the Ismāʿili communities in Badaḵšān were the key reasons why Nāṣer Ḵosrow decided to settle in Yumgān.

In Yumgān, he engaged in intellectual activities. He trained local dāʿīs, supervised their work in different parts of Khorasan, and wrote books. His qaṣīdas reveal that he monitored daʿwat activities in Khorasan and he sent daʿwat treatises every year for the instruction of local dāʿīs (Nāṣer Ḵosrow 1928, qaṣīda No. 167). Today, the Pashayie, Hazāra, Tājik and Badaḵšānī Ismāʿili communities in Afghanistan, the Badaḵšānī or Pāmīrī Ismāʿilis in Gorno-Badaḵšān Autonomous Oblast of Tajikistan, the Tājīk Ismāʿilis in the westernmost part of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region in the People's Republic of China, and the Ismāʿilis of Gilgit-Baltistan (formerly known as the Northern Areas and Chitral of Pakistan), show great honour and respect to Nāṣer Ḵosrow. They read and regard his poetry and prose as fundamental Ismāʿili texts. It was also in Yumgān that he wrote numerous books and treatises on various issues, from religion and philosophy to the esoteric interpretation of the šarīʿa and reconciliation between religious and rational truths. Nāṣer Ḵosrow's books clearly demonstrate the fruit of his search for true knowledge, and the new intellectual framework which he acquired during his seven-year long journey. His intellectual legacy has become an everlasting source of intellectual guidance, inspiration and support for the Ismāʿili communities in regions of Khorasan as well as other Ismāʿili communities in other parts of the world.

The intellectual and daʿwat mission earned Nāṣer Ḵosrow a special position in the history of the Ismāʿili daʿwat in general and in Khorasan in particular. Under his leadership, the Ismāʿili daʿwat and communities entered a new phase of history. He transformed the Khorasani daʿwat school into an organised system, the legacy of which has lasted until now. He further developed and articulated Fatimid Ismāʿili religious beliefs, practices, and interpretations through a set of finely elaborated poetical and theo-philosophical literature, and made them accessible to the people of Khorasan for the first time in the Persian-Dari language, the lingua franca of the region. In doing so, he also entered into the list of the pioneers of the renaissance of the Persian-Dari language.

The fruition of Nāṣer Ḵosrow's dream and the dream-work are even today visible in the intellectual legacy he left behind. This legacy can be classified into several genres of literature, namely travelogue (Safar-nāma), collection of poems (Dīwān-e Aš ʿār), ethics (Rowšanāʾī-nāma), theological philosophy (Ḵwān al-eḵwān), philosophy (Zād al-mosāfirīn), and philosophical theology (Gushāyesh wa Rehāyesh), a collector of philosophical and religious thoughts (Jāmeʿ al-Ḥekmatayn), and the science of esoteric interpretation (Wajh-e Dīn). Nāṣer Ḵosrow wrote all these works in Persian-Dari thereby making them accessible to the people of Khurāsan. This is also one of the key reasons why his books have remained the core of Ismāʿili religious education and popular religious literature for the Central Asian Ismāʿili communities over the centuries.

Nāṣer Ḵosrow was the last Fatimid dāʿī of Khorasan. According to two most quoted dates, he died either at the age of 73 (469/1077) or 89 (486/1093). This would mean that he did not experience the split of the Fatimid caliphate and Ismāʿili daʿwat into the Mostaʿlī and Nezārī branches that occurred after the death of imam-caliph Mostanṣer in 487/1094. As in his writings, including his Dīwān, there is no indication of the Mostaʿlī-Nezārī split, it can safely be claimed that Nāṣer Ḵosrow died before the year 487/1094.

Conclusion

This paper has analysed Nāṣer Ḵosrow's dream and his intellectual transformation. It argued that Nāṣer Ḵosrow's dream played a central role and fully revolutionised and transformed his intellectual life beyond imagination. The dream he saw turned his ambition of gaining true knowledge into a dream-work, an everlasting reality. It not only transformed his life and career, but also influenced the lives of hundred thousand people from modern-day Iran and Afghanistan to Central and South Asia until today.

The intellectual transformation Nāṣer Ḵosrow achieved was the result of a continuous, complex, eventful and tireless struggle. He was a learned man with an inquisitive mind and was constantly pushing the boundaries of his thought and knowledge beyond what was locally available to him. His endless pursuit of deeper knowledge, and his questioning of things, such as the purpose of life, religion, world, the political authorities, and the growing intellectual decay in Khorasan, created in him an ardent desire to find a true master who could guide him and answer his questions. This pursuit and thirst for knowledge on the one hand, and the absence of local resources on the other, led him to experience an intellectual crisis. He must have lived with this crisis for some time, during which he tried certain piece-meal solutions, including wine-drinking.

It was in the forty-second year of his life that he eventually found the answer to his situation. He expressed it in two simple words: true power. He began to believe that only true power or true knowledge as I have termed it in this paper, as a thorough intellectual transformation and an intellectual revolution could bring him out of the crisis and open a new horizon of knowledge for him. It is at this moment of his life that he experienced a dream that became a dream-work and a life-changing experience. Eventually, it was this dream-work that transformed his life, nourished an intellectual revolution in him, and enabled him to leave behind a rich intellectual legacy until the current date.

Iranian Linguistic Attitudes and Persian Language Planning: A Case Study in Tehran

*Negar Davari Ardakani
*Hossein Moghani

Abstract
This paper aims to evaluate the linguistic attitudes of Persian speakers to provide an information base for language policy-making regarding Persian planning in Iran. To this end, the paper proposes the following questions:
- What are the main components of Tehrani Persian speakers' attitudes?
- What is the least important component among the other components?
- Regarding the above mentioned attitude components, how could we schematize the dominant overt and covert language planning policies?
To fulfill this aim, a questionnaire consisting of several questions on different aspects of linguistic attitudes has been distributed among four groups of Tehrani residents. The questionnaire has been organized so as to evaluate the awareness, affection and behavior towards Persian corpus, status and language in education. The size of the sample population (a total of 820) has been determined based on a formula developed by Krejcie and Morgan (Krejcie and Morgan, 1970). After collecting the questionnaires, the data were then encoded and entered into the SPSS statistical software. The independent variables of this analysis are social identity and age. The instruments used in this study are intersecting or ANOVA tables as well as other methods such as X^2, Somer's, Kramers, and Kendal. The paper concludes that the most important component of linguistic attitudes of the studied groups is affection towards Persian status. The least important components, on the other hand, are Iranian linguistic consciousness, attitude towards English, awareness of Persian status, hopefulness towards Persian improvement and affection towards present Persian planning. Furthermore, it turned out that covert and overt Persian language policies differ in some key aspects.

Keywords: attitude, linguistic attitude, language planning, linguistic corpus, linguistic status, linguistic behavior.

Introduction

Linguistic attitude is a term primarily used in the interdisciplinary field of socio-psychology, as well as in sociolinguistics and, especially, in the discipline of language planning. Linguistic attitudes are most commonly considered to be made up of three cognitive, affective and behavioral components, namely, knowledge about language, affections towards language and behavior towards language. Assessment of linguistic attitudes is one of the basic processes in the evaluative phase of language planning. As for this, language planners assess social groups' attitudes in order to accommodate language covert policy with its overt one. According to Schiffman (1996), it is the covert linguistic policy that determines the future of a language. Following this, this study assesses the linguistic attitudes of Persian speakers (resident in Tehran) so as to provide an information base for language policy-making regarding Persian planning in Iran.

The three components of attitude are, hence, assessed according to different relevant linguistic aspects, namely, corpus, status and language in education, in both spoken and written codes. In order to achieve this goal, a questionnaire has been devised. Different corpus issues (including phonetic and spelling, lexical, morphological, syntactic and discoursal language planning processes such as codification, standardization, renovation, etc.), status issues (language as an instrument vs. language as an affectional entity) and acquisition challenges are some of the main items touched in the questionnaire. The study aims at answering the following questions: What is/are the most important constructional component(s) of Tehrani Persian speakers' linguistic attitudes? Which of the mentioned linguistic issues has the least effect on the construction of Tehrani Persian speakers' attitudes? And finally, how do the answers to the two mentioned questions contribute to the formation of covert and overt policies? Linguistic attitudes of four groups of Tehrani Persian speakers (high school students, university students, university lecturers and Persian Academy (PA) members) are assessed so as to answer the last question. The linguistic attitudes of the first three groups are considered as covert linguistic policy in contrast to the linguistic attitudes of the last group, namely, Persian Academy members, as indicators of overt policy.

Review of Literature and Theoretical Foundations

Rubin (1977c), who considers language policy as a part of national policy, is one of the researchers who focuses on the importance of target populations and the distribution of language products in language planning. The most accessible populations which he mentions are high school teachers and students, university lecturers, municipality personnel and industry managers and personnel.

MacNamara (1971, 69, quoted in Rubin and Jernudd 1971) investigates the relevant factors leading to the failure of Irish maintenance efforts in spite of the implementation of the overt policies based on Irish maintenance. He refers the failure of Irish maintenance efforts to the fact that Irish speakers preferred to use English instead of Irish. In addition, he recommends that language planners recognize the opposite opinions towards language policies.

Perry (1985) in his comparison between language planning in Iran (1st Pahlavi) and Turkey (Ataturk) declares that Reżā Shah's language planning was not successful because the Shah did not engage people in this process. In other words, Perry considers Persian language planning in that era as an elite affair, whereas Ataturk engaged every literate Turk in the process.

Cooper (1989) represents a comprehensive picture of the process of language planning and all the influential factors affecting it. A comprehensive schema of Cooper's and his predecessors is designed below:

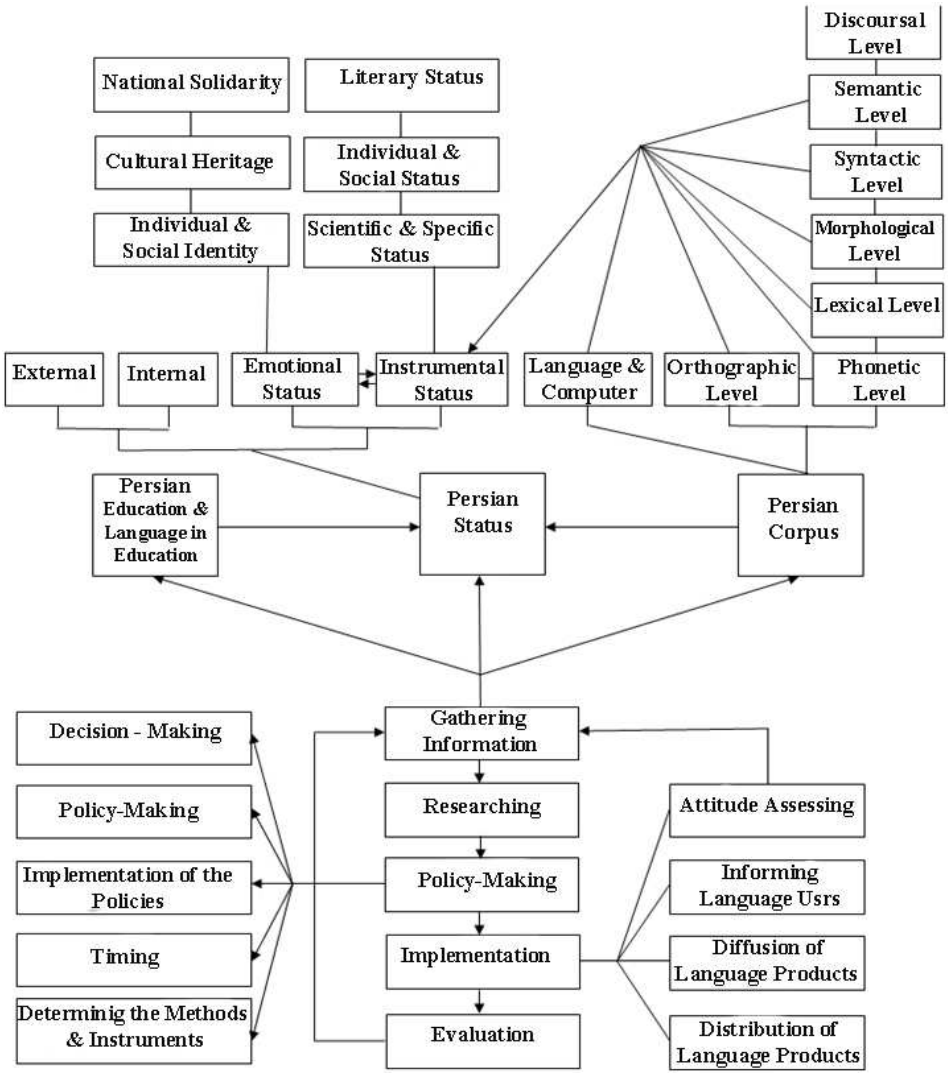

Chart 1. Different types of language planning and all the influential factors affecting it, inspired by Cooper (1989).

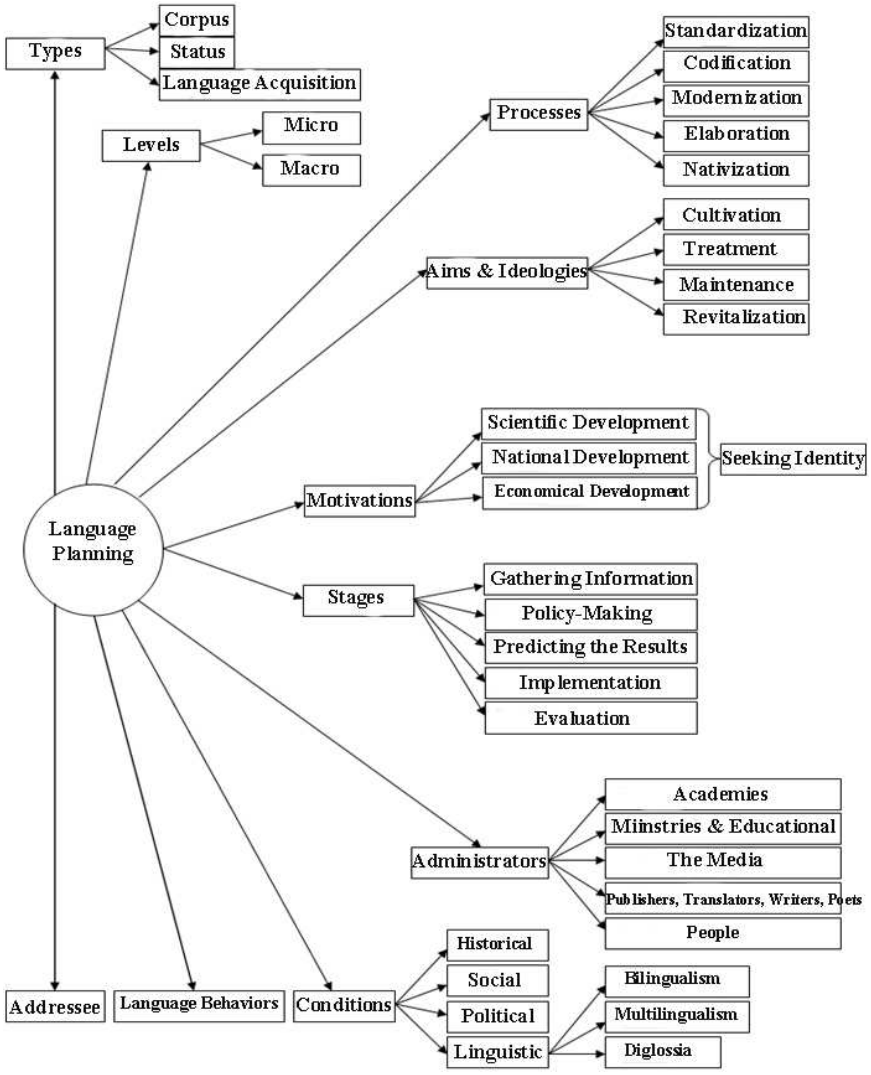

Chart 2. A network of the internal relations of the different influential factors in language planning.

Probing into Cooper's ideas, we are inevitably led to the point that the most common issue in the field of sociolinguistics is the social organization of language behaviors. In other words, sociolinguistics is not limited to the language use per se; on the contrary, it covers a wider range of topics including diverse issues such as linguistic attitudes and overt and covert linguistic behaviors. For Cooper, language planning is the most typical example of "overt linguistic behavior" that affects "language use", yet itself is affected by "language attitudes". Evidently, the study of linguistic motivations and attitudes of the potential receivers of language planning decisions has been highly recommended by Cooper.

Baker (1992) theorized the concept of linguistic attitudes, including cognitive, affective and behavioral elements. Baker's theory of linguistic attitudes together with Cooper's components of language planning comprises the foundation of this research.

Schiffman (1996) considers covert linguistic policy as a reflection of speaker's linguistic attitudes, which is a part of their culture. Schiffman recognizes inconsistency between these two language policies as a major cause of language planning failure.

Oakes (2001) in his comparative study of the contribution of national language in the formation of national identity (in local, national, European and global scopes) in France and Sweden finds a wider gap between covert and overt language policy in France as compared to Sweden. He, therefore, interprets the gap as a sign of attitude shift.

Kunja and Batula (2004) study the effect of attitudes in language maintenance and shift in an immigrant society.

Jahani (2004) has investigated the linguistic attitudes of Iranian immigrants in Sweden, studying the effect of ethnicity on linguistic attitudes. Her study shows that Baluchi[1] immigrants have the most positive attitude towards Swedish compared to the other three immigrant groups (Armenians, Fars and Turkish). Armenians, Jahani's study showed, have the most positive attitudes towards maintaining Armenian. Fars and Turkish people are in between the two other mentioned ethnic groups.

1. A relatively large Balouchi-speaking ethnic group residing in Sistān and Balouchestān province in the south-eastern part of Iran.

Regarding the above mentioned literature, the present research has integrated the main concepts of language planning and linguistic attitudes in order to schematize a network of relationships among the elements. The following schemas are some theoretical findings of the present research. The questionnaire is devised on the basis of these findings. Attempts have been made so as to touch every detail element relating to language.

Methodology and Discussion

Based on the systematic classification devised in charts 1 and 2, a questionnaire consisting of several questions on different aspects and componants of linguistic attitudes was designed and distributed among four groups of Tehrani residents (high school students, university students, university lecturers and members and researchers of the Persian Academy). The questionnaire was organized so as to evaluate the following items: awareness (of), affection and behavior towards Persian corpus, status and language in education (see charts 1 and 2 for more details). Regarding Persian status, it aims at evaluating the informants' attitudes towards "Persian in danger", "Persian as a language of science", "Persian as a national identity symbol", "Persian as a connection to Iran's ancient history" and attitudes towards foreign languages (see Table 1 for more details).
Attitudes towards Persian's corpus are assessed in regard to borrowing words and syntactic structures from foreign languages. Attitudes towards language in education planning are also assessed. Furthermore, the sum of the above-mentioned attitudes, which is called linguistic consciousness, has also been evaluated. Some other aspects of attitudes towards Persian, namely, suggestions for improving Persian, definition of Persian and Persian planning authorities are also evaluated. All the assessed linguistic attitude components are schematized in the following table (Table 1).

The questionnaires were distributed among 820 high school students, university students, university lecturers and Academy professors. The size of the sample population was determined as per a formula developed by Krejcie and Morgan (Krejcie and Morgan 1970). Out of a total Iranian student population of 16,543,440, about 1,106,617 of them are in the third year of middle school, 128,405 of them being in Tehran (59,581 of them, boys and 68,824 of them, girls). Consulting Krejcie and Morgan's table, we conclude that a study of Tehran's middle school students would need a sample population of 384 people in order to limit the margin of error as much as possible. There are (at the time of doing the research) 175,965 university students in Tehran province (120,308 of whom are graduate students). So, for this population, too, a sample population of 384 is needed. The university teaching body in Tehran consists of 17,664 people (requiring a sample population of 376). From the Academy of Language – which has 300 professors and researchers, some of whom belonging to the teaching body as well[2]– a sample population of 60 was selected. Together, this leaves us with a sample population of 1,140. One thousand of the questionnaires were returned, 200 of which were illegible or incomplete. We were forced then to settle for a sample population of 820. The distribution of population in each group is shown in the following table (Table 2).

2. It is for this reason that we do not consider this group as separate from the former.

After collecting the questionnaires, the data were encoded and entered into the SPSS statistical software. The independent variables of this analysis were social identity and, accordingly, age. Special attention was given to these two variables, while others bearing only secondary importance. The data for age, education level, social class, and other independent variables were analyzed using intersecting or ANOVA tables. Other methods – such as X^2, Somer's, Kramers, and Kendal – were used when comparing two aggregate data totals and their interdependence. In both intersecting and ANOVA tables, it was observed that the relatively high number of readings mandates that the level of significance be set very low (0.05 percent, to be exact). The ANOVA method was used when dealing with nominal variables, and the intersecting method when dealing with ordinal variables. The results are shown in the following table (Table 3).

Conclusion

1. What is/are the main component(s) of Tehrani Persian speakers› linguistic attitude?

According to the attitude assessing test described above, affection towards Persian status seems to be the main component of Tehrani Persian speakers' linguistic attitude. Additionally, the following decreasing order of influence has been observed:

- affection towards Persian corpus,
- affection towards Persian as a language- in- education,
- awareness of Persian corpus, behavior towards Persian planning,
- awareness of Persian status,
- awareness of Persian as a language-in-education.

2. What is/are the least important component(s) among the other components?

With a significant difference, attitude towards English is considered to be the least important component of Persian speakers' linguistic attitude. To summarize, it should be noted that the most important component of linguistic attitudes of the studied groups in Tehran is the affection towards Persian status. The least important component, on the other hand, is the attitude towards English.

3. Regarding the above mentioned attitude components, how could we schematize the dominant overt and covert language planning policies?

In the case of the third question of the study, it was revealed that covert and overt Persian language policies, though quite similar and even equal in nature, differ in some key aspects. Because such a difference between overt and covert policies could potentially lead to the failure of official language plannings, it is recommended that these differential points be taken into account and analyzed in detail, for this, in turn, would improve the overt language policies and, as a result, lead to the reinforcement of the status of Persian language. Following, the observed differential points of attitudinal components between members and researches of the Persian Academy and the other three groups (high school students, university students and university lecturers) representing lay people will be briefly presented, illustrating, therefore, the status of the overt versus covert Persian language policy and, as a consequence, paving the way for determining the dominance of one of these policies over the other.

The linguistic attitudes of the first three groups considered as the covert linguistic policy contrasts to the linguistic attitudes of the last group (i.e., Persian Academy members) considered the overt policy, differing in the following aspects:

- The attitude of the Academy members towards Persian language and Persian language planning is more positive than the other groups, benefiting, therefore, from a higher level of linguistic consciousness;
- The percentage of the affection towards Persian-in-danger and the inefficiency of Persian language is less positive in the attitudes of Academy members, although their affection towards the probability of Persian language shift being less positive as compared to the other groups; furthermore, they have a more positive attitude towards Persian as a language of science;

- The Academy members have a higher anti-western attitude as compared to the other groups;
The Academy members have a lower anti-Arabic attitude as contrast to the other groups;

- The Academy members, as compared to the other three groups, have a higher tendency towards the past language planning activities and think positive of these activities;

- The Academy members have a more level of awareness of present Persian planning activities and are more adjustable to them;

- The Academy members are more aware of Persian Academy word coinage activities and insist more on the necessity of Persian word coinage. They also feel more pressure and need for coining words for scientific concepts;

- The Academy members have a considerably higher tendency towards the use of old versions of Persian (Old Persian, Middle Persian and Pahlavi);

- Persian is considered as the first and most important symbol of identity among all the four groups, with the Academy members attributing the highest symbolic functions (%79.5) to Persian, as compared to the other three groups and high school students the least symbolic functions (%17.8). Between them lie the university students and university lecturers scoring %49.8 and %60.2 percent respectively. The second immediate attribute functioning as the Persian speakers' symbols of identity are variable as amongst the four groups, ranging from good behavioral characters and flag to religion and history. This is while all the four groups under study have in the same way attributed 'history' as the third component of the Persian speakers' symbol of identity. The sum of the first three components of the speakers' identity symbol is presented in the table below (Table 5).

- According to the variable "social identity", the most significant difference is observed between the Academy members and researchers and the high school students.

The consistencies among the attitudes of the overt policy representatives and the covert policy representatives are observed in the following items: awareness of necessity of word coinage, general avoidance of excessive borrowing. After that, the gap decreases in the following order: usefulness of Arabic, awareness of past Persian plannings, necessity of word coinage, attitude towards PA word coinages, general avoidance of syntactic borrowing, attitudes towards old versions of Persian, hopefulness towards Persian improvement, probability of Persian shift and etc. The discrepancies are usually between high school students and members and researchers of Persian Academy. However, in the case of affection towards present language planning activity, university students have the minimum positive attitude.

It is also observed, as according to the results, that the percentage of Persian speakers with positive affectional attitude towards Persian and its planning is more comparing to the ones with positive awareness attitude. Among the affectional components of attitude, the most percentage is seen for positive affectional attitude towards status and language in education. Totally, only 17.8 % of the informants are considered to have high language consciousness and 32.4 % of them had positive attitude towards Persian. It was also seen that the increase of awareness and affection leads to the increase of readiness for acting towards language.

3	Purification of Persian from Arabic and English	*
4	Improvement of Persian Teaching
5	Stopping Formal Word Coinage
6	Research				*
7	Improvement of the Persian Academy			*

As is shown in the table below (Table 6), the improvement of Persian through 'propagation' has been determined as the most important factor among the four groups. The results of the study also revealed that %18.2 of the high school students chose the purification of Persian from Arabic and English, %23 of the university lecturers opted for the improvement of the Persian Academy, and % 23 of the members and researchers of the Persian academy considered doing researches on the Persian language as the ways to improve Persian. At the same time, the majority of university students proposed word coinage activities as the most important solution for the improvement of Persian.

Therefore, it is shown that, with an increase in age and education, more holistic attitudes towards language will be formed. For example, university lecturers are benefiting from more holistic attitudes towards language than university students and the latter group, in turn, shows a higher level of holistic attitude towards language as compared to high school students. The university lecturers have indirectly called for the existence of a formal institution for language planning activities. This suggestion is considered as a supportive point for the Academy and needs to be taken into consideration with thorough scientific policy-making. The proposal of the Academy regarding the need for the accomplishment of scientific researches on Persian, on the other hand, illustrates the lack of fundamental researches as the theoretical foundations for the administrative activities of the Persian Academy.

Moreover, it seems, as according to the following table (Table 7), that Persian benefits from a high level of status in the Persian speakers' point of view and as regarding the acceptance of different roles in the society, although the high percentage of the results representing the formal role for Persian is illustrative of the common belief in the multilingualism phenomenon in Iran. There is, of course, a difference between the attitudes of the high school students on the one hand, and the other three groups on the other hand towards Persian; i.e., the degree of formality of Persian in the attitudes of the former group is lower as compared to the latter group.

A possible justification of this observation could be that high school students have not yet accepted any formal roles through the socialization process in the society. Furthermore, the great majority of the students have been resident in Tehran and have grown up in a monolingual situation, being, therefore, unable to distinguish between the general and specific roles of Persian use; this is where a majority of other three groups have come from other provinces of Iran, speaking, more or less, dialects and languages different from Persian.

In respect of the positive attitudes towards different authorities for Persian Language Planning, on the other hand, is has been revealed that the ‘elites’ group has the lowest degree of the agreement (%26.4) as regarding the acceptance of the authoritative role in Persian planning, followed by ‘Every Iranian’ or ‘people’ (%30 approximately) and the ‘academicians’ (%40). ‘Translators and writers’ attained the highest level of agreement among the four groups of ‘elites, people, academicians, and translators and writers’. A possible explanation for this fact could be that they (translators and writers) have to deal with Persian language problems more than any other group. The effect of 'the media' (the Radio and TV) is more intense as compared to the 'translators and writers', and more still is the effect of the good Persian users (Table 8).

Table 8. Positive attitudes towards different authorities for Persian Language Planning.

LP Authorities	Elites	Academicians	Academicians' Word Coinage	Radio and TV	Translators and Writers	Every Iranian	People

The relatively high percentage of the high school students' ability for word coinage (%53.3) is a sign of their dynamism in the field of language planning. This is true of university students too (%61.1) and as for this, is will be of use to incorporate the high school and university students in Persian word coinage activities.

Furthermore, mention should be made of the fact that, the awareness of only %28.6 of people of the existence of the Persian Academy is suggestive of the lack of attempt to establish the Academy's language planning activities in the society.

As a conclusion, it seems that Persian language planners could concentrate on the improvement of affective component of Persian speakers' attitude. However, it is clear that affective attitudes gain their stability from awareness; i.e., awareness could build stable and consistent affections. Attempts to minimize the gaps between social groups are also recommended according to this research. Furthermore, mention should be made of the fact that the existence of long-time differences between overt and covert Persian language policies could possibly lead to some undesirable causes, causes which will gradually affect the status of Persian language and make it wear down. Persian language planners, therefore, are highly recommended to take into account such matters as the affective attitude of Persian speakers – especially the affectional attitude towards status and language in education – and help it positively progress, improving in this way the amount of language consciousness as well as increasing the readiness for acting towards language.

*Abolghasem Esmailpour Motlagh

Abstract

Jawāmeʿ al-ḥekāyāt wa lawāmeʿ al-rewāyāt (Comprehensive Anecdotes and Luminous Narratives) was written in the first decades of the 13th century AD (c. 1247-1252) by Sadīd b. Moḥammad ʿAwfī, and contains interesting information on Manichaean themes that shall be examined in this paper. The book, for instance, introduces Mānī the inventor of the Zandīqs as the last prophet. His religīion had still followers among Iranians at the time of the composition of the book (13th century AD). A new point in ʿAwfī's narrative is that he called Manichaeans as Bāṭenī (Esoterics) that shows a kind of assimilation of the Manichaeans with the sect of Bāṭenīya or Ismaʿilis. According to ʿAwfī, Mānī had traveled to India, Keshmir and Tibet, and that the people of Turkistan followed him. Mānī's journey to the western borders of India (although not to Kashmir and Tibet) and the influence of Mānīchaeism in Xin Jiang of China have been confirmed through the original Manichaean texts. Mānī told his followers that he'll go up to heaven. So, he hid himself in a cave and painted a paper scroll called Arţang (Ardahang) as a sacred book from the Lord. According to ʿAwfī, secret life was a tradition established by Mānī, and the Manichaeans rejected the strangers, a habit inherited in China through Manichaeans.

Moḥammad b. Moḥammad ʿAwfī Boḵārī Hanafī (d. after 630/1252), in the beginning of the 13th century AD, between 625/1247 and 630/1252. The book consists of 2113 anecdotes and narratives arranged in four chapters (Afshar-Shirazi 1957, 505).

While the author has provided noticeable information through the narratives and reports related to Mānī and Manichaeism based on classical Persian and Arabic sources, his exact birth date is not known, leaving us with an assumption that he was living in the latter half of the 12th to the middle of the 13th century AD. He has commented on some of the narratives in his own specific way. There are two manuscripts of the book in Nationale Biblioteque in Paris: manuscript A has been signed as the number of 2043 while manuscript B shows 2044. The first manuscript has been written in 717/1339 and the latter doesn't bear any date. This paper shall examine the sections related to Mānī and Manichaeism based on these two manuscripts with respect to new Manichaean studies.

According to ʿAwfī's claim, Mānī was the founder of the Zandīq sect and he was the leader of the Zandīqs. Although there is doubt that all the Zandīqs were Manichaeans it seems that at least up to the beginning of the 13th century AD, Mānī was regarded as the head of the Zandīqs by medieval Iranian and Arab writers. Regardless, the noticeable fact in this narrative is that "today that false claim (or religion) has survived among the people" (Ibid. 506). It means that Manichaeism had still followers in the 13th century in Iran. They were hidden under the sectarian umbrella term of Bāṭenīya. Since the 8th century AD, the Bāṭenīs became active as a mixed community consisting of some Gnostic, exaggerative and extremist sects that mainly originated from the Shiʿite part and some had also pre-Islamic Iranian or Syrian Gnostic roots (Levis 1984, 1).

ʾThis work shows that Manichaeans in Iran and Syria continued their religious and ideological life under the umbrella term of Bāṭenīya that is one of the more general names of the Ismaʿilites such as Ahl-e Bāṭen, Ahl-e Taʾwīl, Ahl-e Taʾīd etc (Frye 1985, 448). The treatise known as 'Umm'l-Ketāb belong to Ḡolāt of Kūfī at the end of 8*th* century AD explains an apocalypse with Gnostic motifs. (Petro Culianu 1987, 575) Abu'l-Ḵaṭṭāb is the first one who thought about the Bāṭenī's movement and organized it. His followers are considered as the Shiʿite Gnostics. The mentioned 'Umm'l-Ketāb which reflexes Abu'l-Ḵaṭṭāb's doctrine and his followers' notions, should be regarded as a "remind[er of] the books of Edris (Ḵenoḵ or Enoch) and Valentinian gnosis". (Frye 1985, 575) Moreover, "the first Ḵāṭṭābīya (followers of Abu'l-Ḵaṭṭāb) claimed of the divinity of the Imams and thought that it is based on the Divine Light that each Imam inherited it naturally. Also the credit of the emphasis on the Bāṭenī hermeneutics or the symbolic and allegorical exegesis of Qur'ān and the Holy Books goes back to them. The Isma`ilites took this kind of hermeneutics. They expanded and completed it" (Daftary 1998, 107).

ʿAwfī's word of Bāṭenīya, however, can be seen as a remark to Nezārian (the sect of Nezārīya) of 12th century AD who had esoteric comments on all the juridical principles, laws and traditions. (Ibid. 444) So, ʿAwfī and other historians and narrators from 9th to 13th century AD attributed the Bāṭenī beliefs to Manichaeism and knew Mānī as the founder of Zandaqe and Bāṭenīya. The Ḡolāt, a sect among Mawālī who established the main body of the extremist Shi'ites, were impressive. Non-Arab Mavālī, especially Iranian Mavālī who became Moslem purposefully, brought many old ideas – including Manichaean beliefs to Shi'ite Islam. They probably took the ideas related to the fate of soul after death and the quality of "pādāš and pādefrāh" (compensation and punishment) from Manichaeism. (Ibid. 71, 82)

2. "In the book called Āgrāż al-sīyāsa[4] it is studied that Mānī appeared at the time of Bahrām Hormoz; and he was a perfect painter and a wise geometrician; and he deceived the people and founded a false religion among the peoples; and the outline of his word was that he said that the soul which is bridged in human body is from that world and here is imprisoned and defeated in body, such as a bird in a cage and it always hits itself on the cage[5] in order to be released; it also is ready and waiting for opening of the (shutters) of the cage so that it goes to its flight and destination; and now man should try to make his pure spirit free from the agony of the oppressor Self; and he (Mānī) deceived people through this deceit and trickery and said (that) dying is better than living and temporary life has not origin."[6] (Afshar-Shirazi 1957, 507)

that the bird of Soul is imprisoned in the cage of body and the material life is not original. The motif of the most Manichaean Parthian hymn-cycles is also the salvation and deliverance of the imprisoned Light or Soul that is exactly in line with ʿAwfī's narrative. In Manichaean hymns we see that the Soul is always seeking redemption. The Soul is disappointed and cries "who will save me?" a lonely, frightened and crying Soul who is seeking the Light and freedom. Then the Saviour comes forth and says a kind and lovely word. The devils flee and good news of salvation is given to the Soul. The Soul puts on the cloth of Light and becomes free from the dark prison of body and flies to heaven as a released bird. (Esmailpour Motlagh, 2007: 192)

This Gnostic-Manichaean motif is also explained in the mystic poems of Ḥāfeẓ, the great Iranian poet:

Such a cage is not worthy of me as bearing sweet tones,
I shall go to the Garden of Paradise, that I am a bird of that green yard.[7]
(Ḥāfeẓ 2000, 333)
Or:

I am a bird of the sacred Garden, how I express the sense of departure
That how I fell at this trap of adventure.[8] (Ibid. 308)

It is obvious that this Gnostic theme originates in Manichaean gnosis, as we see the agony of the soul in one of Manichaean hymn:

Who will take me up to that happy realm?

So that joy shall be mine in union with all (its) in habitations?
(Boyce 1954, 93)
Or:

I am mixed with (this material word) and agonized
Take me out from the bosom of Death
(Boyce 1975, 102)

3. "And one of the other false men who claimed prophecy was Mānī of China; and he had many followers, and his birth-place was Babylon,[9] and his claim was mostly in the science of painting[10] ; and one of his perfect deeds of his science was that he painted on a warp of silk of which length was twenty gaz (meters); then, he took a pen and drew a circle and put a compasses on it and examined it, there was not any difference"[11] (Afshar-Shirazi 1957, 509).

In the coming pages, we shall discuss Mānī's claim of prophecy. However, the other points of this text are Mānī's birth-place and his perfect skill in the art of painting that tallies with the Manichaean authentic sources. In manuscript B of Jawāmeʿ al-ḥekāyāt we see that Mānī's birth-place is Babylon and "from a village called Mardīnū from the city of Lūyā." (Ibid.). According to Bīrūnī's writing in Chronology, directly cited from Mānī's writings, "Mānī was born in a village called Mardīnū; this village is located near the river Kūṭā Aʿlā" (Bīrūnī 1985: 309). So, ʿAwfī mentioning of the village of Mardīnū means Mardīnū, and Lūgā is an orthographical mistake of Kūṭā as W.B. Henning also confirmed this point (Henning 1977, 87-88).

As mentioned earlier, ʿAwfī's narrative on Mānī's claim of skill in the art of painting resonates with Abū'l-Maʿālī's narrative in Bayān al-adyān: "and this man was master in the art of painting; and he appeard at the time of Šāpūr b. Ardašīr. He claimed among the magi and his claim was the art of pen and painting. It is said (that) he drew a line on a piece of white silk; when they took out that warp of the silk, that line disappeared. And he made (created) a book painted with kinds

There are many points in this paragraph that are noticeable. First, Mānī was introduced as a student of Qārūn the sage. In the narratives of Masʿūdī's Morūj al-ẕahab and Gardīzī's Zayn al-aḵbār it is stated as "Qārdūn" (Afshar-Shirazi 1957, 486), and also in Bīrūnī's narrative in Chronology it is stated as "Fāderūn", and finally "Qārdūn" in Ebn al-Balḵī's Fārs-nāma that is presumably one of Alḵasīh's epithets, who was the leader of the sect of Moǧtasele (Esmailpour Motlagh 2004, 123-124).

Mānī's claim of prophecy is obvious. It was narrated in many of the sources. The unlawfulness of killing of the animals and other subjects related to the popular followers of Mānī (Niyōšāgān) correspond to Manichaean Middle Persian and Parthian original texts. In a Middle Persian text, (text w) the prohibition of killing of animals and the injuries of meat-eating are openly described (Boyce 1975, 57-58). This text is apparently addressed to Manichaean class of Wīzīdagān (the Elects), for Niyōšāgān ordinary class of Manichaeans were allowed to Important fragments of the Book of Giants have survived. The exile of Mānī to Kašmir, Tibet and Turkestān by Šāpūr has been also reported by Mīrḵwānd (d. 1525 AD) in Rowżat al-ṣafā (Mīrḵwānd 1892, 223). Mānī's journey to the north eastern part of Iran and to India is mentioned in Manichaean Middle Persian and Parthian texts to some extent. At the time of Mānī's visit in India, some parts such as Tūrān, Makrān, Pardān, some regions of India and Kūšānšahr to Paškīpūr were parts of Erānšahr according to great inscription of Šāpūr (Lieu 1992, 71). During most Parthian dynasty, these regions belonged to Kūšānian kingdom which joined in Erānšahr during Ardašīr reign. This said, Mānī's journey to China emerges as only a legend (Esmailpour Motlagh 2005, 31).

According to original Manichaean narratives, Mānī's dismissal and exile is clouded with uncertainty as he was favored by Šāpūr, and thus the king let him propagandize his religion within and outwith the Sassanian empire. Mīrḵwānd's report narrativizes the situation of the end part of Šāpūr's reign and Hormoz's period as a prince. According to a unique report of Ebn al-Balḵī's Fārs-nāma, "Hormoz killed the Zandīqs and Mānī's followers" (Ebn al-Balḵī 1921, 20). This is also confirmed by a newly discovered Uigur text reported by Professor Geng Shimin (Esmailpour Motlagh 2005, 124).

The legend of the cave and creation of Mānī's Ardahang tallies with Abū'l Maʿālī's report in Bayān al-adyān (Abū'l Maʿālī 1934, 52).

Similar to this legend is also reported in Mīrḵwānd's Rowżat al-ṣafā (Mīrḵwānd 1892, 223). ʿAwfī's report according to manuscript B shows that Mānī's Ardahang "survived up to that time (13th century AD) among the treasures of Chinese emperors" (ʿAwfī 1985, 245; Esmailpour Motlagh 2005, 86-87).

they excuse him to leave there and this is a tradition founded by Mānī; for he made them (Manichaeans) believe in the religion of Mystery (Dualism) that not a wise man arrives there and tell the corruption and falsehood of that religion; he founded that tradition so that no stranger should come to their province.[34] (Afshar-Shirazi 1957, 514)

A new bulk of research shows that Manichaeism in Turfan and Kansu is going to be declined as a result of Moslem's attack during ʿAwfī's time (13th century AD) and even a century before him at the time of Ebn al-Balk̲ī's (12th century AD). At this time, the region of Tai became the center of Manichaeism. Manichaeans in the north part of China began their underground activities, and little by little moved to the south east parts of the land and stayed there up to 11th/17th century (Lieu 1992, 271-274).

Therefore, rejection of the strangers that was regarded one of "Chinese traditions" (Afshar-Shirazi 1957, 514), is a sign of Manichaeans' survival in Chinese Turkestān or the Province of Xing Jiang, namely, people who had not any confidence in strangers to conserve their minority; thus, they did not let them join their secret meetings.

This part of ʿAwfī's report shows that Manichaeans were living in China at his time (13th century AD) and the people of K̲atāi and Uighur were part sun-worshippers (Zoroastrians), and part Christians. This point seems partially to be correct, for at that time there were still many Manichaean, Zoroastrian and Christian businessmen in central Asia and western regions of China doing business (Lieu 1992, 272). This Chinese habit in which [the people] had not any confidence in strangers goes back to Manichaean behavior.

Conclusion

Surveying seven fragments of ʿAwfī's Jawāmeʿ al-ḥekāyāt we can conclude that Manichaeans continued their religious life in Iran as sects such as Zandaqe, especially Bāṭenīya until the 13th century AD. According to this report, it was revealed that Manichaeans were living in China contemporaneously with the writer. Mānī's birth place and his claim of prophecy mentioned in the text correspond to Manichaean original texts. According to ʿAwfī, Mānī was a disciple of Qārdūn/ Fāderūn who was presumably one of al-Ḵasīh's epithets, the first moršed (leader) of the sect of Moḡtasele. The narration of Mānī's banishment and dismissal to the eastern part [of Iran] and India by Šāpūr, is probably a sign of the restrictions against Mānī at the end period of Šāpūr and during Hormoz's reign, which historically tallies with Ebn al-Balḵī in Fārs-nāma and with a new discovered Uighur text.

Abstract

The Iranian-French project resumed its archaeological work on the site of Pasargadae in the latter half of 2015, the capital founded by Cyrus the Great in the center of the ancient province of Persia. It is the first step of a program that will span over several years and during which we will gradually enrich the Pasargadae archaeological map on a large scale. In the continuity of the previous 1999-2009 programs, we tried to have a better understanding of the layout of the Achaemenid city that was developed following a new pattern where the garden, the park, plays a prominent role. We also would like to further study the territorial changes just before the Achaemenid Empire as well as after its fall until the Islamic period. To approach these topics we gather a pluridisciplinary team that carried out complementary survey works (geophysics, topography, fieldwalking, surface ceramic collection, geoarchaeology) to build a comprehensive reconstruction of the Pasargadae cityscape from the early Achaemenid to Islamic periods. The works were performed inside the protected area of the site as well as in its nearby surroundings. This article presents our methodology as well as our preliminary results. The important 2015 achievements were to demonstrate that the south Tol-e Takt hillslope is built, to firmly show that the Achaemenid/post-Achaemenid occupation extended southeast of the Royal Garden and to shed light on the ancient settlement system some kilometers north of the city core part. In the same time an important topography work has been started to accurately document the whole visible archaeological features over the site. The main fallout of these surveys is to bring to light parts of the Cyrus project for Pasargadae as well as the complex and evolving landscape of the site and its territory before and after the Achaemenid period.

Introduction

The Iranian-French project "Shiraz" resumed fieldwork in the latter half of 2015 on the World Heritage Site of Pasargadae, the Achaemenid city founded by Cyrus the Great around 550 BCE. Our 2015 campaign continued and expanded upon an earlier archaeological fieldwork, which was begun in 1999 by Rémy Boucharlat in collaboration with the Iranian Centre for Archaeological Research (ICAR) and the Parsa-Pasargadae Research Foundation (PPRF) headed at that time by Dr. Mohammad Hassan Talebian. Considering the promising results obtained between 1999 and 2008, we decided to restart archaeological fieldwork with the goal to reconstruct the contents and boundaries of the Achaemenid landscape of Pasargadae and its nearby territory by means of complementary survey methods. Past work on the site has served to define new research topics and areas to explore the core, the buffer and the environment of the protected site. It led us to widen our approach with methods and new multidisciplinary approaches previously unexplored in research at Pasargadae.

The renewed five-year Iranian-French project is managed by Dr. Kourosh Mohammadkhani (Shahid Beheshti University) and Dr. Sébastien Gondet (UMR 5133 Archéorient – Maison de l'Orient et de la Méditerranée, CNRS/Lyon 2 University). It is implemented under the agreement of the Iranian Cultural Heritage, Handicrafts & Tourism Organization (ICHTO) and in collaboration with the Iranian Centre for Archaeological Research (ICAR), headed by Dr. Hamideh Choubak, branch of the Research Institute for Cultural Heritage and Tourism (RICHT). The field research program has been built with the Parsa-Pasargadae Research Foundation (PPRF) and Hamid Fadaei, head of the Pasargadae office. The Pasargadae office also gives critical support to the work by providing access to infrastructure and by the active involvement of two additional archaeologists on the team. The project takes place within the framework of a Memorandum of Understanding for academic and research collaborations signed by the RICHT and the University Lyon 2 in 2015. Funding is provided by the French Foreign Ministry office for international archaeological collaborations. The project is supported by the French Research Institute in Iran (IFRI) and by the Lyon 2 University/National Centre for Scientific Research (CNRS) Archéorient team, a lab part of the Maison de l'Orient et de la Méditerranée Research Centre. The 2015 archaeological work of the Iranian-French mission to Pasargadae[1] and its environment was conducted between the 12th of November and the 6th of December.[2]

Revealing Pasargadae and its Territory: Recent Contributions (1999-2009)

Past archaeological fieldwork at Pasargadae led by Ernst Herzfeld (Herzfeld 1929-30), Ali Sami (Sami 1956) and David Stronach (Stronach 1978) provided accurate mapping and reconstruction

1. Our team consisted of 13 members. Aside from the authors of the present article, the team included 2 geophysicists and 4 undergraduate and graduate students in archaeology: Eng. Colas Finck (Pierre and Marie Curie University, Paris), Ebrahim Roustaei Farsi (Azad University, Tehran), Eng. Sare Ebrahimi Nia (Azad University of Abhar); Maryam Hoseini (Shiraz University); Fahimeh Shahvand (Isfahan University of Art); Tayebeh Rahimi (Tehran University).

2. We would like to thank warmly Rémy Boucharlat for his relevant scientific remarks and generally speaking for his support to the project. This restarting program has been built together with him in the continuation of the mission he has established in the early 1990s. Many thanks also to Alexander Nagel and Alfred Booth for having kindly corrected the English text of this article.

of a number of monuments on the plain, of the layout of the Royal Garden encompassing several of these buildings, and of the citadel built on the Tol-e Takt. Taking into account only the maps published by Stronach, Pasargadae appeared as a rather empty city where monumental buildings where loosely distributed over a large area. It became evident that these constructions must be considered today the only visible parts remaining from Cyrus' project at Pasargadae as a capital for ruling the province of Persia as well as his residence and final resting place. After his reign, his successors continued to develop the site that probably remained a local administrative unit and where regular celebrations were performed (Henkelmann 2008, 433-441). That is to say that the site certainly sheltered a permanent population during the Achaemenid period and long after, as has been revealed by the excavation of Stronach. At the same time, however, it became evident that Pasargadae served as a central place for the surrounding Dasht-e Morghab plain. Its environment must have been managed to supply Pasargadae with various farming products, raw materials and water. An absence of sufficient data on these aspects prevented us from drawing more conclusions about the past. Thus, the image of an empty site placed in an empty region resembling the idea of a nomad camp (Herzfeld 1935, 28) has been transmitted for a while.

Until recently, archaeological fieldwork at Pasargadae and its territory has shown an important breakdown in the research strategies. The most recent contributions from Iranian teams as well as international research collaborations were firmly oriented towards a better understanding of the archaeological landscape of the city and its hinterland. Between 1999 and 2009, an Iranian-French project began mapping the site by means of innovative methodological approaches: geophysical surveys complemented by archaeological, topographical and aerial kite photography surveys.

The comprehensive study of the site enabled researchers to reveal parts of the city's layout (Boucharlat and Benech 2002, Mohammadkhani 2006, Boucharlat, Benech and Gondet 2012). The surveys have firmly demonstrated that Pasargadae extended far beyond the central Royal Garden, the Tol-e Takt and the Cyrus tomb (Fig. 1). Based on the results of geophysical inspection, researchers were able to document other previously unknown built areas on the site. Within the polygonal wall to the north of the Tol-e Takt, a complex of buildings was partly mapped within the fortified area. It has been demonstrated that the southeastern limit of the Royal Garden corresponds to a large elongated trapezoidal basin crossed by the bridge next to the Palace S. Also along the southeastern limits of this basin, some features indicate parts of a larger settled area extending further east on the plain. A series of ditches and/or a canal system was identified encompassing the so-called Zendan-i Soleiman tower and a related monumental building nearby (Boucharlat 2003, Benech, Boucharlat and Gondet 2012, 20-23). These ditches followed the same orientation as the stone canal networks known further south. This evidence draws a common layout encompassing all monuments and built sectors on the plain and brings to light the existence of a large park, i.e. the "paradise" of Pasargadae, extending beyond the Royal Garden (Boucharlat 2009, Boucharlat 2011). Taken together, these interrelated buildings and sectors, distributed over at least 300 ha, reveal the original settlement pattern, considered by Cyrus, as an open and diffuse cityscape without a densely built core defining the center of the city.

However, questions remained regarding the chronology of the built environment and the development which could have been different for each of the separate sectors documented. Generally speaking, the chronology of the sectors remains a subject of debate, since the publication of the excavations on the Tol-e Takt by Stronach. Then in 2006 and 2007, an Iranian-Italian team implemented several soundings in the west part of the Tol-e Takt. This work allowed them to better define the chronology of the Achaemenid/post-Achaemenid phases thanks to new radiocarbon dating (Askari Chaverdi and Callieri 2010) and to suggest, for example, that the Citadel might have seen changes at the end of the 5th century (Callieri and Askari Chaverdi 2013, 705-706).

During the 2000's, the hinterland of Pasargadae was also the object of important archaeological fieldwork. Data were retrieved from an international rescue excavation program carried in the Tang-e Bulaghi valley during the years 2005-2007 during the building of a recent dam across the Sivand River further to the south. These rescue excavations brought to light a vivid picture of what could be the settlement system during the Achaemenid period in an area located next to Pasargadae and most probably placed under its administrative scope: several small rural settlements were excavated, including farmsteads (Askari Chaverdi and Callieri 2009), stock houses (Asadi and Kaim 2009, Helwing and Seyyedin 2009) and a pavilion (Atai and Boucharlat 2009, Boucharlat 2014a). It appears that long canals running along both sides of the valley supplied these structures with water (Atai and Boucharlat 2009: 23-32).

Achaemenid territorial development and expansion were based on water control and a network of interrelated small farming settlements. This pattern seems to have been established further on the Dasht-e Morghab plain, at least north of Pasargadae, as has been tentatively shown through the results of the large scale surveys from an Iranian-Japanese project (Yamauchi and Nishiyama 2008). The Iranian-Japanese team pointed out several new Achaemenid settlements associated with remains of ancient canals. At the same time, results from the Iranian-French comprehensive studies on the remains of dams and canals on two connected dams, located near the Shahidabad village thirty kilometers north of Pasargadae, provided evidence that the water was regionally controlled by the Achaemenids (Asadi et al. 2010, De Schacht et al. 2012). This water control was conceived at the scale of the Sivand upper catchment basin to supply Pasargadae and its territory with water and to protect it from floods. Geomorphological studies allowed us to assess the past variations of the Sivand River flow (Rigot 2010). Taken together, the hydraulic remains are proof that the foundation of Pasargadae required a monumental and complex reshaping of its nearby territory, which had probably been deserted before the Achaemenid period.

Aims and Methods of the Current Iranian-French Project

During these recent fieldwork projects, new questions concerning the study of the Pasargadae city and its territory were developed as most of the issues raised above needed further investigations (Boucharlat, Benech and Gondet 2012, 28-35, Boucharlat 2014b). These new questions formed the basis of our new research project which has now been calibrated by considering the necessity of the conservation of the site and the preservation of the heritage in its surrounding protection area (Talebian 2014, Nagel 2016). Our program can be divided into the six main following topics:

1- Defining the urbanization processes and the town-planning layout: after several years of geophysical surveys on Pasargadae, several blank areas still remain. They have to be filled in order to have a more comprehensive reconstruction of the Pasargadae cityscape. We need to complete the map of the city southwest towards the tomb of Cyrus in order to assess if it was placed within the "paradise" as asserted by the Greek authors. We also wish to extend the survey from the Royal Garden area towards the eastern slope of the Tol-e Takt and further beyond towards the fortified area that we intend to cover entirely. Finally, the presence of a built area east of the large trapezoidal basin needs to be better characterized. The geophysical surveys, using the routine magnetic method as well as innovative electromagnetic ones, will be carried out at the same time for more accurate topographic works. We intend to work on the base map of the site recently made by the Pasargadae office by surveying and drawing the entire remains visible on the surface.

2- Limits of the Pasargadae urban area and settlement pattern of its nearby territory: the cityscape of Pasargadae was very open, including parks, gardens, fields and/or orchards as well as built sectors within the same layout. This pattern questions our ability to delineate the city of Pasargadae. It is highly possible that the urban and rural spheres were fully integrated within a same, shared landscape. We should be able to reveal the extent of the urbanized area only by systematic archaeological surveys in the Pasargadae buffer zone and by accurately defining the dating, the plan and the function of all the settled places identified so far. At the same time, we will compare the farming management near Pasargadae with information revealed from the preventive excavations in the Tang-e Bulaghi. Finally, our other objective is to tackle the still enigmatic question of the burial customs during the occupation phases of Pasargadae by visiting and recording all the funerary remains. Completing such an archaeological map is also closely linked to the objectives of the Pasargadae office in charge of the long term preservation of the heritage around the site.

3- Chronological dynamics: during the first phases of our extensive work, we approached only slightly the chronological aspects of the development of Pasargadae and its territory. Indeed, we needed first to get a better overview of the layout before carrying out more careful studies on the dating of the several settled areas revealed. However, our suggested reconstruction of the cityscape divided into separated sectors raises the question of their dating as they could have been developed in several stages and have been occupied before or reoccupied after the Achaemenid period. We will approach the question of the development dynamics of the Pasargadae urban space by systematic mapping and collecting the surface ceramic sherds on the site. At the same time the archaeological surveys in the Pasargadae buffer zone will allow us to insert the Pasargadae foundation into the long-term settlement dynamics of the Dasht-e Morghab plain.

4- Water control in the Sivand catchment basin: previous studies have revealed a lot of data concerning the Achaemenid regional water control customs. If we can rely upon a good general reconstruction of this system, more accurate data are needed particularly concerning the function and the dating of some of the dams and canals that formed the still visible framework of the wider Achaemenid territorial management of the Pasargadae region. As an example, we know a several-kilometers long canal network, known as Gur-e Dokhtar, running across the eastern part of the Dasht-e Morghab plain. It has been said that it must be dated back only to the Islamic era, but recent studies implemented by the Pasargadae office at a large Achaemenid site called Miyan Jade have demonstrated that it is probably linked to this canal. Further south this canal system seems to be linked to a long dam built at the southeastern end of the plain. Our works will include the accurate mapping of the hydraulic infrastructures and the dating by means of radiocarbon and/or OSL methods. Thus the focus on the water control is also an entry point to consider the regional settlement pattern.

5- Environmental characteristics and changes: until now little is known concerning the past environmental background of the Pasargadae region. First, this question needs to be approached by a better defining the present day environmental settings: climate, hydrology, geology, soils, geomorphology, and vegetation. Data are already available but we lack a comprehensive study and model of the present environment. Based on this core work, we intend to gradually reconstruct the environmental background of past times by means of comprehensive and interdisciplinary geo-archaeological approaches. Following closely the former phases of the Iranian-French project, we have already studied the fluvial deposits and suggested a general reconstruction of the past river changes that still needs to be better defined. This question is critical because it concerns the water availability that will also be approached by studying the numerous springs of the Morghab plain. Another highly relevant topic, closely linked to the water availability and climate changes, is the region's history of vegetation that will be studied through palynology. It concerns the determination of the natural and the cultivated vegetation at the regional scale as well as, at the Pasargadae site scale, the study of the species growing in the Royal Garden.

Preliminary Results of the Fall 2015 Campaign

The work implemented during the fall 2015 has mainly concerned points 1 to 3 of the program presented above. That is to say that we focused our works on the archaeology of the Pasargadae site and its surrounding territories. The wider survey of the Achaemenid water control system as well as the palaeo-environmental studies were the subject of a second mission carried out during the second half of June 2016 that brought together a team made up of a hydrologist, a geomorphologist and a palynologist. Writing the report concerning this second mission is still ongoing and several soil samples collected in the Royal Garden as well as on several hydraulic constructions in the plain are still under examination in various laboratories.

In fall 2015 we implemented various complementary survey methods: field-walking surveys, systematic mapping and collecting surface ceramics, topography, geophysics and aerial photography by kite. We focused on two areas (Fig. 2): (1) the Pasargadae protected site, and (2) its vicinity including the Abulvardi area, 3 km north of the Palace P, including the Tol-e Gholam hill range that surrounds a small plain located north of the Abulvardi village and west of the Dehno village. Within the general framework of our project, the main goals for the 2015 season were the following:

- To continue the mapping of Pasargadae by means of geophysical methods and at the same time to start the topographical survey of the remains visible on the surface of the site.

- To gain a better occupation chronology of some of the previously revealed settled sectors of the city by means of the mapping, the systematic collection and the study of the surface ceramics sherds.

- To start, in the Abulvardi area, the systematic archaeological survey of the Pasargadae's vicinity.

Mapping the Pasargadae City

Magnetic surveys

Encouraged by the promising results of the 1999-2008 geophysical survey campaigns (Benech, Boucharlat and Gondet 2012), we have decided to continue investigating the site using the same instrumentation, i.e. a cesium gradiometer providing magnetic maps of the subsoil. The 2015 surveys were carried out in three sectors (Fig. 3). The first corresponds to the fortified sector located to the northeast of the site, beyond the Tol-e Takt. The second is located southeast of the Tol-e Takt hill where we surveyed an area extending on the hillslope to the plain and encompassing a small hill located some hundred meters to the south of the Tol-e Takt hill. Finally, several areas chosen southwest of the Palace S, towards the tomb of Cyrus, were investigated.

The maps obtained within the fortified area have shown an extension of the architectural elements as revealed after our previous surveys.

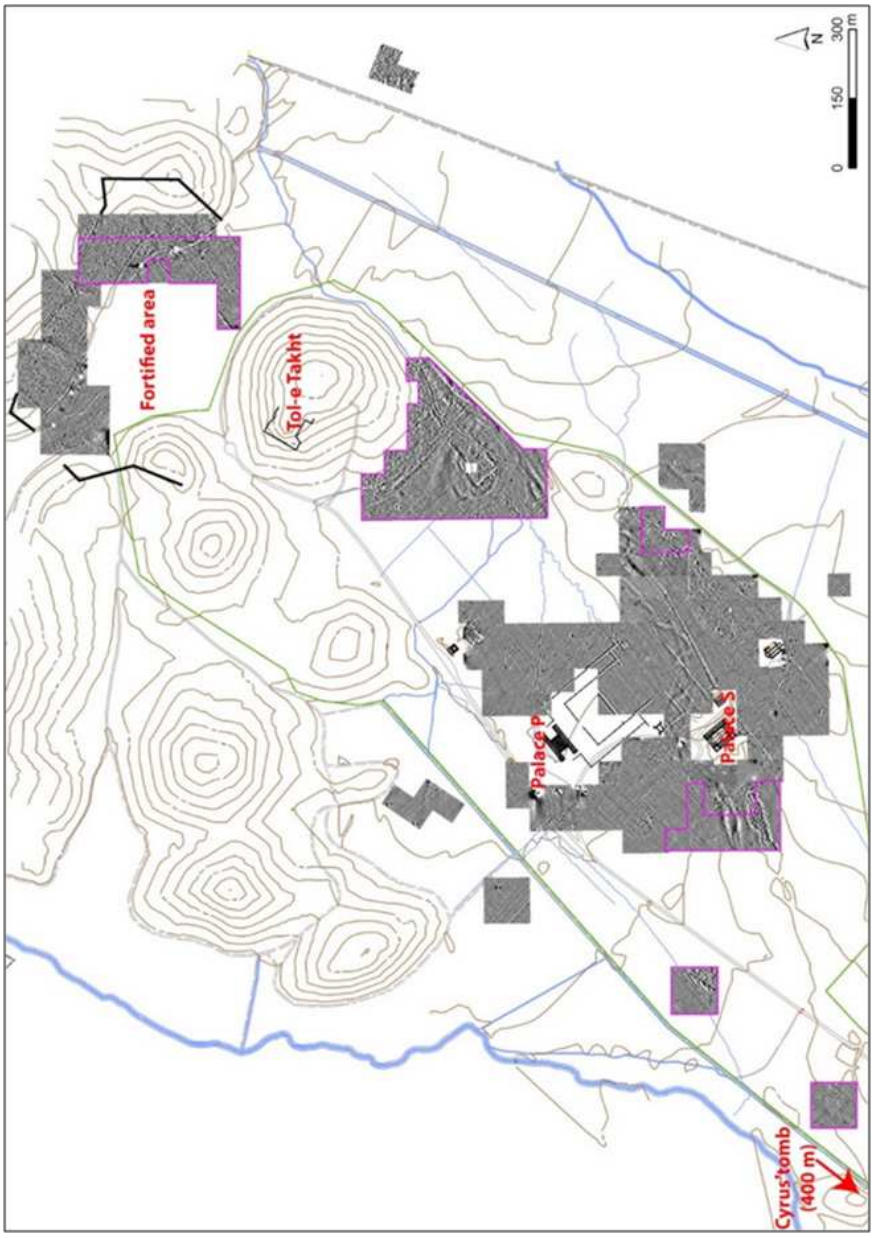

Fig. 3: Magnetic surveys carried out at Pasargadae since 1999 (Benech, Boucharlat and Gondet 2011 for the surveys prior to 2015; the new areas surveyed in 2015 are outlined in purple. Fig. 4: Magnetic map of the sector surveyed southwest of the Tol-e Takht hill overlaid by an interpretative scheme. Red area = built slope, red plain lines = large features around the small hill, red dashed lines = long structures running towards the plain.

The neighboring buildings were made of lines of rooms, not larger than 100 m², generally built parallel to the slope. The 2015 results attest that the hillslopes beyond the Tol-e Takt were densely built. Southwest of the Palace S the surveys were implemented to test several areas in the direction of the tomb of Cyrus. The results are promising because elements of a grid system (ditches or pathways) and a small part of a possible built area have been revealed. The surveys in that direction need to be extended during future campaigns to compile a more comprehensive map of this sector. Finally the most interesting results have been obtained southeast of the Tol-e Takt where almost 9 ha were mapped. We focused on this area since the team of the Pasargadae office discovered there, in 2012, several scattered Achaemenid architectural stone blocks (a threshold and a column fragment).

The map obtained southwest of the Tol-e Takt is very informative (Fig. 4). First, it demonstrates that the southern hillslope was densely built and parts of several quadrangle buildings are visible, particularly at the foothill. Another interesting result concerns the limit between the built slope and the plain that seems to be outlined by a long, linear and continuous feature. It might be a wall or a rampart that would be an extension of the fortification line running on the hilltops beyond the Tol-e Takt. This hypothesis needs to be confirmed with new surveys of that sector in a future season. If confirmed, previous reconstructions of the northeastern part of Pasargadae would need to be corrected: during a period that needs to be precisely dated and compared to the occupation phases brought to light on the Takht (from early Achaemenid to post-Achaemenid-Seleucid and later Islamic), the buildings standing on the platform of the Tol-e Takt would have overlooked a densely built and walled sector extending not only towards north but also onto the hillslopes. Towards the southwest, on the plain, we can observe several parallel lines in the similar orientation that some of the features revealed on the slope. They could correspond to pathways or drains running from the hill towards the plain. Finally, south of the hill, our map indicates long linear features, probably large walls that once encircled a small hill. Because of the recent agricultural activities in this area it is hard to determine if these features are connected to the possible above-mentioned wall, running along the hillslope. Nevertheless, a continuation of the built and walled area towards the south and the small hill is a hypothesis to take into account. In this place, the complementary topographical works will give us some answers as several wall basements are visible on the surface; they will be complemented by surveys of the surface ceramic which are needed to better date the occupation on this strategic area.

Topographic Surveys

A part of the topographic plan of visible surface remains of the Pasargadae protected site was established in 2015 with a total station on an area of about 50 ha, ranging from north to south between the

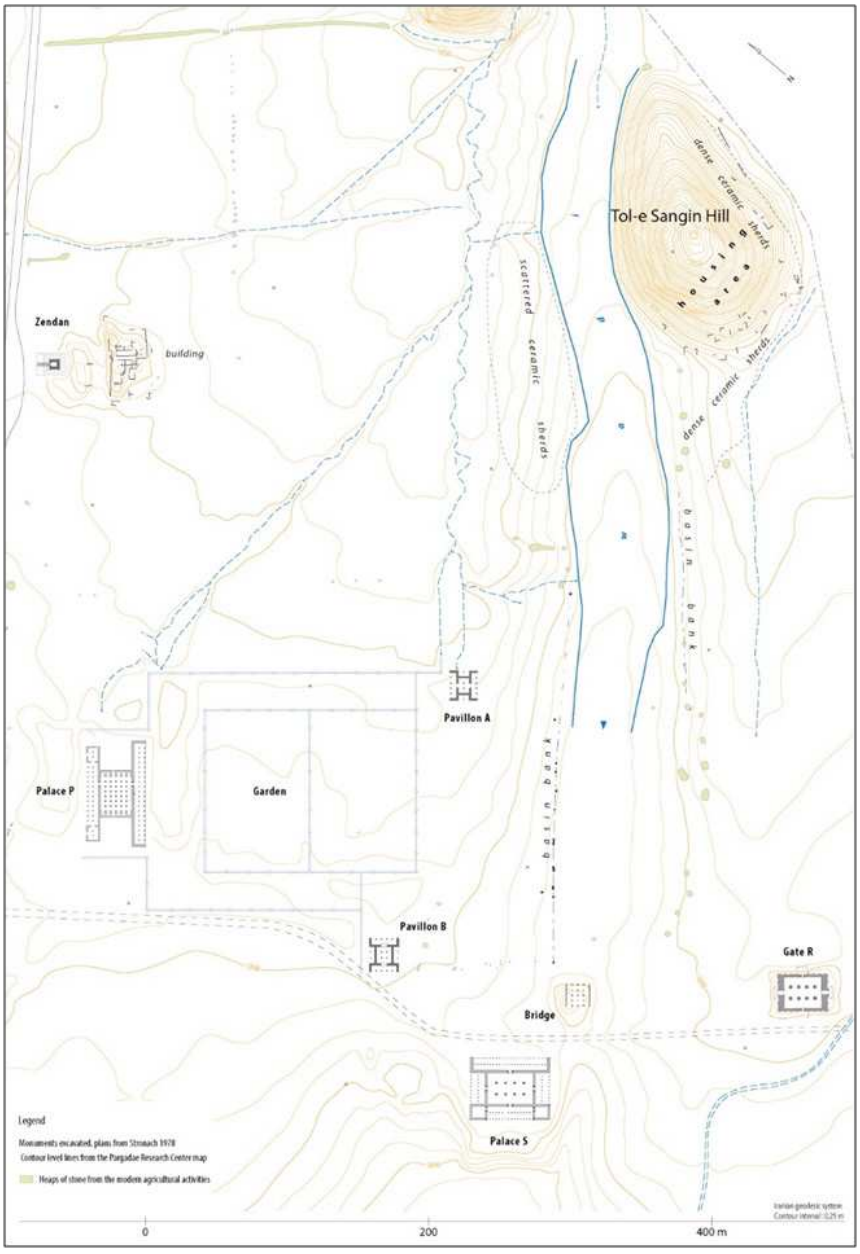

Fig. 5: Extract of the 2015 topographic map. Archaeological features are drawn on the topographic base map recently produced by the Pasargadae office (Topographic surveys: D. Laisney).

Tol-e-Takht foothill and the Palace S and from west to east between the asphalted road and the fence protecting the site. Traces of agricultural activities, like heaps of stones as well as canals (Fig. 5), have been drawn. Concerning the canals, we can distinguish that some have been abandoned more recently than others. In the future we need to assess which could have been in use during the Achaemenid period and were linked with the park. Built features have also been detected that echo the result of the geophysical surveys. Lines of limestone blocks north of the bridge correspond to the banks of the large basin southeast of the Royal Garden. Behind the tower of Zendan-e Soleiman, on a slight hill, several walls were identified and recorded with denser level points in order to draw an accurate topographic map of this zone with level lines. On this hill we found a large building linked to the tower, as mapped by geophysics, and lying southeast of it. Finally, new settled sectors were revealed. Several areas with ceramic sherds have been delineated. The ruins of walls were found and two housing areas with archaeological material (ceramic sherds, limestone blocks, grindstone, ...) have been identified, generally located on the foothills. They will need to be better dated during our future campaigns.

Systematic Collection of Surface Ceramic Sherds

According to our previous results coming from the geophysical surveys, several questions have been raised concerning the exact nature and dating of several of the settled sectors revealed. One of the solutions to approach these questions is to accurately map and to collect the surface ceramics at strategic places. Two areas were surveyed in 2015: southeast of the large trapezoidal basin revealed by previous geophysical surveys; northwest of the fortified area beyond the Tol-e Takt. The sherds have been picked up at each meter along transects and within a 20x20 m grid. Afterwards the sherds have been sorted to select the diagnostic ones that have then been described and drawn. All sherds have been stocked in the storeroom of the Pasargadae office. We will focus on the results coming from the surveyed areas located to the southeast of the basin (Fig. 6). It ranges to the northeast from a hill named Tol-e Sangin towards the bridge spanning the basin and placed in the axis of the Gate

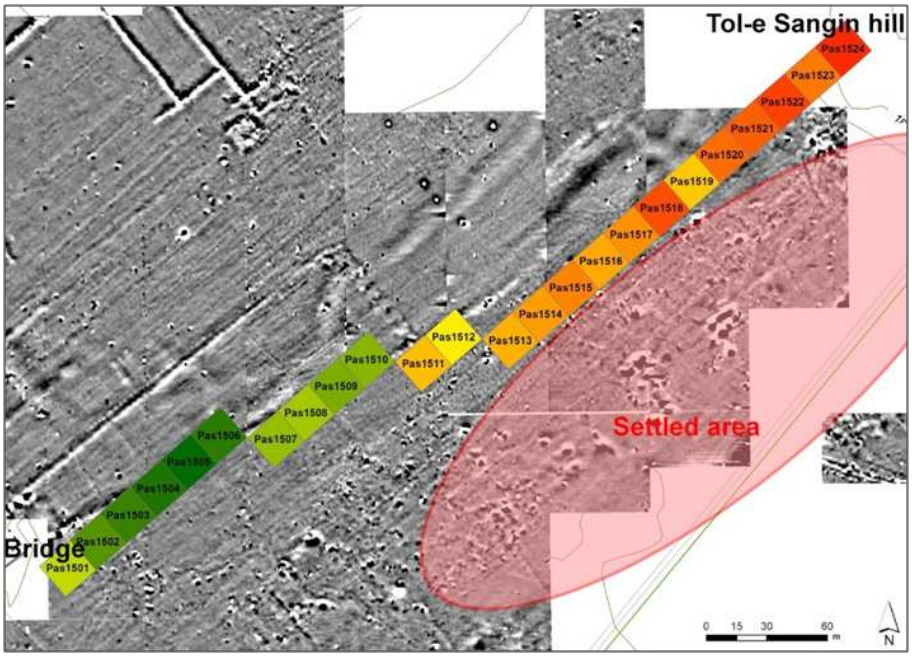

Fig. 6: Magnetic map (1999-2008 results) of the area located in between the bridge and the Tol-e Takht hill overlaid by the ceramic density map (from dark green 0.01 sherd/m² to red 2.5 sherds/m²). The location of the settled area revealed by geophysical surveys is outlined in red (Ceramic surveys: all team members).

R. The area has been chosen because the magnetic maps have shown that a settled sector would have spread along the southeastern bank of the basin. Then our goals were to firmly demonstrate the presence of a built sector by mapping the ceramics and eventually to date it.

The first information comes from the density map where it can be observed that the ceramic concentration increases from the southwest to the northeast. This increase is not steady and we can observe a sharp change 200 m northeast of the bridge. From almost no sherds as far as this point, the ceramics concentration reaches 2.5 sherds/m² and remains quite constant as far as the southern slope of the Tol-e Sangin hill. It means that a settled area stood there, a result that fits with the geophysical results that revealed a built area over the same place, the demonstration confirmed by overlaying the sherd density map and the magnetic map. We are now certain that a built sector of the city, probably of residential nature, stood there. The other important information comes from the type of ceramic we have collected. From the bridge as far as the three last squares, the types are comparable to those of the period 2 and 3 from the Tol-e Takt Citadel excavation, as described by Stronach. It means that the ceramics, as well as the settled sector, date back to the Achaemenid/post-Achaemenid period. On the three last squares, i.e. on the southern slope of the Tol-e Sangin hill, the ceramic assemblage changes. We can find some sherds dating back from the Sassanid period to the early Islamic that are probably linked to a housing area revealed during the topographic surveys (Fig. 5). They demonstrate that the hill was probably occupied long after the Achaemenid/post-Achaemenid period.

Survey of the Abulvardi Area

Within the framework of our task to map the archaeological remains of the territory surrounding the Pasargadae protected site, we decided to focus our surveys (field-walking and topographic surveys as well as aerial kite photographs) on an area of approximately 10 km² located around a small plain northeast of the Abulvardi village. We chose this area because surveys in 2005 and 2007 from an Iranian-Japanese team (Yamauchi and Nishiyama 2008) demonstrated rich archaeological evidence of various natures: ancient canals, long walls, settlements including two dated back to the Achaemenid period, numerous burial cairn remains. If some of the archaeological evidence was known then, it has not been accurately studied and mapped until now and the area was not systematically surveyed during the former Iranian-Japanese campaigns, based mainly on satellite image interpretation. Two groups of our team were involved in the study of the Abulvardi area: one focusing on the settlements and infrastructure remains; the second surveying the burial remains.

Hydraulic Remains and Settlement Pattern

One objective of the surveys in this area was to define the type and length of the canal located on the east side of Tol-e Gholam hills complex, partly drawn on the maps published by the Iranian-Japanese team. The canal is about 4.5 km long (Fig. 7), its width is between 1.40 m and 1.70 m and its depth is probably between 0.60-0.80 m. Connected to this main canal a number of smaller ones have been identified running towards the plain to irrigate it. Topographic measures have established that the canal has a relatively regular slope between 0.06 and 0.07 % form northeast to southwest. We have not been able to locate the origin nor the end of this canal. The hypothesis that could be advanced, after examining satellite imagery and reconnaissance on the ground, is that the canal is supplied by a spring located to the north of the Dehno village; but this needs to be studied during the next missions. The Iranian-Japanese team proposed that two other canals run parallel to the one mentioned above. After our reexaminations, we suggest that there is only one canal channel. What looked like other canals is in fact a terracing system used as a substructure for the canal and to contain possible landslides.

Linked to this canal we have surveyed several settlements. One would be Achaemenid in date (BV15007 on Fig. 7) and was identified by the Iranian-Japanese mission as a "watch tower" because the site is placed on the top of a hill. But we have observed that the hill where the so called "watch tower" was placed is lower than the other surrounding hills which dismisses a control function for this site. The survey on this 2.5 ha site has brought to light some interesting data: it would seem the type of soil located at the top is different from that below. It is produced from the erosion of clayish material and could come from a platform or structure that stood there. This upper part of the site has been subject to illegal excavations and in one trench some fragments of human bones have been identified. This might suggest that the building placed on the top of the hill was reused as a funerary place. Along the southeast side of the site, we have identified an area with potsherds dating back to the Achaemenid/Post-Achaemenid period as well as several wall or terrace sections spread over the entire lower part of the hillslope. A second Achaemenid "watch tower" (BV15008) was identified by the Iranian-Japanese team but it corresponds to an Islamic building located on a small hill. Finally, a multi-period site has been found southwest of Dehno (BV15009). The pottery on the surface testifies to various occupation periods from the protohistoric to Islamic periods. A small amount of Achaemenid/post-Achaemenid pottery was located on the east side of hill. The other settlements found in the area are often difficult to date, although one is certainly early Islamic (BV15002).

Burial Remains

The Iranian-Japanese survey conducted on the Tol-e Gholam hills was resumed in 2015, focusing on the cairns and funerary landscape of the Abulvardi area with three main objectives:

- To complete the map of the burials
- To clarify the chronological and cultural contexts of cairns
- To study the nature of burial practice on the Morghab Plain during historical periods.

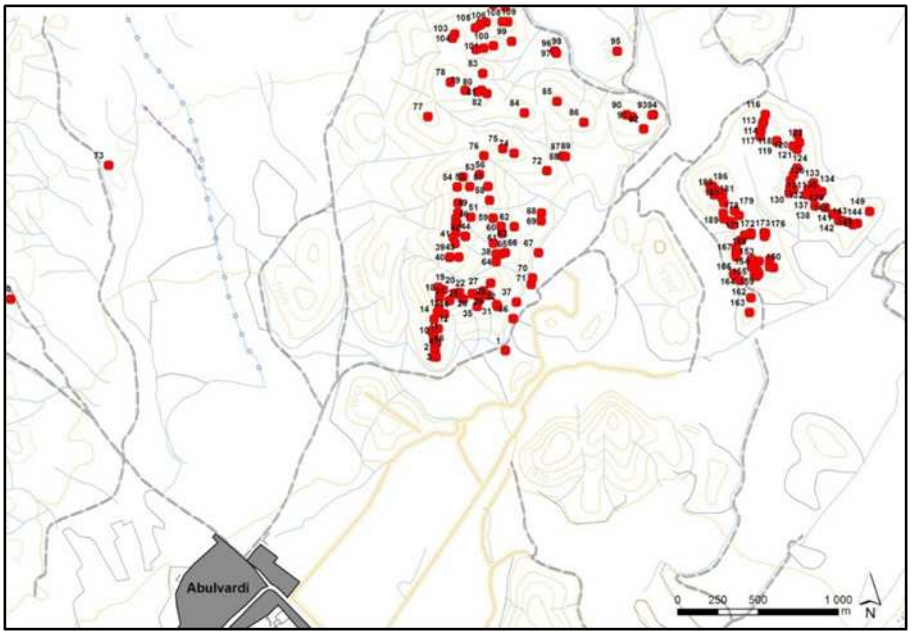

Fig. 8: Location map of the burial cairns surveyed in the North Abulvardi Plain area, on the Tol-e Gholam hills (Survey: M. Farjamirad, H. Karami).

Despite the fact that many of the cairns were completely ruined due to illegal excavations, our surveys allowed us to draw some interesting remarks and have highlighted the importance of funerary remains of Tol-e Gholam for further archaeological studies. Cairns at Tol-e Gholam (Fig. 8) were built with local stone blocks on a rocky surface. With no exception, all contained one or several rectangular burial chambers locked and sealed by several stone slabs and then covered by piles of stones. Preliminary observations indicate that burial chambers were not filled by soil after inhumation. Based on extent and dimensions, we were able to identify three groups of cairns:

1. Large cairns were only located on the highest parts of the hills with equal distances from each other. These cairns are between ca. 10.00 to 15.00 m in diameter. They consist of one, two or several rectangular burial chambers. The dimensions of the burial chambers within differ between ca. 1.50 m by 3.00 m and ca. 0.70 m by 1.00 m.

2. Medium-sized cairns were situated slightly below the large-sized cairns, mostly on the eastern slopes of the hills. Like the large-sized group, cairns of this group contain one or several burial chambers. These cairns are ca. 5.00 to 9.00 m in diameter. The size of the burial chambers varies between 1.00 m by 2.00 m and 0.50 m by 1.00 m.

3. The smallest cairns were mainly located on the foot of the slopes near the plain. Based on our preliminary observations, small cairns only contained one burial chamber that measured between ca. 2.50 and 4.50 m in diameter.

The positioning and distribution of the cairns may imply information about the social position of the tomb owners. The large-sized cairns with several burial chambers would suggest that the tomb owners were of a high-ranking social class while small-sized cairns on the foot slopes of the hills could have belonged to the middle class. However, other explanations must be considered, such as gender or age dictated distinctions. Further analysis and fieldwork will certainly enable us to answer these questions. The type of burial, the accurate orientations of the chamber (most often destroyed) and body treatments remains enigmatic, but the measurements of burial chambers in large and medium-sized cairns may suggest that body positioning was the same in all cairns. These hypotheses need to be further examined, taking into account the former studies on other cairn sites in Iran.

Material remains found during the surveys included potsherds scattered in the tomb chambers and around the cairns. While it proved difficult to determine precise chronologies, since most of the materials were not diagnostic, the evidence included types of pottery known as “festoon ware”. Parallel examples of “festoon ware” were reported from Nahavand in western Iran where they have been dated to the post-Achaemenid and Seleucid periods (Haerinck 1983, 98–100; Rahbar et al. 2014, 301-329). However, this single evidence can hardly offer a firm date to the funerary landscape of Abulvardi area and Tol-e Gholam. We also recorded and sampled bone fragments. Due to the poor preservation of the cairns, the bone materials had been severely damaged and disturbed previously. Hence, we could only recover some partial bones and numerous teeth that possibly belonged to both human and domestic animals. These bones were sent to the laboratory of Tehran University for further studies. We are looking forward to the results of the laboratory analysis which might offer us insights into both the chronology and context of some of the cairns.

Conclusive Remarks

In the Pasargadae protected site and thanks to the geophysical surveys, we have revealed a new settled area: the southern slope of the Tol-e Takt was certainly densely built and maybe fortified. Beyond the hill we have continued to demonstrate that the fortified sector northeast of the site was settled. Altogether, these results demonstrate that a single fortified settlement might have stood around the Tol-e Takt hill during a period that still needs to be better studied. The geophysical surveys to the southwest of Palace S enabled us to identify features which need to be better characterized by future works. Important results came from the systematic mapping and collection of surface potsherds. The presence of settled sectors beyond the Tol-e Takt as well as east of the Royal Garden has been confirmed. A more in-depth study of the ceramics from these sectors is planned in future seasons to add answers to the chronological question. Finally, the topographic work allows us to correct and enhance existing maps of the site, in order to gain a better understanding of the dynamics of its development.

The data gathered in the Abulvardi area are of particular interest. There is new evidence for irrigation works in this part of the Morghab plain which supplied water to several settlements and agricultural activities in the fields. The fact that a quite large Achaemenid settlement has been proven in the Abulvardi area shows that Achaemenid/post-Achaemenid occupation was not restricted to the supposed limits of Pasargadae's "Sacred Precinct". It is necessary to continue archaeological mapping of the Pasargadae vicinity in order to reveal the Achaemenid landscape on a larger scale. At the same time, a systematic survey of the funerary landscape is crucial, as evidence from the numerous burial remains in the region would produce data to improve our knowledge about the funerary customs in the Central Fars for the 1st millennium B.C.E. The 2015 season has already demonstrated a spatial system of the cairns distribution and has allowed us to collect materials for further analyses.

Establishment of Odontometric Sexual Dimorphism in Archaeological Populations: A Case Study of Ḥasanlu

Seyedeh Mandan Kazzazi *
Elena Kranioti **

Abstract

The accurate sex estimation in skeletal remains is considered to be an important step in the reconstruction of the biological profile of unknown individual in an archaeological context. Teeth are among the most frequently recovered human tissues that remain after death as they are hard, long lasting, and resistance to post-mortem insults. In general, males have larger teeth than females and this characteristic could be used in sex estimation. Present study aimed to investigate the degree of sexual dimorphism in the permanent teeth of Ḥasanlu, the Iron Age population in the Solduz Valley (West Azerbaijan Province of Iran). The Ḥasanlu site was excavated between 1956 and 1974 by a joined expedition of the University of Pennsylvania Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology, The Metropolitan Museum of Art, and Archaeological Service of Iran. The skeletal remains of Ḥasanlu are housed at the University of Pennsylvania Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology. In total, the collection consists of 263 individuals including 184 adults and 79 subadults. Analysis of the Ḥasanlu skeletal material was conducted from April to March 2014 and a total of 51 male and 33 female adult individuals belong to Iron Age levels (V, IV, and IVB) were used for sex estimation. The cervical mesiodistal and buccolingual measurements were collected from 299 upper and lower 3rd and 4th premolar teeth using Hillson-Fitzgerald dental calliper. Discriminant function analysis was used to evaluate the accuracy of each diameter in estimating sex. The mean cervical dimensions in all teeth of males exceeded that of females. The classification accuracy ranged from 74.6% to 85% with lower 4th premolar providing the highest accuracy rate (85%) and the upper 3rd premolar providing the lowest accuracy rate (74.6%). The results indicated that cervical measurements of the premolar is a reliable method for sex estimation and is useful to predict sex in Iranian archaeological populations.

Introduction

Most studies on dental sexual dimorphism are based on the traditional mesiodistal and buccolingual crown diameters of teeth (Ditch and Rose 1972, Harris and Bailit 1987, De Vito and Saunders 1990, Acharya and Mainali 2007, Angadi et al. 2013, Khamis et al. 2014) (Fig. 1). In spite of the usefulness of these measurements, there are a number of limitations that impact their efficacy. The first limitation is the alteration of crown diameters due to the varying levels of expression of non-metric traits (Garn et al. 1968). When lower molars have extra cusps (e.g. cusp 6, cusp 7, protostylid), for example, the size of the overall tooth at the maximum dimensions of the crown increases. The second limitation, according to Hillson et al. (2005), concerns the difficulty that is normally met during measuring the mesiodistal crown diameters when the teeth are tightly fixed in the jaw. This is because when teeth are firmly wedged against the adjoining tooth, there is not enough space for the calliper points to be placed on the maximum convexity of the mesial and distal crown sides. Researchers, therefore, prefer to work with needlepoint callipers. In some cases, however, it is possible to slightly move the teeth in the jaw so that there is little access for measurements, but it is still nearly impossible to push the points far enough in. Also, there is a high risk of a delicate specimen being damaged very easily (Hillson et al. 2005). The third limitation, again as suggested by Hillson et al. (2005), is related to dental wear when recording the maximum measurement of contact points. Dental wear is the term used to describe a reduction in the size of the tooth crown, which proceeds continuously during life (Wallace 1974, Hillson 2002, Koch and Poulsen 2009). As a result of dental wear, the crown diameters are altered and the recording of dental morphology is obscured. A moderate wear of the occlusal surface of the crown can lead to a significant decrease in the mesiodistal measurement. As with the buccolingual diameter, however, only excessive dental wear can affect it (Hillson 2002). In case of extreme dental wear, all the evidence of enamel is erased and the possibilities of making measurements or morphological identifications are eliminated. This is a common problem among archaeological skeletal samples. According to a study by Van Reenen (1982) when the crown is too worn away that the dentin is exposed, the percentage of the reduction in mesiodistal length could be as much as 10%. In case of secondary dentine exposure, this percentage could reach as much as 20% (van Reenen, 1982, Fitzgerald and Hillson, 2005). To solve these issues, alternative measurements of the cervical tooth diameters were proposed by Hillson et al. (2005). The authors defined the mesiodistal cervical measurement and the buccolingual cervical measurement as "the distance between the most occlusal points of the cement-enamel junction curve on the mesial and distal sides" and "The maximum measurement at the cement-enamel junction from labial/buccal to lingual/palatal" respectively (Fig. 1). Examining a total of 2559 unworn and isolated teeth, the authors reported that the cervical tooth diameters could provide similar results to those of crown diameters. According to their study, the impact of dental wear on these measurements is relatively small which first leads to a great increase in the sample size and makes it possible to compare heavily-worn teeth of adults against less-worn teeth of juveniles. The alternative dental measurements that Hillson et al. (2005) have proposed are specifically useful to take measurements where there is only a relatively small amount of enamel crown height available. This eventually allows access to mesiodistal diameters at the cervical-enamel junction, where the surrounding teeth can no longer obscure them when are still in the jaw. Moreover, given the location of the CEJ with respect to common non-metric traits of the crown, it seems likely that they would be less affected by non-metric trait expression. According to studies, these variables and those of tooth crown are highly correlated. Therefore, it can be concluded that they represent the same genetic expression of dental metric variation that tradition crown diameters do (Hillson et al. 2005, Stojanowski 2007).

Many studies have shown that canine is the most sexually dimorphic tooth in humans (Garn et al. 1977, Nair et al. 1999, Kaushal et al. 2003, Vodanovic et al. 2007, Hassett 2011, Viciano 2015). According to Garn et al. (1966, 1967) the teeth located adjacent to the canines (lateral incisors and third premolars) are more dimorphic than the others. Some studies on crown and cervical tooth measurements have also shown significant sexual dimorphism in permanent premolar teeth (Işcan and Kedici 2003, Zorba et al. 2011, Viciano et al. 2013, Sharma et al. 2014, Tuttösí and Cardoso 2015). Zorba et al (2011) conducted a study on 133

Greek individuals (70 males and 63 females) to measure the mesiodistal and buccolingual diameters of 839 permanent teeth. According to the results of this study, the most dimorphic teeth were the third premolar, maxillary forth premolar, and mandibular second molar following canine.

The purpose of current study was to analyse the cervical tooth measurements and examine the degree of sexual dimorphism in permanent premolars of an Iranian archaeological population.

Materials and Methods

This study was conducted on skeletal remains of 84 adults from Ḥasanlu site (West Azerbaijan, Iran) (Fig. 2) dating from 1450 to 800 B.C. Ḥasanlu skeletons are stored in the University of Pennsylvania's Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology (UPM), United States. In total 299 upper and lower permanent 3rd and 4th premolar teeth of 84 skeletons (51 males, 33 females) were studied. The sex of the skeletons was estimated using Phenice (1969) and Walker (2008) methods based on the morphological features of the pelvis and skull.

Tooth measurements in this study were taken as the mesiodistal and buccolingual premolar cervical diameters proposed by Hillson et al (2005) using Hillson-Fitzgerald dental calliper. Cervical measurements were taken from right upper and lower 3rd and 4th premolars. In the case of a missing value from the right side, the left antimere was substituted. A one way ANOVA was used to determine if there was any statistical significant differences between the mean values of males and females. Two paired t-test were performed to assess the interaobserver error of the measurements and also to check if there was any statistical differences between right and left side premolars. A discriminant function classification was then carried out to determine the relationship between osteologically estimated sex and premolar size measurements using software package SPSS version 23. A Leave-one-out classification procedure was also used to demonstrate the accuracy rate of the original sample and the one created by cross-validation.

Fig 2. Tepe Ḥasanlu is located in northwest Iran
(in the province of West Azerbaijan, south of Lake Urmia).

Results

To assess the intra-observer error, mesiodistal and buccolingual cervical measurements were collected from 80 randomly selected teeth from the original sample at a different time by the same observer. The paired t-test showed that the interaobserver error associated with the measurements was relatively low ($P < 0.05$) (Table 1).

One-way ANOVA showed that males have statistically larger teeth than females for upper and lower 3rd and 4th premolars and both measurements (Table 2). The paired t-test also showed that there was no statistically significant differences between right and left side teeth.

Discriminant analysis was conducted for each tooth and measurement separately. In total 12 discriminant functions were carried out. Classification accuracy of all functions is presented in table 3. It was seen that the accuracy ranged from 66.7% to 88.2% in males and 60.7% to 82.4% in females. The total classification accuracy for upper and lower 3rd premolars was 74.6% and 82.1% and for upper and lower 4th premolars was 75% and 85% respectively. Separate discriminant analysis was also performed for mesiodistal and buccolingual measurements. The results showed that the classification rates from mesiodistal dimensions were much better than that from buccolingual dimensions. The highest accuracy was obtained from mesiodistal diameter of lower 3rd premolar with a correct classification rate of 84.3% in males (Table 3).

In all functions the accuracy in males was greater than females. The only exception was function 10 –buccolingual diameter of upper 4th premolar-which showed slightly higher accuracy on females (73.1%) than males (71.1%) (Table 3). The highest accuracy for sex classification (85%) was obtained for cervical diameters of lower 4th premolar (function 4). Discriminant analysis for mesiodistal diameter of lower 4th premolar (function 11) gave the next best classification accuracy followed by cervical diameters of lower 3rd premolar (functions 2 and 7). The lowest accuracy rate of assessing sex was obtained from buccolingual diameter of upper 3rd premolar with a correct classification rate of 60.7% in females (function 6).

Discussion

Dental sexual dimorphism has been long acknowledged (Garn et al. 1966, Ditch and Rose 1972, Hattab et al. 1997, Hillson et al. 2005, Hassett 2011, Zorba et al. 2011, Viciano et al. 2015, Tuttösí and Cardoso 2015), demonstrating that dental dimensions can be used successfully in sex diagnosis on both living individuals and skeletal remains.

In the present study, we used the cervical mesiodistal and buccolingual measurements of the upper and lower 3rd and 4th premolars for sex estimation. Studies on sexual dimorphism in tooth cervical diameters have shown that there are differences in tooth size between the two sexes and males usually have larger teeth than females (Vodanovic 2007, Viciano et al. 2011, 2013, 2015, Hassett 2011, Mujib 2014). This study also showed that upper and lower 3rd and 4th premolars were larger in males in both cervical mesiodistal and buccolingual dimensions.

Discriminant function analysis gave high classification accuracy for sex estimation (Table 3). The highest rate of accuracy was observed in cervical diameters of the lower 4th premolar (85%). This observation is in agreement with the studies conducted by Viciano et al. (2013) and Tuttösí and Cardoso (2015) which reported significant sexual dimorphism on lower 4th premolar. However, some studies on crown and cervical diameters have observed higher sexual dimorphism in upper 3rd (Zorba et al. 2011, Sharma et al. 2014) and lower 3rd premolars (Işcan and Kedici 2003). The overall accuracy for sex estimation ranged from 82.4% in females to 88.2% in males (Table 3). Our study also suggested that mesiodistal dimension was more sexually dimorphic than buccolingual dimension based on univariate analysis.

A comparison between the two sexes showed that the classification accuracy of all functions was higher for males. This result is in concordance with other studies on cervical tooth measurements (Vodanovic et al. 2008, Hassett et al. 2011, Viciano et al. 2011, 2013, 2015, Zorba et al. 2011, 2013, Mujib et al. 2014, Peckmann et al. 2015). This means that females have a greatest disparity of teeth sizes and can more often be misclassified as male or that this observation is simply a result of the sample used in this study.

In conclusion sex estimation using dental cervical measurements in an Iranian population has proven to be accurate for both original and cross-validated data. This constitutes this method of significant value for application in unknown skeletal remains from Iran around the same period (Iron age); especially taking under consideration that they are most likely to survive harsh taphonomic conditions than any other skeletal element (Anderson et al. 1995, Vodanovic et al. 2007, Fereira et al. 2008). Cervical mesiodistal and buccolingual diameters of the teeth will allow an increase in sample sizes as they can be obtained from worn teeth or teeth still in the jaw.

An Implementation of Task-based Approach in Teaching Official Persian Language to Local Speakers of the Lārī Language

Abstract

This study is aimed to design tasks for teaching official Persian language to speakers of the Lārī language, a language spoken in the southernmost of Iran and other states of the Persian Gulf with around a million speakers. The study, in this respect, is founded on the basis of the importance of tasks in language teaching. In order to teach Persian grammar to Lārī speakers, the tasks are designed according to the similarities and differences between Persian and Lārī in Verbal and Nominal phrases. The study further examines the impact of the syllabus on its applicants. The research has been conducted on the base of a quasi-experimental method. The sample included 60 students selected via purposive selection who were divided into two groups of experimental and control). The experimental group received the research-designed task-based syllabus in learning Persian and control group received their regular syllabus in schools. Having implemented the pretest, the treatment (for 24 sessions, each of which for an hour) and post-test, the data were analyzed through descriptive and inferential statistics (through SPSS). Findings revealed that experimental group outperformed in the post-test. In addition, the results showed that the treatment was effective in enhancing the Persian grammar literacy of Lārī speakers. Consequently, the researcher-made model of influential factors proved that tasks made grammar forms salient to the learner via its communicative activities.

Introduction

There is a growing awareness that languages not only play a vital role in the development and intercultural dialogues but also in strengthening co-operation and attaining quality general education. Moreover, the effect of language is notable in building inclusive knowledge societies, preserving cultural heritage and mobilizing political will that benefit the application and transformation of science and technology to sustainable developments.

On the other hand, languages are increasingly under threat due to globalization and their fading will lead to the demise of world's rich tapestry of cultural diversity. More than 50 per cent of the approximately 7000 language spoken in the world are likely to die out within a few generations and 96% of these languages are spoken by a mere 4 per cent of the world's population (Moseley 2010).

As UNESCO website (January 2013) has proposed, cultural diversity and intercultural dialogue, promotion of education and development of knowledge societies are central but they are not possible without broad and international commitment to promoting multilingualism and linguistic diversity including the prevention of endangered languages.

International mother language day was proclaimed by UNESCO General Conference in November 1999 which is celebrated yearly on the 21st of February. It should be noted that UNESCO's attention to language and multilingualism takes many forms, one of which is 'education' along with promoting inclusion and quality learning by supporting bi- and multilingual education, especially the use of mother tongue, at all levels and formal and informal settings with special attention to teacher training, literacy provision and health education (Ibid.).

Divided as a 'definitely endangered language' by the 'UNESCO Atlas of the World's Languages in Danger', Lārī is of the 14 Iranian Endangered Languages[1] which are to be preserved through research and analysis, raising awareness, supporting projects and most importantly disseminating information such as books and articles. 'Education through mother tongue', furthermore, is one of the UNESCO's five programs in addressing particular aspects of language. Consequently, it is of high significance to provide the teachers with descriptive materials of endangered languages (e.g., Lārī) to develop an appropriate educational syllabus design. Therefore, this research aims at examining the effect of task-based curriculum on Lārī speakers' knowledge of Persian grammar.

Review of Literature

Lārestan Geography and Lārī Language

Lārestan (520° 32′ E, 270° 40′ N) is located at the Southeastern part of Fars province in Iran. It's bound to Fars province from the north, to Hormozgan province from the south, to Kerman province from the east, and to Bushehr province from the west (Ahmadinya 2010). In this township there are nine districts (including Avaz, Khonj, Gerash, Fishvar, Ahel, etc.), the common language of which is Lārī (Moridi 2010). Form an etymological view, 'Lār' is derived from 'Lad' meaning 'the origin and the basis of everything'. Lārī is of the SW branch of Middle Iranian languages, and consists of nine dialects, the most difference of which is in pronunciation (Geravand 2010).

Lārī has so many similarities with Iranian languages. For example, we can take note of the ergative structure of Lārī, namely, the difference between the conjugation of transitive and intransitive verbs. The speech community of this language includes Fars province, Hormozgan Province and some of Arabic-speaking countries like United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Bahrain, Kuwait, and Oman (Khonji 2010, 15).

Researches on Lārī

A few authors have written books on this language, the most notable ones being Oskarman (1909), Ramaskowitch (1945), Veladimir Minorski (1980) and Malčanova (1982). One of the most important researchers of this area is Koji Kamioka, Japanese Professor who wrote 'Comparative Basic Vocabulary of Khonji and Lārī' in the Institute for the Study of Languages and Cultures of Asia and Africa in 1997. Furthermore, some Iranian researches like Vosughui (2005) and Eghtedari (1990) have done an invaluable number research about Lārī in various areas; yet, the most important research has been carried out by Lotfali Khonji (2009) who wrote 'Comprehensive study of Lārestani language and Khonji dialect', which is a book on the linguistic features of Lārī.

Task-based Language Approach

Why Task Method?

The development of task as a newly introduced cornerstone in language classrooms is rooted in changes against the Audiolingual method and its decline in 1960s, and also in the emphasis put on meaningful communication by researchers and curriculum designers.

Numerous factors such as an ever-increasing need to communicate and students' failure in putting their acquired knowledge into use in real life situations culminated in the establishment of CLT approach in which the major trend was towards communication. In this regard, focus on task can be viewed as a logical development of CLT or according to some commentators within CLT because task as a unit of presentation and practice gives learners a stimulation opportunity to learn and practice in real contexts. This has been considered as one of the most promising reasons of task's undeniable importance (Nunan 2006).

In the meantime, the issue of integrating skills has come under the spotlight of many researchers involved in the field of second language learning. In traditional approaches to language teaching, however, a single skill along with its different aspects has been the center of attention. In other words, language skills have been considered as discrete items in such a way that some researchers preferred to use the term synthetic or process syllabus in classroom (Wilkins 1976, Bruton 2002).

Conversely, task-based approaches and their different contexts of uses as pre-tasks and post-tasks (Skehan 2007) have the capability to integrate different language skills based on an analytic procedure as opposed to the synthetic one, and in this way they immerse students in real life communication. In actual facts, in an analytic procedure we are working through language not on language.

On the other hand, task can be of invaluable importance to those researchers interested in the cognitive processes the learners go through and the strategies they employ. The reason is that, compared with the traditional approaches which are mostly form-focused, task can better boost learning processes. Further, the significance of task can be psychologically perused. Proceeding through the effects of motivation on performing an activity, however, is beyond the scope of the present study. It suffices to mention that the motivation of completing a task and reaching the desired outcome undoubtedly plays a crucial role in getting students involved in classroom activities and also in the effectiveness of the task per se (Nunan 2006).

Task Components

The points discussed above are seen as main task characteristics here, while others are left open for future studies, including matters as arousing motivation, intensive verbal interaction, encouraging collaboration, etc. The task components discussed within the present research are as follows: condition, procedure, product, process (Willis 2001).

Various components of task have been regarded differently by many commentators. Wright in attributes two main elements to task, namely, input data and instructional questions; "...instructional questions which ask demand or even invite learners (or teachers) to perform operations in input data. The data itself may be provided by teaching material or teachers or learners. I shall term this limited set of tasks instructional tasks" (1987, 48). Nunan (1989) distinguishes task components as input, activities and goals. Particular attention has also been given to what Ellis (2003) believes to be the actual components of task which are goal, input, condition, procedure and predicted outcome (process and product). Having covered the previous assertions about task components, Ellis presents several other aspects in his analysis worth mentioning here. Goal, in Ellis's terms, serves the purpose of the designer when the learner performs a task. It can be considered that goal hereby is different from outcome in that achieving the outcome does not guarantee the fulfillment of the task designer's goal. For instance, in a "spot-the-difference" task in which learners are supposed to verbally express the differences between two relatively similar pictures, they may complete the task yet by a nonverbal means such as coloring. Input is defined as the information or instruction required to perform a task, and can be taken into account from different viewpoints, for example in terms of genre (TV show, diary, newspaper, etc.) or modality (spoken, written, graphs, etc.).

Ellis (2003) states "condition" as the general state of task, for example its authenticity, difficulty and so on. Task conditions have been examined by Robinson (2001, 2007) and Rahimpour and Hazar (2008) with respect to their effects on the amount of learner production, interaction and feedback. These kinds of tasks are referred as "participation variables" such as open and closed tasks, one-way and two-way tasks, and convergent and divergent tasks.

Procedure refers to the way a task is implemented, for example via pair- or group-work activities. This, however, must be distinguished from the concept of procedure introduced by Richards and Rodgers (2001) as the way of managing a task-based class. In task-based classes, task is considered as "syllabus specifier" i.e. language is analyzed in terms of tasks assuming behavioral objectives.

Two issues are dealt with in examining the predicted outcome, namely, process and product. Process refers to the cognitive processes which the students go through. Product, on the other hand, refers to what discussed earlier as the outcome by which task is evaluated. Generally speaking, there seems to be no clear demarcation between the terms goal and process in the analysis of task components carried out by Ellis.

Research Methodology

Contrastive Analysis and Descriptive Grammar

We are going to use a combination of descriptive and contrastive as well as a syllabus of task-based approach in grammar writing. Then the applied linguistic approach of task-based language teaching will be followed. Task-based language teaching was described earlier, namely, by contrastive approach in grammar writing as Gleason (1961, 207-8) states that this method focuses mainly on the construction patterns of language in comparison. It is useful in developing and designing materials of second language learning. The difficulties of statements of a language (target language) will be revealed in such grammar and the teacher can select the best strategy to meet and eliminate these problems.

Descriptive method of writing grammar on which the contrastive grammar is based is bringing adequate descriptions of the two languages contrasted. These descriptions must each be in terms proper to the languages being described. It is a system of some kind, in fact, recording the structural patterns discernible with corpus on which it is based and therefore assumed to have some features of the language as following:

_ It doesn't evaluate patterns in terms of any non-linguistic factors.

_ Not all patterns or continuations of patterns used have the same social significance.

Design of the Study

The study was implemented on the basis of quasi-experimental. 60 students were selected among which two intact groups were selected as the control and experimental groups, both from Lārī speakers who wanted to learn Persian. The task curriculum patterns were specified to group two (G2) and group one (G1) received no treatment.

The population of research consisted of 120 students who were homogenized by the use of average score. Finally, 60 students among them were selected as the sample. 30 students as the control group and 30 as the experimental one. It should be mentioned that all groups were mixed by the male and female equally and that's why the gender was of great importance and acted as a moderator variable in the current research. By using two groups, we wanted to analyze the effect of treatment of the syllabus of task-based and contrastive analysis on the experimental group.

Actually, to eliminate the preexisting differences in two groups and homogenize them, a pretest was employed at the beginning of the study to minimize threat to internal and external validity of the research. Three variables were presented in this research: an independent variable which was "using task syllabus", a dependent variable which was "the Lārī learners' knowledge of Persian structure" and finally gender as a modulating variable.[2]

A pretest was given then to both groups of experimental and controls to know their current level of language knowledge. It was given to the control and experimental groups at the same time and all principles of test administration were observed to ensure the reliability and the validity of the test. It means that all the conditions which were of great value in administering a test like the materials and equipment (e.g. printing test, key sheet, etc.), invigilators (who were prepared with detail instruction of administration), candidates (who were given instruction of the time, material to bring to the exam), rooms (which were well-established in equipment like table, chairs and so on), and administration (for example the time candidates were to be arrived, test distribution, etc.). Moreover, the validity of the test was confirmed by experts in university and its reliability was also reported as 0.85 through Cronbach's alpha.

The scores, eventually, were obtained and analyzed. Furthermore, the items were analyzed and the ones with distracting features or irrelevancy were omitted or modified; namely the items which were of no distinctive features between the weak and strong students were omitted, modified or changed to another item. The same was done for the items with very low level of difficulty which was answered by all of the students.

In the next step, the treatment was done over the experimental group. They were taught the syllabus on the basis of task curriculum grammatical patterns for 10 weeks (24 sessions). It's worth mentioning that 10 task syllabuses were designed based on the similarities and differences in Lārī and Persian with regard to nominal and verbal phrases. After the treatment and organizing different above stages, researcher administered a post-test of a grammatical test for all groups; it means that experimental and control group took the post-test of grammar based on what have been taught. (It should be noted that there was a two-week interval). The features of the post-test items were given at the part about the materials and would be reported by the results and the items individually at the end of this section.

Participants

As mentioned earlier, the total number of students participating in the study was 120, who were selected through purposive and random sampling method. After the group got homogeneous by the pretest, the result was 60 students participating in the population, 30 students of whom were male and the rest 30 were female. Each group of male and female was divided into two groups of experimental and control. The age of these students, who studied Persian in the second grade of primary school, ranged variously between 8 to 11 years old, a mean of 9 years. Based on what we obtained from the pretest results, they were all in the advanced level of commanding in Persian grammar due to the fact that they were students in the second grade of elementary school in and have exposed to Persian in daily life; furthermore, the pretest showed the results of scores as being at the similar level.

About the sample selection, it is to be added that sixty applicants were selected on the basis of one standard deviation (SD) lower than the mean. The mean and the SD were calculated (M≈17.00, and SD≈ 2. 00), thus the scores with one SD lower than the mean (score=15) were considered as acceptable scores. Therefore, the sixty scores were included and the rest twenty ones were excluded consequently.

It should be mentioned that all groups were at the same level of Persian proficiency at the beginning of study after the results of pretest test showed. The participants were all Lārī learners, Lārī native speakers, homogeneous in respect of the proficiency in Persian after pretest was implemented.

All experimental groups received the same instruction based on the task-based language approach (which was designed from similarities and differences between nominal and verbal phrases in Lārī and Persian) for 20 hours in 24 sessions (a sample task as well as the components are presented in Appendix I, Tables A, B, C). The instruction was a syllabus which was developed on the basis of task syllabus pattern. The syllabus included some lessons of grammar along with some tasks in order to improve the student's Persian grammar. The classes were held twice a week, as the procedure of the study took about two months and a half to accomplish.

Materials

The items of our pre-test were chosen from the contrastive analysis of nominal and verbal matters in Lārī and Persian on the subject of research. As the items of test provided here were as objective and to the point as possible, it was decided to have a thorough examination of the items and tests and regards all issues related to the subject like the issues related to the test specification of writing grammar test. They were as to specify the purpose of the test, writing specification, sampling, and the ways to write the test such as multiple choices. Therefore, the reliability and validity of items were measured by the researcher using the statistical formulas. It means the Cronbach's alpha was used to know the reliability and correlation coefficient to show the appropriateness of items. In fact, the correlation coefficient said that which item was of relationship with other items and which one is not. Usually, the degree upper then 0.6 in correlation coefficient showed that the items were of internal consistency. The reliability was reported as .85 which is considered acceptable.

There were 22 items for pre-test that were taken by the students of both control and experimental group. It should be noted that the pre-test was designed in the format of multiple-choice and all items had just one correct answer which were asked for by clear, to-the-point and short instruction in the question form. Clear instructions, in addition, were provided for each set of related questions to make the understanding of the questions easier.

Furthermore, the posttest has been developed for the sake of checking the effectiveness of our treatment. Therefore, the post-test features were the same and paralleled (comparable) as the pre-test. Thus, to implement the posttest, we went on doing the test similar to the pretest and the scores of this test, like the ones of pretest, were analyzed and the statistical data were extracted. Also, the data obtained from the scores of pre-test and post-test were compared and employed to ensure the process of treatment and the effect of our procedure during the study.

Data Analysis

To compare the scores of the two groups (including control and experimental groups) and interpret the results, the data were done through One-way ANOVA and two-way ANCOVA. Regarding the effects of task syllabus of grammatical patterns on the Lārī learners' knowledge of Persian grammar, this study aimed to see whether or not these patterns had any effects on these sorts of students including male and female ones in this study. The analysis of pretest and posttest were performed to determine the immediate effect of the treatment. That was the reason to know to what extent a treatment truly resulted in learning.

Furthermore, in order to tabulate the data gathered from the pretest, the post-test, and to perform statistical procedures, the Statistical Package for Social Science (SPSS) (version 18.0) was used.

Discussion

The current study attempted to answer this main question that whether using task-based curriculum has any effect on Iranian male and female Lārī learners' Knowledge of Persian Grammatical Patterns.

Based on what were done through analyses, descriptive analysis for the pretest and the posttest of grammar in the male experimental group, the pretest and the posttest of grammar in the male control group showed increase in the means of the posttest rather than their pretest. The descriptive analysis for the pretest and the posttest of grammar in the female experimental group and the descriptive analysis for the pretest and the posttest of grammar in the female control group of the study represented the same results. In addition, the deviation of the scores from the mean of the pretest was reduced in the post test. These findings showed that the task-based curriculum affected the male linguistic knowledge (Tables 1 and 2).

Inferential analysis of the obtained data of the one-way ANOVA done using the SPSS revealed the ‘compare means’, ‘degree of significance’, female experimental group (Table 5) showed that the higher scores of 'F' in the experimental groups were observable. This together with the experimental lower scores of the Sig. (0.00) meant that the Persian grammatical knowledge of the experimental groups both male and female increased more than the control groups. Therefore, the treatment was influential. The schematic interactions of all factors involved are presented below:

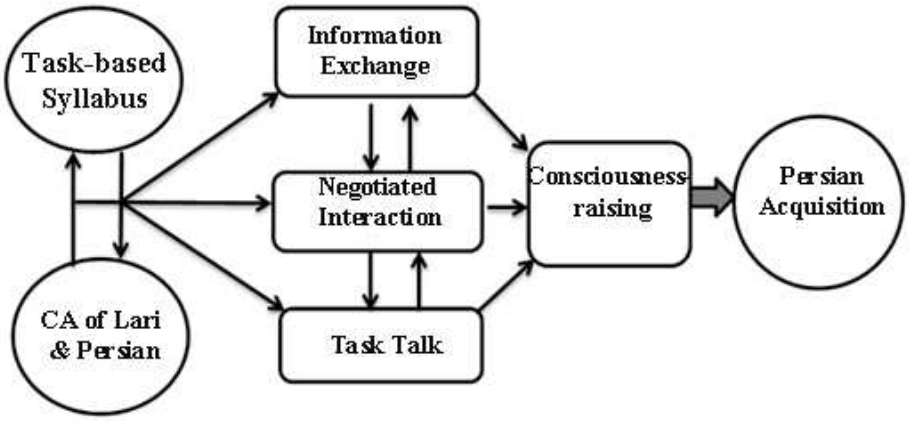

Fig. 1: The researcher-made model for interaction of factors in teaching Persian to Lari-speakers.

Conclusion

The current investigation provided support for the value of a syllabus based on a combination of task-based approach in language teaching and contrastive analysis in enhancing grammatical knowledge of Lārī speakers. Use of grammatical task-based syllabus patterns as evidenced by the significant differences found between Lārī and Persian verbal and nominal phrases for the learners in the control and experimental groups. The debate over the use of grammar has been always a challenging area of discussion over the years, at least from the advent of communicative language teaching. The research found through the data analysis that using the syllabus were influential in enhancing grammatical knowledge of Lārī speakers.

With regard to table 1, the results of ANOVA showed that the mean score of male learners of experimental group in post-test (16.93) was significantly higher than that in pre-test (11.80), whereas there was no significant difference between mean score of pre- and post-test in control group; thus, it can be inferred that the syllabus was effective in enhancing male Lārī learners of Persian. In addition, results proved that the mean score for female control group was not significant in pre- and post-test (10.40 for pre-test and11.06 for post-test); also, the ANOVA results showed that there was a significant difference between pre- and post-test in female experimental group (p=0.05); therefore, the treatment was influential in female experimental group. Thus the implementation of task based syllables on the basis of the similarities and differences within the two languages under investigation has been effective in improving the grammatical knowledge of Persian in Lārī speaking learners.

New Light on the Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis

A Codicological and Textological Survey (With Two Appendices)

Mohammad Shokri-Foumeshi *

Abstract

The Coptic ⲥⲩⲛⲁ̈ⲓⲥ (σύναξις, Synaxeis), wherein come the twenty-two chapter titles of each ⲗⲟⲅⲟⲥ (logos, chapter) of the ⲡⲉⲩⲁⲅⲅⲉⲗⲓⲟⲛ ⲉⲧⲁⲛϩ̄ (the Living Gospel,) found in Egypt (Fayyūm), contains only page-headers and is only partly legible. It helps us to reconstruct parts of the contents of Mānī's Living Gospel. Although the remaining text of the Middle Persian version of the Living Gospel contains only a part of the first chapter, the Synaxeis containing 22 logia lets us know that at least the 'second Meeting' (synaxis) of its sixth Discourse (logos, i.e. chapter) dealt with the Great Builder (Syr. bn rbʾ; MP rʾz ʿy wzrg) and that the content of the ninth chapter was about 'the coming of Jesus the Christ'. The new editions of the codex are of enormous value, giving us new, previously unimaginable information.

Keywords: Coptic Synaxeis, Manichaean Codex, Mānī's Gospel, reconstruction.

Inroduction

To reconstrate of the Turfan Iranian fragments of Mānī's Living Gospel, i.e. M17, M172/I/, m644 and m5439, and understand its contents, we need to deal with the well-known Manichaean ⲥⲩⲛⲁⲝⲉⲓⲥ (σύναξεις, Synaxeis)[1] or Commentary (Cf. Böhlig 1968, 222 ff, esp. 225) on the Living Gospel (Lieu 1994, 108-109), one of seven Coptic Manichaean codices found in Fayyūm, a town of Medinet Madi (Egypt), in 1929 and dated to circa 400 AD (Mirecki 1994, 199). Although the Synaxeis do not correspond to the Middle Persian texts of the Gospel, they aid in our understanding of both the structure and the context of the Middle Persian version. The main part of the page-headers of the Synaxeis was translated in 1988 by P. A. Mirecki and a part of the – badly damaged – texts was translated by W.-P. Funk in 2009, although tentatively. Work on the translation and the commentary on the codexes is still ongoing.

Chapter-Titles

The Synaxeis codex contains 15 chapter titles and 22 page-headers which have so far been identified and transcribed (Ibid. 206). Only four of the chapter titles reflect the themes of the respective chapters. Unfortunately, two of them are illegible. Thus, the remaining two, which have an added comment, must be considered of importance.[2] Therefore, now we know what these chapters of the Living Gospel are about.

1. Sg. σύναξις, Synaxis.

2. It is clear that we cannot exclude the other chapter titles which have no comment. As most of the chapter titles including two (or more) synaxeis contained the various themes, in comparision to those that have been formed from one synaxis, I would like here to skim through the remaining synaxeis, which have no comment. These are only the synaxeis and chapter titles that have been identified and transcribed by Mirecki. They are summarized in the following table (according to Mirecki 1988, 137-145; the Coptic text in ibid.):

for the codicological reconstruction of the codex.[5] In his new study on the Synaxeis, he believed that the Synaxeis text is the last of two texts in the codex and the first Synaxeis text is an unknown text possibly related to the Synaxeis text. He points out that there was no evidence to suggest whether this unknown Manichaean text is the lost Living Gospel or not (Mirecki 1994, 202). He continues:

The contents of the codex are closely related to the contents of the now lost Living Gospel. It may be a lengthly introduction to the Synaxeis text... . Thirty-seven extant chapter titles and page headers, many of which contain the ordinal numbering system for an unknown number of Synaxeis and for the twenty-two logoi, have been identified and transcribed (See Ibid. 202 no. 14). Most of these texts make explicit reference to the Living Gospel in a manner which suggests that the 22 chapters in the Synaxeis text were deliberately coordinated with the structure and contents of the Living Gospel. This indicates that an informed understanding of the structure and contents of the Synaxeis text ... will also give us more information about the structure and contents of the lost Living Gospel (See Ibid. 202 no. 14).

5. After a critical discussion, and according to his model, Mirecki suggests a new method for the identification of the ordinal numbering system reflected in this codex via a chart in four columns (Ibid. 204-205). His codicological reseach informs us that "the first 8 chapters of the Living Gospel have an attested minimum of 15 synaxeis in the Synaxeis text. This relatively large number of synaxeis per chapter suggests that the Manichaean author of the Synaxeis text focussed his exegetical interest on the contents of the first 8 chapters of the Living Gospel" (ibid. 205), by contrast the contents of the last 14 chapters may have been of less importance to him. In other words, the first 8 chapters could receive a minimum of 17 synaxeis from the Synaxeis author (if the silent 4th and 7th chapters had no more than one synaxis each, see column 4), while the remaining 14 chapters of the Living Gospel have only 8 synaxeis (column 2). Of course, it is quite possible, as Mirecki points out, that "the Synaxeis' author focused on those first 8 chapters for his own reasons regardless of their importance in the Living Gospel itself" (Ibid.). Nevertheless, we can assume that entire Synaxeis text had 'an estimated minimum of 31 synaxeis'. A few points can also be simply inferred from the chart: first, the Synaxeis text's author was not able to complete his work, and, for one reason or another, its composition stopped. The author had perhaps intended to write a summary of the Living Gospel, but not a translation. The Living Gospel used by the Synaxeis text's author might be in Syriac, and not in Greek or in Coptic. Secondly, in the text there is seemingly so much hastiness and imbalance that even the title of the Living Gospel comes sometimes with the full name as the Living Gospel, and occasionally as the Gospel only, while it is also sometimes omitted. Thirdly, as Mirecki emphasized, there has been a special interest in the contents of the logos A (first chapter) of the Living Gospel, as its five synaxeis show (Ibid. 206).

The above two chapter titles inform us that at least 'a Meeting of'[6] the sixth Discourse/chapter (logos) of the Living Gospel concerned itself with a 'commandment' for ⲡⲁⲁϭ ⲛⲉϥⲕⲱϯ 'the Great Architect/ Builder' (Syr. bn rb'; MP r'z 'y wzrg or r'z 'y rwšn) (Sundermann 1979, 109)[7] and the whole ninth logos of the Gospel dealt with ⲧⲟⲓⲛⲉ ⲛ̄ⲓ̄ⲏ̄ⲥ̄ ⲡⲁ̄ⲭ̄ⲥ̄ 'the coming of Jesus the Christ'. Therefore, by finding parallels for these materials we must cautiously consider the Turfan fragments dealing with these divinities. In the synaxis 'commandment for the Great Architect ... in the New Age', the myth might be related to the function of the Great Builder (who holds up a part of the universe) during the eschatological events, namely in the 'Great War', and not to his function in the Creation. We can assume that Mānī in his Gospel described the myth of Jesus Christ after the description of the myth of the Great Architect including both of these mythical themes which have been reasonably presented in the first half of the Living Gospel.

Plain Text

First Discourse (Logos)

Some parts of the Synaxeis codex, which are plain text and recently edited and tentatively[8] translated by W.-P. Funk (2009) enable us to gain more information from the Living Gospel. All the following passages of the Synaxeis would be intended to show the content of the Gospel, as far as possible. In the 'First Meeting' (1st synaxis) of the 'First Discourse' (1st logos),[9] i.e. Chapter Aleph, we read as follows:[10]

6. This is only one of at least two synaxeis for the sixth chapter.

7. For the Coptic attestations, see van Lindt 1992, 78-80.

8. Due to the very damaged papyri

9. Based upon Funk's codicological survey. Idem. 2009, 117.

10. Funk (Ibid. 116) clearly emphasizes that he reads this text "likewise as text of the Text I: (I have set apart, or sim.) ... [the living] offspring [... from] what is dead, the children of the light from (3) [the] offspring [of] darkness.

I have separated the children of the height from the offspring of the abyss, the children of God (5) from the children of the enemy.

I have distinguished the light-gods from the archons ..., etc (Funk 2009, 116).[11]

This testimony in the first person singular can hardly be far away from the following piece of the Greek version of the Gospel, where Mānī says: "I have proclaimed hope and revealed this revelation," etc. (CMC 67,11 ff.) (Apud Ibid). According to Funk (Ibid. 117), the above-mentioned text is followed by a paragraph of exhortation of the Apostle of Light as follows (246: 4-7 = Series VI, folio 24 vert.):

Text II: Be luminous, be living, be strong, [be] listeners to knowledge! Raise your ears so that your hearing organs may be filled with knowledge through the messenger of the Father of Greatness," etc (Ibid).

Then, we hear Mānī's praise of his own literary work speaking about the great secrets instructed by the twenty-two logoi of the primeval alphabet of the new Gospel as follows (247: 2-10 = Series VI, folio 23 hor.):

Text III: This is the new Gospel, the holy [...][12] of truth, the great revelation of the things of the quality of Greatness, which makes public(5) the great secrets concerning all that happened and concerning all that will happen, from the beginning to [the end] — the one that reveals and instructs about the interpretation [of the] twenty-two logoi

Living Gospel". He criticizes (Ibid. 116 no. 3) the suggestions of both Böhlig 1968, 227, and King 1992, 286-288, who believed that "these Synaxeis most probably contain excerpts from (and not commentaries on) chapters of Mānī's Living Gospel".

11. "In terms of the inventory of the manuscript PCBM 5", Funk (ibid. 116, no. 4) says that "this page is identifiable as the horizontal fibre side of the leaf labelled 'Series VI, folio 24'. In the forthcoming edition this will robably be called page 245."

of the primeval alphabet, from which the worlds borrowed and through which (10) they were sown out (Ibid. 117 no. 6).

This part of the preamble "followed by the litany of the twenty-two 'Firsts' or 'Primeval Voice' hymns[13] and concluded by another litany, which assures the readers/listeners of finding in this work what they are looking for" (Funk 2009, 117). In a part of it we read as follows (248 = Series VI, folio 23 hor.):

Text IV: The children of long-suffering will find long-suffering in it, the gentle children will taste gentleness through it, the children of hope will see hope in it, etc (Ibid. 117 no. 8) .

Unfortunately, of these passages belonging to the first part, that is, to the first 'Meeting' (synaxis) of the chapter Aleph, we find no parallel in the Middle Persian version of the surviving fragments of the Gospel. Their textological situation in the MP version must be technically placed almost immediately after the last passage of M5439/V/ii/5-6/, i.e., the last surviving words of the MP Gospel. About the remaining unpublished synaxeis of the first chapter we can say nothing at the moment, except that editor of the codex, Funk, points out that "the Second to Fifth Meetings of the First Discourse have for their topic the description of the Father of Greatness, the realm of light, and the beauty of the light Aeons." (Ibid. 117-118).

Other Discourses

Mythical Drama

Our information about the rest of the chapters which still are not completely edited is actually very limited. According to Funk's report

13. According to Funk (ibid., 117 no. 7), "this place, towards the end of the preamble of Mānī's Gospel and shortly after proclaiming the mysterious relationship of the work to the primeval alphabet, would appear to be the canonical anchoring of the 'Primeval Voice' hymn with its twenty-two items. . . . In the Synaxeis codex, this hymn is only very fragmentarily preserved and needs a great deal of restoration, which of course helped by knowledge of the Iranian parallels." Cf. above §2.5, section 'Primeval Voice' and Durkin-Meisterernst/ Morano 2010, 10-13.

(Ibid. 118), we know only that the second discourse demonstrated the realm of the darkness and the third chapter dealt with the evil schemes and preparations for battle. It is however natural to assume that this mythical drama was also continued in the fourth chapter (for the content of Chapters VI and IX, see above); otherwise, unfortunately, we do not know what were the contents of Chapters V, VII, VIII, X up to XIV, except that all these chapters had 'mythological contents'(Ibid).

The very badly damaged pages of the Synaxeis codex containing the various Meetings of the fifteenth Discourse are only understandable with the help of the Greek CMC. Here we read as follows (383: 12-13 = Series 1955, folio 6 vert.):

Text V: ... [12] ... the dogma and ... (2 lines illegible) [...] ...[15] ... in the nomos ... [16] [...] ... among them ... (2 lines illegible) [18] [...] ... and the birth/generation of the body [...] ... they nourished my body alone [20] [...] ... in that dogma [...] ... and its presbyters [...] ... my body ... that I should do [...] ... thus I did not trust them when I was small ...(Ibid).

On the verso page of the same leaf, after another mention of nourishment (line 19, '... to me, with me feeding') as well as a few other things, a dialogue with 'my true and most honoured Twin' is either initiated or continued, and in this context again, mention is made of 'the dogmata that walk about in error' (line 22) and 'the children of the nomos' (line 27) (Ibid. 119).
Synaxeis; 391: 10-26 = Series 1955, folio 2 hor.:

Text VI: (The first ten lines are hardly legible; lines 3f. probably "they are the children [of the no]mos" and the term trophē, 'food' or 'feeding', in illegible context)

[10] ... in a ... way, according to individual nomoi (or 'nomos by nomos'). They did ... [...] ... They separated plant from plant, vegetable from vegetable, [herb] from herb (?). And so did I. These accounts clearly pertain to Mānī's early youth and his life among the Elchasaites and have parallels in the CMC.[15] Here Mānī discusses the practice of the Baptists, which is contrary to his faith, their separation or distinction of some of plants and vegetables; in other words, accepting some while rejecting others.

Voyage to India

The Coptic Synaxeis confirm that the Gospel reflected Mānī's experiences in India, strictly speaking, in the Hinduist milieus. "The page that carries this report belongs to the same series of leaves as that about the Baptists and may belong to just another 'meeting' (apparently preceding the one that deals with Twin and Elchasaites) but the same Discourse of the Living Gospel" (Ibid. 121), i.e., the fifteenth chapter; as follows (379: 4-34 = Series 1955, folio 8 vert.):

The Hebrews, the Seed of Abraham and the Babylonians

The following passage seems to be an excerpt from the Living Gospel, most likely from its Eighteenth or Nineteenth Discourse (Ibid. 122). The text concerns the Hebrew people, Mount Sinai, some speculation about the term skhina and finally an ambiguous mention of the Babylonians. The surviving passage – in an imperfect context – seems to describe and interpret the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt and the religious contribution of the Hebrews in Babylonia, where Mānī was born and grew up, as follows (422: 4-32 = Series 1951, folio 12 hor.):

Text VIII: (Nothing readable of the first five lines of that page, and next to nothing of the preceding one) ... (6) ... [he] chose the tribe, ... [the] entire [country] ... [He] ... their ... so that they ... (10) godhead. Later on, [he] ... in order to [...], that is (?), the skhina ..., in order to seize ... [...] (12) ... set free (?) her army. Finally, then, after having [...] (13) ... the seed of Abraham, she (?) ... them off. They ... and they ... (15) ... the slavery and the humiliation ... [...] ... (forced?) labor. So they departed from Egypt [and passed (17) through (?)] the field of the mountain of sina (that is, Mount Sinai). There were great [quantities (18) of] thistles [growing (?)] in that [place (?)]. Now, the thistle is called sina in the language of that place ... (20) [...] ... (21) [That is why (?)] that mountain had been named ... They seized [the land (?) of] ... (25) ... and became kings in it... . (2 lines illegible) ... (27) ... Euphrates ... (29) ... these Chal[daeans (?)] (30) [...] ... in (?) Hebrew ... [...] ... (32) [...] ... in Babylon ... [...] ... (next to end of page)

On the next page, some other phrases are also read by Funk as follows (423 = Series 1, 1951, folio 11 hor.):

... from the land of the Egyptians to the country of ... (line 11)
... [people who] worship in that temple ... (lines 20-21)
... those Babylonians who belong to the ancient dogma (Ibid. 124, no. 28)[16] ... (lines 21f.)

For discussion, especially concerning the identification of 'the seed of Abraham' with the Mandaean community, see Funk 2009, 122-126.

Jesus

Only a few lines later, the text deals with some sort of Christological discussion, recognizable only with the following words: "Jesus" (line 26), "while they say about him that ..." (line 31), and, on the other side of the sheet, "the son of Mary" (line 20) (Ibid. 124, no. 29).

Conclusion

The Coptic Synaxeis codex gives us the most diverse passages of the different chapters of the Living Gospel as follows: separating the living offspring from the offspring of darkness, the children of the height from the offspring of the abyss; exhortation to the listeners and hearers of the true words; the great secrets of the new Gospel which are written through twenty-two logoi of the primeval alphabet; description of the Father of Greatness, the Realm of Light and the beauty of the light Aeons. All these were the topics of the first chapter (Aleph) of the Gospel.

Part of the second chapter dealt with the Realm of Darkness, and part of the third chapter with the mythical drama, i.e., the battle between Light and Darkness. Owing to the fact that the codex is fragmentary, we have almost no information about the contents of the fourth up to fourteenth chapters, but it seems that some of them must have had rather mythical subjects. The fifteenth chapter, although very short and fragmentary parts have survived, refers to Mānī's early youth and his life among the Elchasaites, especially to his 'nourishment' as well as his experience among the sect. It is in this chapter that Mānī's Twin warns him from the error of the nomos of this community. Here, the text explains Mānī's hard discussion with the Baptist Elchasaites on the acceptance of some plants and vegetables and, by contrast, also his rejection of others. Another topic which was represented presumably in this chapter is Mānī's voyage to India and his missionary efforts in this land. Here he proselytes and discusses with the religious leaders. But, as the incomplete context shows, the mission was not successful for the reason of the dogmatism of the Brahmans' and general public. According to Funk's report, it is most likely that it was in the eighteenth or ninteenth chapter that Mānī dealt with the story of the Hebrew exodus from Egypt. With an uncritical tone, Mānī mentions here from 'the seed of Abraham' and speaks about the Babylonian pagans in an almost ambiguous context. It seems that these Babylonians, who have Hebrew origin, live along the Euphrates River which is mentioned by name in the text. Funk suggests that this group is the same Mandaean community. Interestingly, the text which speaks about the Hebrew people, deals with the etymology of the two words sina (the Mount Sinai) and skhina. According to the two legible page-headers of the Synaxeis, a part of the sixth chapter of the Gospel dealt with the 'Great Architect/Builder' and the whole ninth chapter spoke about the 'coming of Jesus the Christ'.

Appendices
Appendix I: Twenty-two Logoi

From both Manichaean and non-Manichaean writings we know that Mānī's Gospel was divided into twenty-two chapters (Syr. mēmrē, Gr. λόγοι) (Böhlig 1980, 45 and Anm. 134) corresponding to the twenty-two letters of the Syriac/Manichaean alphabet (Asmussen 1987, 31b).[17] The Synaxeis author demonstrates numerological interest in the number of 22 chapters (Mirecki 1994, 206). According to the new study and to the edition of the new parts of these papyri, Synaxeis emphasized that this new Gospel revealed "the interpretation of the twenty-two logoi of the primeval alphabet" (Funk 2009, 117, n. 6).

Appendix II: Detailed Contents of the Living Gospel

These are all the various themes that, through the various sources, we know from the contents of the Living Gospel. Obviously, each of these materials, some of which are even anti-Manichaean, has its own special meaning.

James M. Robinson. The Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi. Cambridge: James Clarke & Co., 2015. xv + 326 pages. ISBN: 978-0-2771-7504-0.

The basic details of the story of the Medinet Madi Manichaean books are fairly well known. Allegedly discovered in a decayed wooden box in the ruins of a house in the south of the Fayum, the seven Coptic papyrus codices appeared on the antiquities market in Egypt in 1929. They were divided up and sold, with the bulk of the material being purchased by Carl Schmidt and Chester Beatty. Most of the find, then, is now split between Berlin and Dublin, with a few leaves to be found in Warsaw and Vienna. The contents of the codices are as follows:

- A collection of Psalms (LDAB 107976)
- A collection of Mani's letters (LDAB 108139)
- A collection of homilies (LDAB 108112 + 108140)
- A book of Acts (LDAB 108138)
- Two volumes of dogmatic material (Kephalaia) (LDAB 107977 and LDAB 108111)
- A volume of commentary (Synaxeis) (LDAB 108137)

The codices' poor state of preservation challenged even the skills of the great Hugo Ibscher, who performed restoration work on the books in 1930s Berlin, but World War II and its aftermath left the codices geographically scattered and only partially conserved and published. The vicissitudes that the codices have endured since that time make for interesting reading, from the stray leaves that ended up in Warsaw because, according to one story, "someone found along the railroad tracks glassed papyrus leaves that had fallen out from the transport into the USSR" (135) to an ill-timed sneeze that completely obliterated a fragile leaf of one of the codices (156).

Robinson's book appears during a period of renewed interest in the Medinet Madi codices.[1] A project to edit and translate the Kephalaia codex in the Chester Beatty Library sponsored by the United States National Endowment for the Humanities and the Australian Research Council is presently underway, and an initial summary of the work so far undertaken has just appeared.[2] Now Robinson's volume makes more widely available a wealth of documentation concerning the acquisition and early efforts at conservation and restoration of the codices in Dublin and Berlin as well as the difficulties that have attended various attempts to edit and publish the codices.

In recent years, Robinson has produced two other publications providing the records of his work in the 1970s and 1980s. They track the provenance of important discoveries of early Christian codices in Egypt, namely the Nag Hammadi codices and the Bodmer papyri.[3] Like those publications, the book under review conveniently collects published reports and selected archival materials concerning the history of these books since their discovery. A good deal of what Robinson presents in this book is already available to those with access to research libraries. The first two chapters are previously published summaries of the results of Robinson's research in the 1980s.[4] The chapters that follow repeat and considerably elaborate these summaries.

The book is divided into four parts. Part One, "The Acquisition and Initial Conservation and Editing" (49-144), begins with the purchases by Schmidt and Beatty. Robinson reproduces long excerpts from Schmidt's early publications on the discovery printed in twin columns with English translations.[5] This information is supplemented with extended references to archival material in the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin (much of which was also printed in Robinson's 1992 summary; see n. 4 above). Robinson then provides documentation of the conservation efforts of Hugo Ibscher, again consisting of long excerpts from (and English translations of) Ibscher's own writings paired with a later summary published by Hugo's son and successor Rolf Ibscher. Further archival correspondence from the Beatty Library illuminates the contentious process of attempting to edit the conserved leaves. Finally, Robinson draws together a number of sources to trace the tumultuous history of the codices during and after World War II.

The second chapter has been the standard reference for the story of the codices: J.M. Robinson, "The Fate of the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi: 1929-1989," in G. Wießner and H.-J. Klimkeit (eds.), Studia Manichaica: II. Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus (Wiesbaden 1992) 19-62.

[5] The primary source is C. Schmidt and H.J. Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten," in Sitzungsberichte der preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, philosophisch-historische Klasse (Berlin 1933) 4-90.

Part Two, "The Conservation by Rolf Ibscher" (145-188), provides excerpts, again with English translations, of published and unpublished accounts by the younger Ibscher of his efforts to conserve the codices both in Berlin and London in the 1950s. The procedures he describes (such as spraying the leaves with a solution of Zaponlack) are no longer considered best practices, as Robinson helpfully shows with the inclusion of extended quotations from the handbook of Michael Fackelmann.[6]

Parts Three and Four (189-311) consist of chapters of varying length dedicated to the various parts of the codices in Berlin and Dublin. There is a great deal of repetition here, both among these chapters and with the preceding material in the book. Part of this could have been alleviated by simply devoting a chapter to each codex rather than, for example, having a chapter on the leaves of the Synaxeis codex in Berlin (193-197) separated by ninety pages from a chapter on the portion of the Synaxeis held in Dublin (288-302). Despite this quirk, this section remains a useful summary of what is known about the individual books and what special problems attach to each of them. A short glossary of the scholars, collectors and dealers involved in the story brings the book to a close.

It is without question very convenient to have all this material gathered together in a single volume, and anglophones will be pleased to have an English version of the many excerpts of earlier scholarship. The translations are reliable, if a little wooden, sticking closely to the grammar and diction of the German. One wishes that Robinson's thorough knowledge of the scholarship on the codices had been carried forward beyond 1992, the latest publication date in the Bibliography that concludes the book (aside from Robinson's own Foreword to the 2005 reprint of Crum's Coptic dictionary). Robinson notes in the preface that he has left that task for "the next generation of scholarship." Thus, the book will not be the one-stop history of scholarship resource that it might have been. Nevertheless, it will be a key resource for the study of the Manichaean materials from Medinet Madi for the foreseeable future.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Since its inception, this project (generously supported by both doctoral and postdoctoral fellowships from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada [SSHRC]) has greatly benefited from the use of both published and un-published research tools for Manichaean Studies. In particular, Gunner Mikkelsen's Bibliographica manichaica (Brepols, 1996) and the Dictionary of Manichaean Texts I: Texts from the Roman Empire (Brepols, 1998) from the Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum have been used profitably throughout the course of this study. This project, however, would not have been possible without the generous access granted to me by Dr. Wolf-Peter Funk to a wide array of unpublished concordances, lexical aids, and textual revisions. Without these invaluable research tools as a guide, I may very well have never found my way out of the labyrinthine depths of the Manichaean Kephalaia. It is also to him that I offer my sincerest thanks for initially pointing me in this direction and for patiently offering so many insightful comments and suggestions on a multitude of linguistic and methodological matters (ⲁⲕⲧⲟⲩⲛⲟⲩⲉⲓⲧ ⲁⲃⲁⲗ ⲛⲙⲡⲉⲧϩⲏⲡ ⲧⲏⲣⲟⲩ). I would also like to thank Prof. Paul-Hubert Poirier for his unflagging support and encouragement of this project, as well as for his encyclopaedic knowledge of all things early Christian. I am thankful also to Prof. Louis Painchaud for his wisdom and much-valued advice, as I am to my colleagues Tuomas Rasimus, Serge Cazelais, Jennifer Wees, and Michael Kaler for helping to create a sense of community and collegiality. More recently I offer my gratitude to Prof. Pierluigi Piovanelli for his continued interest and encouragement. Most of all, however, I would like to thank my wife, Julie, for her unconditional love and support for all my scholarly endeavours, and to my son, Alex, for the many invaluable moments of distraction and delight that his first four years have offered.

PENTADIC REDACTION IN THE MANICHAEAN KEPHALAIA

INTRODUCTION

Number and Religion in Antiquity

The role played by numbers in religion is largely unexplored territory. This is due, in part, to the fact that such patterns, if they exist, tend to become so embedded into the collective consciousness of the community that rarely is any exegetical effort expended reflecting on their origins or implications. Jews and Christians, for example, do not tend to inquire as to why there are ten commandments and not twelve, why there are twelve tribes of Israel and not twenty, or why Jesus, when he wanted to feed a crowd of his hearers, used only five loaves and two fish. Similarly, Muslims might not be inclined to question why five daily prayers are required, instead of six, or why the Qurʾān contains 114 surahs instead of 141. After all, does it really matter that Buddha only came up with four noble truths, instead of eight? In many instances, the presence of such numbers may be considered of little consequence, although in other cases they could carry a great deal of theological weight. For instance, few contemporary Christians may wonder why they are taught to conceive of God as a trinity and not a quaternity, or for that matter, a pentad. Such formulations are typically taken as "givens" that have come to form an integral part of a particular tradition's symbolic language. But this does not mean that explanations do not sometimes exist and cannot, therefore, be sought. Numerical aspects of religion just simply are not seen as generating sufficient interest to require sustained attention. Besides, it is not as though "mainstream" religious discourses are brimming over with numerological speculations. The average reader of a standard scriptural text, be it the Tanakh, the New Testament, or the Qurʾān, is not going to be struck by an over-abundance of numerical formulations. Thus, it is not surprising that such a phenomenon goes relatively unnoticed.

The apparent lack of interest among the faithful today does not mean that the use of numbers as part of religious and theological discourse was never a matter of concern or debate. For instance, the use of numbers in theological and exegetical contexts became particularly controversial for the early church during the 2nd and 3rd centuries CE. Irenaeus, in particular, criticized the practice of gematria, that is, calculations based on the numerical value of Greek or Hebrew letters, by his Valentinian opponents as arbitrary and without scriptural foundation. The bishop of Lyons also criticized what he perceived to be the arbitrary selection of biblical numbers in order to fit a particular theological system due to the fact that the scriptures contain such a wide variety of numbers and numerical patterns (Adversus haereses, 2.24.3), especially involving three, seven, twelve, and forty. Irenaeus cited, for instance, Valentinian exegesis of the thirty years before Jesus' ministry as a representation of the thirty ethereal aeons of the Pleroma (Adversus haereses, 1.1.3), while the passion of the twelfth aeon was considered to be an allusion to the betrayal of Christ by Judas (Adversus haereses, 1.3.3).

It would seem, however, that, in spite of the decidedly negative reactions of some, there was a certain ambivalence about the meaning and significance of numbers in the early Christian tradition. It is clear from the amount of attention given to the question by Irenaeus that the mixture of mathematics and numerical speculation with theology was viewed by church authorities as a significant problem. Yet while heresiological writers sought to discourage the construction of elaborate theological systems using numeric series or patterns, other more philosophically inclined authors such as Clement of Alexandria and Augustine reflected gladly on the harmony and perfection that they perceived in biblical numbers.

As we can see, while numbers may not figure prominently in "mainstream" (that is, orthodox) religious discourse, faith traditions that are typically seen as existing on the fringes of orthodoxy are far more likely to make creative, even audacious, use of numbers in their efforts to communicate and interpret sacred messages. While the early fathers of the church polemically engaged their Gnostic adversaries over this issue, a similar dynamic would be played out in Rabbinic Judaism and Islam, in their reactions to Kabbalistic and Ismaeli modes of discourse, which also displayed an equally profound interest in numbers and numeric patterns. Added to this group must be the great underdogs of religious history—the people whom we have come to label as Manichaeans.

The Manichaean Love of Numbers

The followers of the 3rd-century CE Babylonian prophet known as "Mani the Living" (from the Syriac epithet Mani hiyya) inherited a vivid story from their highly imaginative master. What is remarkable for the purposes of this study is the prominent role played by numbers and numeric patterns within the basic frame of that story. In brief, Mani proclaimed that before the creation of the cosmos, two opposing powers existed in relative equilibrium. In the heavens dwelt the Father of Greatness, lord of the eternally blessed realm of light, tranquility, and peace, while far below in the depths a fierce and sinister King of Darkness brooded in his chaos. This balance was upset when the King of Darkness caught a glimpse of the light-realm and sent out an invasion force of his demonic powers. In response, the Father sent his only son, known as First Man, into battle along with five elemental powers as his armour. Tragically, the First Man was defeated and his armour devoured by the powers of darkness. Fortunately, a rescue operation was mounted when the Father called forth his consort, the Living Spirit, who in addition to retrieving First Man, commissioned Five Sons to build the universe out of the slain bodies of the dark powers. In this way, a vast and intricate machinery was put into place to purify the light substance that had been imprisoned in the darkness during the First Man's initial fall. The Father then sent a third envoy, the Messenger, along with twelve virgins (although other accounts describe only a single virgin), to finish the counter attack and set the cosmic machinery in motion. Unfortunately, a final counter stroke was accomplished by a pair of demons, Ashaqlūn and Namrael, who fashioned the first human couple, Adam and Eve, on the basis of the Third Messenger's image, thus condemning human beings to a legacy of ignorance and death. In his wisdom, however, the Father commissioned Jesus, in celestial form, to plant the seed of gnosis in Adam and his kin. Thus begins the Manichaean version of primordial history.

This summary, based on the 9th-century Syriac account of Theodore bar Khonai, illuminates the general contours of the Manichaean creation myth, as Mani himself is likely to have conceived it. What is interesting to note are the basic numerical structures underpinning such a colourful tale. This means that the general Manichaean infatuation with numbers must have its origins in Mani's own predilection for such expressions. As can be imagined, this imaginative use of numerically coloured mythology was met with scorn and ridicule by the movement's critics, especially mainstream Christians and Muslims, who thought such mythological language violated the basic rules of philosophical dialectic. Yet, in spite of the best efforts of religious leaders and sometimes governments throughout the centuries to stamp them out, the Manichaeans continue to re-emerge from extinction in some most unexpected places.

Out of Obscurity

While European scholars and church historians long knew of the Manichaean "heresy" from anti-heretical writings and Augustine's notorious association with them, a number of things happened in the 19th and 20th centuries to bring them back to light. First, European scholars and orientalists began to notice Manichaeans cropping up in various medieval Muslim authors, such as al-Nadīm and al-Biruni, which provided important evidence as to persistent Manichaean presence in the medieval Muslim world.[1] Next, at the turn of the 20th century, European expeditions uncovered masses of textual fragments and scrolls left behind by Manichaeans at various locales in Central Asia. Most famously, the texts from Turfan (in western China) contain a huge number of mutilated Manichaean texts in a wide variety of obscure Iranian and Turkish dialects. Shortly after, yet another sensational find occurred in 1929 with the discovery of a collection of Coptic codices in Egypt, near the town of Medinet Madi, containing still more original Manichaean writings—writings much earlier than the fragments recovered from Turfan.

One of the things that enabled the identification of these texts as Manichaean was the fact that Carl Schmidt, the scholar who first inspected the codices, had just been reading the proofs of a colleague's edition of Epiphanius' Panarion, and was struck by the name of one of the codices—Kephalaia—which reminded him of a text described in the heresiologist's exposé of the Manichaeans.[2] This discovery inaugurated what appeared to be a new and promising era in Manichaean studies. After some initial progress, however, war broke out in Europe and publication stalled for several decades. This has meant that most of this material remained largely unexplored by scholars of Late Antiquity—which brings us to the current study.

The text that jogged the memory of Carl Schmidt is, now that substantial portions of it have been published, striking for another reason, namely, the extensive (some might say obsessive) use of numbers and numeric patterns as a means of expressing Manichaean theological discourse. What is more remarkable is the degree to which the number five plays a predominant role in the vast majority of these expressions. This phenomenon, most prominent in the first half of volume one, has gone unexplored[3] and unexplained. In large part, this is due to the fact that the Kephalaia presents itself as a record of Mani's discourses to his inner circle. Few have questioned the legitimacy of this presentation and this has led to the erroneous assumption that the prevalence of numbers in the text can easily be attributed to Mani's direct influence. This study aims to correct this error by demonstrating that the use of numeric patterns in the Kephalaia far outstrips what is known or can reasonably be assumed about Mani's own mode of expression. We shall see that the use of pentads and five-part numeric patterns in the Kephalaia reveals important traces of how Manichaean traditions were transmitted, received, and redacted in response to a variety of internal and external concerns of the text's creators and their community.

The Kephalaia and Its Compilers

In spite of the fact that substantial portions of the Kephalaia have been edited and published for over half a century,[4] its form and function have remained generally misunderstood. Since these initial publications, even some of the most influential scholars have succumbed to the temptation to regard the Kephalaia either as a record of Mani's actual discourses[5] and teachings,[6] or as a systematic[7] (albeit secondary) presentation of the "main points" of Manichaean theology. In reality, however, the work is neither. It should not be seen as a record of the ipsissima verba of Mani himself, nor should it be viewed as a summa[8] of Manichaean theology. Instead, it can be more accurately described as representing the emergence or evolution of a scholastic, interpretive tradition, ostensibly rooted in an authoritative oral tradition analogous to those which led to the compilation of the Jewish Talmudic and Islamic Hadith traditions.

[3] While Michel Tardieu pointed out the importance of five as a basic classification tool in Manichaeism (Le manichéisme, 107), few have followed his lead. A superficial index of five-part series from Manichaean sources was given by Ström ("Le chiffre cinq," 333–338), in comparison with other traditions, while in the same volume Couliano suggested that all pentads were based on the demonization of the planets ("The Counterfeit Spirit," 53–58). See also, Lévy ("A propos de la pentade et du dualisme manichéens," 493–500).

[4] The Manichaean Kephalaia exist in two Coptic codices discovered near the Egyptian town of Medinet Madi in 1929. The first codex (Berlin codex P. 15 996 or Berlin Kephalaia codex) is entitled "The Kephalaia of the Teacher" (abbreviated 1 Ke), while the second codex (Codex C or Dublin Kephalaia codex) is entitled "The Kephalaia of the Wisdom of My Lord Mani" (2 Ke). For a recent account of the discovery of these manuscripts see Robinson, "The Fate of the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi:

While the Kephalaia (literally the "Chapter-book")[9] may present itself as a record of Manichaean oral tradition based on Mani's discourses

1929–1989," 19–62. Much of the Berlin Kephalaia codex was published by Polotsky and Böhlig (1940 and 1966), while the remainder is being published by Funk (1999, 2000, and forthcoming). For a recent account of the characteristics, content, and reconstruction of the Kephalaia codices, see Funk, "The Reconstruction of the Manichaean Kephalaia," 143–159. The Dublin Kephalaia codex is included in Giversen's 1987 facsimile edition, although it is not (to my knowledge) currently being edited.

[5] See Schmidt, Ein Mani-Fund, 23. Also, Lieu, for instance, talks about Kephalaia chapters as "extant discourses of Mani" (Manichaeism in the Roman Empire, 177). While the enthusiasm of scholars for finding the authentic voice of Mani in such a text is understandable, somewhat more unsettling is the way in which the Kephalaia, as a primary source for Manichaeism, is sometimes simply pillaged by scholars for prooftexts in support of particular readings and hypotheses, with little or no attention paid to the chapter context from which such references are taken.

[6] Widengren spoke about "Mani's teaching, as set down in the Kephalaia" (Mani and Manichaeism, 69), while Ort characterized the Kephalaia as "a summary of Mani's doctrines based on his own writings" (Mani, 23).

[7] Even Tardieu, in spite of the incredible balance and control of his Que sais-je volume, seems to indulge in a slight excess of rhetoric when he characterizes the Kephalaia as "une véritable summa theologica du manichéisme" based on Mani's logia (Le manichéisme, 66–67). Similarly, Koenen characterized the Kephalaia as a "dogmatic textbook" ("How Dualistic is Mani's Dualism?", 3).

[8] In its existing form, it does not appear to be structured with the same degree of deliberation as other systematic theological treatises from the period, such as Origen's De principiis.

[9] This would seem to be the best way to translate the title (Funk, personal communication), although common usage prevents us from going that far. Nevertheless, I cannot help wonder whether the intended title is Kephalaia of the Teacher or simply just The Teacher (or in the case of volume two—The Wisdom of My Lord Mani), although evidence from both the Coptic Homilies (18.6) and the Acta Archelai 62 would seem to support the traditional interpretation of the page headings. As for the identification of individual chapters in this study, I have opted for chapter instead of kephalaion, a technical term which, though correct, has no real benefit and tends to obscure the unique character of each textual unit.

to his inner circle,[10] it is essentially the product of later theological developments and elaborations that seek to respond to a wide array of specific questions, many of which appear to be rooted in ambiguities found in the canon. Typically (although not always), a chapter opens with Mani being questioned by one of his disciples about a specific point of doctrine or interpretation. This means that one of the primary aims sought by the compilers of this massive work was clarity. While Mani is famous for having recorded his teaching in a series of self-consciously canonical writings intended to definitively replace all previous revelations, the questions that are asked by the disciples give the distinct impression that Mani left many "loose ends" that needed to be resolved.[11] Thus, the Kephalaia appears to be a deliberate attempt to deal with some of these issues within an artificially constructed context of Mani's "apostolic authority,"[12] since at the close of the Kephalaia's "prologue" Mani is depicted as extolling his disciples to record the wisdom he imparted to them (1 Ke 9.5–6)—a strange command from someone who was supposed to have provided a definitive and unambiguous record of his revelation. In other words, if Mani had indeed clearly and definitively explained all the subtleties of his vision, then there should have been no need to create such an extensive corpus of secondary literature that seeks to address such a wide array of problems. We might even say that the Kephalaia constitutes a sort of addenda et corrigenda for Manichaean canonical tradition.

Still, in a more formal way, there are aspects of the Kephalaia that allow for its comparison with at least two genres of ancient literature. First, the fact that it exists as a collection of "chapters" (literally, Greek: κεφάλαια) on a variety of theological topics means that it could be compared to certain forms of ancient Capitaliteratur, which aimed at the collection of teachings from a spiritual teacher for the purposes of meditation.[13] A classical example of such literature is Epictetus' Manual (Encheiridion), which is essentially a collection of discourse on miscellaneous topics not unlike those found in the Kephalaia, such as On friendship (2.22), On those who plead sickness (3.5), or What solitude is; and what a solitary person (3.13). During the late-antique period, such literature became particularly popular among monks and ascetics,[14] so it is not inconceivable that ascetically minded Manichaeans would have been interested in producing a work of this sort. The use, however, of the Kephalaia as a source of meditative discourses would seem to have more to do with how it was read during later periods than how it was formed.

[11] In fact, surviving fragments from Mani's writings do indicate that some of them, such as the Book of Mysteries, were largely incidental in nature, while others, such as the work(s) known to Titus of Bostra, Theodoret, and Severus seem to have been more generalized, with less attention paid to fixed structures and detail.

The second genre with which the Kephalaia bears a somewhat closer resemblance, and which speaks more to its compositional origins, is the erotapokrisis, or "question-and-answer" literature, that became popular among Jewish and Christian exegetes during the first centuries of the Common Era. This genre, which Claudio Zamagni has described as "un genre très élastique," was a form of secondary literature used primarily for the exegesis and elucidation of canonical texts (be they Jewish, Christian, or pagan), although such works often contained apologetic, didactic, or polemical overtones.[15] In general, the erotapokrisis takes as its most basic form a three- part structure consisting of 1) preface/prologue, 2) questions and answers, and 3) postscript/colophon.[16] According to this basic set of criteria, the Kephalaia could be classified as part of the erotapokritic genre, especially if its primary aim was the explication of ambiguities found within canonical Manichaean tradition.[17]

While such characteristics may allow us to identify the function and literary genre of the text, there are other internal indicators that enable us to situate its compilers within a general historical and geographic frame. I choose to call the creators of this text compilers, since it seems clear to me that it is the work of a variety of hands, be they authors, editors, or redactors. But some sense of who these individuals might have been can be gleaned from the sorts of things they wrote about. For instance, we find in the Kephalaia references to important figures from the Judaeo-Christian tradition, such as Adam, Enosh, Eve, Jesus, Judas, Noah, Paul, Sem, and Sethel. This is not surprising given the fact that Mani was raised in a Judaeo-Christian sect known as the Elchasaites and later styled himself, even in his letters, as an "Apostle of Jesus Christ." What is somewhat more striking, are the vague and somewhat shadowy allusions to Zarathustra and Buddha, figures little known west of Persia, but considered by Mani to be two of his key prophetic forerunners. We also find references to rival religious groups such as "Baptists" (i.e., Mandaeans), Christians, Jews, Magi, and Nazoreans, most of whom would have been found in Mesopotamia. In terms of geography, the Kephalaia makes allusion to places throughout the Ancient Near East such as Adiabene, Babylon, Ctesiphon, Mesene, Parthia, Persia, Susiana, Tigris, although India is also mentioned. In addition, various ethnic groups largely from the same region are mentioned, such as Assyrians, Axumites, Babylonians, Indians, Medes, Parthians, Persians, Romans, as well as important political figures such as Ardashir, Artabanus, Hystaspes, and Shapur. Such allusions seem to indicate a social world rooted in a (predominantly) Judaeo-Christian milieu, likely originating in Mesopotamia during the late 3rd century CE.[18] This is precisely the context that Peter Brown rightly emphasized in his important 1969 article, "The Diffusion of Manichaeism in the Roman Empire." According to Brown, the early history of Manichaeism is firmly rooted in the history of the Syriac speaking belt that crossed the frontiers of both Sassanian Iran and Rome.[19] These early Manichaeans, it seems, were caught between two "reactionary states,"[20] both of which were closing ranks and attempting to consolidate imperial cultures that had less and less room for religious innovation and variety. Thus, in both cases Manichaeans were compelled to respond to external pressures such as persecution and martyrdom as well as internal pressures of group solidarity, doctrinal cohesion, and missionary expansion. One less obvious facet of this response, I will suggest, was the extensive use of numeric patterns as evidenced by the Kephalaia.

Yet given the fact that internal evidence appears to indicate a Mesopotamian milieu, how did the Kephalaia end up in Upper Egypt and recorded in Coptic, a language far removed from the Syriac used primarily by Mani and his earliest disciples? To address this problem, we may endeavour to propose a hypothetical reconstruction of the Kephalaia's textual history and transmission. First, as we might imagine, come the oral and (especially) written teachings of Mani in Syriac. Mani is, in fact, practically unique in religious history for the care he took to record his own prophetic message in writing, something he harshly criticized his predecessors for not doing. Second, we might imagine the oral and written transmission and interpretation of Mani's teachings by disciples from his inner circle, such as Sisinnios, Kustaios, and Adda in Syriac, if we presume that they came from a similar sociocultural background, but probably to some extent this transmission happened also in Greek.[21] Next, we might suppose that some of this material was organized and composed into "proto-Kephalaia," examples of which have been recently discovered elsewhere in Egypt, at the Dakhleh Oasis (ancient Kellis). This was probably done by other disciples and missionaries moving west towards and into Egypt, using Syriac (even just liturgically), Greek,[22] and eventually Coptic as their means of communication. Finally, we might suppose the translation, redaction, and collection of what came to be an enormous amount of Kephalaia material into large volumes, such as those found at Medinet Madi,[23]

[21] Funk has asked whether it is possible that a "patristic" tradition developed at a very early stage in the western branch of the Manichaean movement; a tradition with apostolic authority independent of the Manichaean canon. See Funk, "Reconstruction," 152. A document such as the Cologne Mani Codex, with its various sections attributed to authoritative individuals such as Salmaios, Baraies (or Barhaies), Timotheos, Innaios, Kustaios, etc., certainly points in this direction, as does the Acts codex, which has a similar structure (Funk, personal communication).

[22] The issue of original source language has been described as a "vexed question for all the Manichaean texts in Coptic" (See Franzmann "Syriac-Coptic Bilinguals," 115). The debate around this issue, however, is frequently affected by the desire to see in these texts a more primitive stratum than is actually there. To be sure, there are elements from the texts that reveal at least an interest in some kind of Syriac sources, as is witnessed also by the Syriac-Coptic translation exercises recently discovered at Kellis (T. Kell. Syr. / Copt. 1; T. Kell. Syr. / Copt. 2) (Gardner, Kellis Literary Texts, 101). While these texts have raised the possibility (at least) that the translation process in Egypt could have been more direct, they are by no means the "smoking gun" that they are so often made out to be. After all, as Gardner points out, it is hard to imagine the translator not knowing any Greek, especially since Greek Manichaean texts of considerable literary sophistication have also been found at Kellis (not to mention the Cologne Mani Codex, also presumably from Egypt). But, even though it appears textually possible to demonstrate some direct influence, or at least colouring, of Syriac on Coptic Manichaean texts, the question that is never asked is whether or not it is sociologically possible for highly literate (and no doubt indigenous) Coptic speaking translators to work directly from Syriac sources without Greek playing some sort of intermediary role either orally or by means of written texts.

exclusively in Coptic. As such, the traditions, as well as the carriers of these traditions, which led to the composition and production of the Kephalaia, would have traversed at least two distinct (yet often overlapping) socio-cultural settings: late 3rd century CE Mesopotamia and late 3rd–4th century CE Egypt.[24] This movement would have been precipitated both by the "built-in" missionary impulse of the religion as well as the persecution of Manichaeans following the executions of Mani and his successor, Sisinnios. Although the temporal division between these two settings is ambiguous, an argument could be made that the most pertinent social setting falls somewhere between the second and third stages of evolution, as outlined above.

Canon and Tradition

Having established the apparent form and function of the text, as well as gaining a general impression of its most likely context and creators, we can now pose the main question addressed by this study: why were the Kephalaia compilers so enthusiastic in their use of five-part patterns in particular? Part of the answer lies in the recognition of the already stated contradiction between Mani's well-known insistence on the importance of his own written revelation and the very existence of a work that purports to add to this revelation. Obviously the compilers felt compelled to work something out for themselves. However, before we can get a sense of exactly what they were up to we ought to dispense with another assumption commonplace in scholarly treatments of Manichaeism, namely that Mani's own teaching was highly systematized and unambiguous. In some ways, this assumption was reinforced by the discovery of the Kephalaia, which, in combination with the other assumption that it represents Mani's actual discourses, gives the impression of a highly systematic world-view. This second assumption, founded on the first, has resulted in a serious error.

In spite of the fact that the major part of Mani writings have been either lost or, at best, shattered into fragments by the rage of heresiologists and the ravages of time, it is nevertheless possible to form a general idea of their content and style.[25] For instance, the 10th-century Bagdad bookseller and encyclopaedist, al-Nadīm, recorded that

[24] There is evidence of Manichaeans in Egypt as early as ca. 280 (Letter of Theonas of Alexandria, P. Rylands 469) and ca. 290 (Alexander of Lycopolis). See Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 112. As for what shape Manichaeism may have taken in Palestine, we have no real direct evidence like we have for Egypt.

> Mani wrote seven books, one in Farsi (i.e., Perisan) and six in Syriac, the language of Syria. Among them are The Book of Secrets (i.e. The Book of Mysteries), which contains (a number of) chapters, (including) 'An account of the Daysaniyya (i.e., the followers of Bardaisan of Edessa)', 'The testimony of Yastasif on the Beloved', 'The testimony of … about himself given to Ya 'qub', 'The son of the widow' (who according to Mani was the anointed and crucified one, crucified by the Jews), 'The testimony of Jesus about himself as given in Judaea', 'The commencement of the testimony of al-Yamin as given after his victory', 'The seven spirits', 'The discourse on the four transient spirits', 'Laughter', 'The testimony of Adam regarding Jesus', 'The fall from religion', 'The discourse of the Daysaniyya on the soul and body', 'Refutation of the Daysanites on the soul of life', 'The three trenches', 'The preservation of the World', 'The three days', 'The prophets', (and) 'The resurrection' (trans. Laffan).[26]

Similarly, he stated that Mani wrote Epistles on a variety of topics such as "The Two Sources," "The Eminent Ones," "The Great Epistle of India," "The Epistle of Kaskar," and "The Garden."[27] In this way, we can see that canonical works such as the Book of Mysteries and the Epistles,[28] seem to have been more incidental in orientation, dealing with a seemingly miscellaneous set of doctrinal, polemical, and pastoral issues, while other works such as the Treasure of Life and the (unidentified) source(s) used by Titus of Bostra, Theodoret, and Severus of Antioch provide only generalized presentations of Manichaean theology. This is to say that several of them appear to have lacked the rigid structuring and systematization so apparent in the Kephalaia, not to mention the compilers' obsession with pentads.

Of all the fragments from canonical writings preserved in Syriac, Greek, Coptic, Latin, Middle Persian, and Arabic, only seven contain traces of Mani's own use of pentadic series. These are: 1) fragments from Shabuhragan (presumably composed mid-3rd century CE),[29] 2) pas-

Those that can be identified include:

The Five Limbs

Perhaps the most important of all Manichaean pentads, the "Five shekinahs" (ܫܟܝܢܗ) (Theodore bar Khonai 313.17 [Scher]) (that is, the "presences" or "dwellings" of God) later become known in Graeco-Coptic tradition as the "Five Limbs"[34] and constitute an ideal set of intellectual faculties possessed by a wide variety of entities, namely 1) Mind, 2) Thought, 3) Insight, 4) Counsel, and 5) Consideration.

The Five Elements

Of equal importance are what Mani termed the "Five ziwanē" (ܙܝܘܢܐ)—the "shining gods"—(Ephraim, 235 [Reeves]; Theodore bar Khonai, 7980–7984) attributed to Shabuhragan by Hutter (Manis kosmogonische Šābuhragān-Texte; trans. Klimkeit, Gnosis on the Silk Road, 225).

[31] Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 217–288. Reeves' assertion, however, that Ephraim is "the most important textual witness to the earliest forms of Manichaean discourse" (218) is somewhat misleading, especially when he characterizes what is preserved as "Mani-citations" (220). To be sure the use of the Syriac particle lam ܠܡ is a convincing indicator that some verbatim citations are preserved. In the majority of cases, however, statements are introduced by "as they say" (ܐܡܪܝܢ ܗܘ ܕܐܡܪ) and thus cannot be directly attributable to Mani. As such, while these fragments certainly do bear witness to a very early strata of Manichaean discourse, they cannot, as a whole, be said to represent "portions of Mani's Syriac corpus" (220).

[32] See Theodore bar Khonai, Liber scholiorum, 313–318. Tardieu has suggested that these citations come from Mani's Pragmateia (Le manichéisme, 93).

[33] See Fihrist, 773–805 [Dodge]. While the great value of al-Nadīm's account has been recognized since Flügel's 1862 study, De Blois has recently pointed out that significant portions of al-Nadīm's account, especially on cosmogony, are likely derived from al-Warrāq, a 9th-century, mu'tazilah theologian who took an early interest in Manichaeism ("New Light on the Sources of the Manichaean Chapter in the Fihrist,") 37–45.

[34] According to Funk, this series was rendered as "Aeons" in the unedited Synaxeis codex, which contains readings from Mani's own Living Gospel, whereas in the Epistles codex they are translated as "Limbs" (Epistles) (personal communication). Al-Nadīm, for his part, calls them both "worlds" (Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]) and "limbs" (Fihrist, 786 [Dodge]).

314.11 [Scher]) or, as they were more commonly known to Graeco-Coptic tradition, the Five "Elements" (ⲛⲥⲧⲟⲓⲭⲉⲓⲱⲛ) of 1) Living Air, 2) Light, 3) Wind, 4) Water, 5) Fire (see 1 Ke 43.2 etc.).[35] Also known as the Five "Sons of First Man" (Shabuhragan, Ephraim, 235 [Reeves], Theodore bar Khonai, 314.1 (not enumerated) [Scher]), "gods" (al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 779 [Dodge] Shabuhragan, 513–515 [Mackenzie]), and "Limbs" (al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 786 [Dodge]). They are also put in more traditionally Iranian dress as the "Five Bounteous Immortals" (panzān (a)mahrāspandān) in Shabuhragan (M 7980–7984 [Boyce y, 74])[36] as well as being described as the "Five Walls" (panz parisp) of the Light Chariot, that is, the Sun (M 98/99 [Boyce y, 61]).

The Five Sons of the Living Spirit

As already noted, the Five Sons of the Living Spirit enter the cosmogonic drama when the Father of Greatness responds to the capture of First Man by calling out a second triad made up of "Beloved of Lights," "Great Builder", and the "Living Spirit." Just as First Man (the third being of the first emanation) went into battle accompanied by "five sons," the Living Spirit calls upon his own "five sons" who aid in the slaughter of the Archons and the construction of the cosmos. These Five Sons are called "Ornament (or Keeper) of Splendour," "Great King of Honour," "Adamos (sic = Adamas) of Light," "King of Glory," and "Porter" (314.17–20 [Scher]). Shabuhragan describes these entities as the "five gods" (panz yazd) sent out by the "god Mithra" (Mihr yazd), that is, the Living Spirit (M 7980–7984 [Boyce y, 65).

The Five Virtues

Evidence from Mani's Epistles has confirmed the parallel ordering of both the Limbs and the Virtues in his own discourse. In particular, the "Seventh Letter to Ctesiphon; that of the Vigils" records Mani's evocation of the Five Limbs of 1) Love, 2) Faith, 3) Perfection, 4) Patience, and 5) Wisdom in association with a blessing provided by Jesus: "But it is he who shall bless you all, my beloved / children. May he leave his love on your head, that is, / the Light-Mind. His great faith, he [will … in] your / vigilant Thought. His perfection, he will establish [in your] / good Insight, and his long-suffering, he [will …] / in your good Counsels. His

[36] Al-Nadīm appears to make a distinction between the Five Limbs of the "Realm (Earth) of Light," which equal the Five Elements, and the Five Limbs of the "Sky of Light" (see Fihrist, 786 [Dodge]). There does not seem to have been an absolutely clear demarcation between the Limbs and the Elements, since in several instances (see below the question of the identity of the "Intellectuals") they bleed into one another.

wisdom . . . / . . . he will act as in your sharp Considerations . . ."[37] They are also mentioned by al-Nadīm (Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]).

The Five Vital Powers/Potentials

Also important to the light-realm is the series of five vital powers, known as 1) Life (zīhr), 2) Power (zōr), 3) Light (rōšnī), 4) Fragrance (xwaš̄), 5) Beauty (agrāyī) (Shabuhragan M 7983 = Boyce y 52 [75]).[38]

The Five Worlds of Darkness

As the negative image of the five shekinahs, Mani seems to have conceived of the kingdom of darkness as divided into five districts: 1) Smoke, 2) Fire, 3) Wind, 4) Water, 5) Darkness (Theodore 313.19–20 [Scher], al-Nadīm), also known as the "Five Ditches" (panz kandār) (Shabuhragan M 98/99 [Boyce y, 61]) and the "Five Hells" (panz dušox) (Shabuhragan M 7980–7984 [Boyce y, 66]). As we shall see, there was some confusion among the compilers as to which demonic power held jurisdiction over these domains.

The Five Sons of Darkness

Theodore bar Khonai makes an ambiguous reference to "five sons of darkness" (314.8, 22 [Scher]) who are said to devour the Five Sons of First Man. Presumably the demonic powers who rule the five worlds.

The Five Trees (of Darkness)

While the Book of Giants refers to the fact that the "misguided" fail to recognize the "five elements, [the five kinds of] trees, (and) the five (kinds of) animals" (146 [Henning]), Theodore states that when the Messenger had slain Sin, part of its carcass fell to the ground to produce "Five Trees" (317.3 [Scher]).

Other

Added to this list could be some miscellaneous references from Shabuhragan to the "Five Houses" (mān panz) of the Light Chariot, the "Five Angels" (prēstag panz) who collect souls, the "Five Arches" (tāg panz) built by the Living Spirit over earth (M 98/99 [Boyce y, 60–62]), as well as the "Five Constellations" (panzān axtarān): Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, and Leo (Shabuhragan M 7980–7984 [Boyce y, 66]), and the five components of human body created by demon Āz: bones, nerves, flesh, arteries, and skin (Shabuhragan M 7980–7984). None of these, however, carry the same weight in subsequent Manichaean discourse.

While the five-part structures noted above only provide an incomplete picture of what might have existed in Mani's (mostly lost) canonical writings, they are enough to show two aspects of Manichaean discourse that will be encountered repeatedly throughout the course of this study. First, that one of the basic features of Manichaean myth-making is the attribution of five qualities to both good and evil beings, as well as the organization of such beings into groups of five, a phenomenon which is evident especially in Theodore bar Khonai's and al-Nadīm's accounts and, as such, must have formed part of the way in which Mani (at least sometimes) expressed his ideas.[39] Thus, Mani can be said to have established the basic paradigm for this kind of thinking. Second is the fact that already in canonical traditions it can be observed that certain important pentads were known under a variety of aliases.[40]

It should be noted, however, that Theodore bar Khonai's account, which was paraphrased earlier, appears to place emphasis on the basic triadic structure of the mythic narrative.[41] According to Theodore, three groups of three beings are presented as a series of three evocations, or emanations, through which the drama of salvation unfolds. In this account, five-part series appear to be more attributive and functional in support of the main actors from what is essentially a three-act play. For instance, the Five Sons of First Man function as "armour" for their father, who is the real hero of the first evocation, while the Five Sons of the Living Spirit, from the second evocation, appear in support of their parent, who employs them for the creation and maintenance of the cosmos.

In contrast to the emphasis on triads that can be observed in Mani's canonical discourse, the Kephalaia attempts to bring pentads to the fore. While extensive use is made of canonical pentads from the light-realm such as the Five Limbs, the Five Elements/Sons of First Man, and the Five Sons of the Living Spirit, such series are employed by the compilers of the Kephalaia, by and large, in support of other themes such as the nature of divine being and cosmic parallelism. In addition,

[39] The alternative would be that, by Theodore's time, canonical sources (or even pseudo-canonical sources for that matter) were "retro-fitted" to conform to later scholastic developments.

[40] This may have been due, in part, to the difficulty of rendering Syriac terms like shekinah and ziwanē into Greek and Coptic. Thus, it is not necessarily Mani's doing.

they seem to have been equally interested in other non- (or at least only quasi-) canonical series, such as those that came to be known as the Five Fathers and the Five Greatnesses. These latter series, as we shall see, exemplify the attempt by the Kephalaia compilers to transform the basic mythological structure of Manichaean cosmogony from one based on triads to one based on pentads. This process, which for our purposes will be termed pentadic redaction, is a reflection of the compilers' desire to make sense of what may have been obscure or ambiguous canonical material by shaping it into what seemed to them to be a more cohesively structured whole. As for the dark-realm, we shall see that even though the compilers also made use of canonical series such as Five Worlds of Darkness and the Five Trees, these were not always as clearly defined as those belonging to the light-realm. Nevertheless, even though the compilers sought to clarify how these more ambiguous formulations ought to be understood and placed in opposition to series from the light-realm, their inherently negative associations inevitably led to their being employed for certain polemical ends largely aimed at rival religious communities. Finally, the Kephalaia also presents a number of more generalized pentadic series relating to a variety of soteriological, ethical, ecclesiological, polemical, and aetiological themes that equally speak to the compilers' desire to construct a distinctly Manichaean reality based on pentads.

As such, in order to understand how five-part patterns contribute to the function and originality of the Kephalaia, this study will examine the occurrence of both explicit and implicit five-part structures in order to discover how the compilers shaped, expanded, and redacted canonical material in an effort to communicate their own particular themes and concerns.

CHAPTER ONE

BASIC ONTOLOGICAL PATTERNING

The Two Trees and the Five Limbs

There can be no denying that the foundation of Manichaeism is to be found in the doctrine of the Two Natures, since this concept served as the basis for Manichaean ontology, cosmology, and ethics. As such, it is no surprise that, after establishing the authority of Mani as the most recent messenger of God and legitimizing the validity of the Kephalaia as a literary enterprise (1 Ke 9.6–10)[1] in both the "Prologue" and Chapter 1, the doctrine of Two Natures would be addressed by the Kephalaia compilers straightaway in Chapter 2 "The Second, on the Parable of the Tree." In this chapter, Mani is asked by his disciples to give an exegetical reading of Matthew 7:17–20/Luke 6:43–44,[2] where Jesus explains to his disciples that the quality of every tree can be derived from an evaluation of its fruit (1 Ke 17.2–20), while at the same time alluding to an alternate reading of the same text among "the Sects" (ⲛⲇⲟⲅⲙⲁ), the generic Manichaean designation for any number of rival religious communities. First, Mani is made to caution that appearances can be deceiving. In the natural world, for instance, the "date-palm" (ⲃⲛⲛⲉ), in spite of its pleasant appearance, is said to be quite useless (1 Ke 17.32 ff.). Similarly, Judas, although he seemed to be a good disciple, still betrayed his master (1 Ke 19.1–6), while Paul, though seemingly wicked and a persecutor of the church, ultimately turned out to be one if its most productive founders (1 Ke 19.7–17).

[1] One of Mani's principal critiques of previous religious traditions was the fact that the founders did not record their teaching in writing and thus it was corrupted by later disciples (1 Ke 8.8–28; see also Chapter 151 [On the Ten Advantages of the Manichaean Religion] [1 Ke 371.6–30]). Yet even though Mani seems to have gone to great lengths to record his message in his own series of self-consciously canonical writings, he is conveniently made to legitimize the Kephalaia's expansion of and commentary on this tradition by both the "Prologue" and "Epilogue" of the work (see Funk, "Reconstruction").

Mani is then made to explain how the "Good Tree" has "Five Limbs" (1 Ke 20.12–14), which in turn are said to represent five key components of the Manichaean cosmos:

> … it (that is, the good tree) has Five Limbs / [which are: Consideration, Counsel, Insight, Thought] / Mind. Its Consideration is the Holy Church. Its Counsel / is the Column of Glory, the Perfect Man. Its Insight / is the First Man, who dwells in the Ship of the Living / Waters. Its Thought is the Third Messenger / [who dwells in] the Ship of the Living Fire, which shines in / [the world]. But, the Mind is the Father, who dwells in the Great-/ness, who exists perfectly in the Aeon of Light. / … this, that the souls who come and attain / the Holy [Church] and also the alms which the Cate-/[chumens] give, as they are purified by the Holy Church / … every deed. Consideration is that which will … / … they ascend to … … is Counsel, / [they] ascend to Insight, which is the First Man, / who dwells in the Ship of the Night. From Insight they ascend / to Thought, which is the Messenger, who dwells in / the Ship of the Day. But he, the Great Thought, who / … them to Mind, who is the Father, the God / of Truth, the great Mind of all Aeons of Glory (1 Ke 20.12–31).

Here the Five Limbs are enumerated in canonical, but ascending, order.[3] In this way, the Five Limbs are presented by the Kephalaia compilers in Chapter 2 as part of a programmatic statement whereby the essentially five-fold nature of being is reflected in the five stages of light liberation from the community and ritual context of the Holy Church, where the ritual activities occur (Consideration), to the cosmic conduit of the Column of Glory, which draws the light particles up (Counsel), through to the first (Insight) and second (Thought) light vessels, onto the divine homeland of the Father (Mind). This enumeration is then contrasted with the limbs of the Evil Tree.

The Five Limbs of the Evil Tree are (somewhat awkwardly) made to parallel those of the Good Tree:

> … … the evil [tree] has Five Limbs / [which] are: Consideration, Counsel, Insight, Thought, [Mind]. / Its [Consideration is] the Law of Death which the Sects / are taught. Its Counsel is the transmigration … / in [various] kinds. But, its Insight is the [fiery] furnaces of / … … Gehenna, which are filled with smoke. Its Thought … / … … the vessel. Its Mind is … / … … the lump, the last bond, the … / … … those who Satan has [cast] (1 Ke 21.28–36).

[3] See Chapter 25, where the Limbs are listed in descending order.

These Limbs are associated with a progressive process of damnation from the sectarian context or "Law of Death" (Consideration), through the soul's transmigration (Counsel), to Gehenna (Insight), a vessel of some kind (Thought), then finally the eschatological lump, or bolos (Mind), into which all matter will be moulded at the end of time (1Ke 21.28–36). One might have expected that the Limbs of the Evil Tree would have been identified with negatively valued qualities such as ignorance, stupidity, or apostasy, but instead, the compiler of Chapter 2 works to establish a direct parallel between the Limbs of the Tree of Light and those of the Tree of Darkness. Such a manoeuvre is in contrast to the concept of the Five Elements for which there are two different sets. This seems to indicate either that a canonical series of Dark Limbs did not exist or that the series of divine Limbs was canonically applied to the dark-realm. The latter case appears unlikely, given the great care that was generally taken in completely dissociating the Two Natures. Instead, it is more likely that the Kephalaia compiler carried over the same canonical series in order to create a symmetrical contrast of the Two Trees and to re-emphasize the chapter's cautionary message about appearances. After all, evil, although essentially different, may nevertheless appear seductive and beguiling to those not adept at separating one tree from the other. In fact, Chapter 2, although ostensibly a discussion of the Two Trees, could equally be characterized as a discourse on the "Two Paths"—the good path that leads to liberation and the luminous homeland of the Father and the evil path that traps souls within the cycle of transmigration and ultimate destruction.[4] That both "paths" are described as having five stages is a reflection of the basic five-fold structure of both good and evil entities.

Indeed, we do know that Mani himself characterized his two opposed principles as two fruit-producing trees known as the "Tree of Life" and the "Tree of Death" from Severus of Antioch (Homily 123. 104–105),[5] although in his account there is no explicit association with the New Testament parable. Moreover, the language used by Mani in these citations is more cosmological in orientation, since he places emphasis on the fact that the Tree of Life occupies the northern, eastern, and western regions of the cosmos, while the Tree of Death is confined to the south. This means that, while the Kephalaia compilers have adapted a canonical metaphor, they have given it a different colouring.

[5] Reeves, Jewish Lore, 169.

This ornamentation of the Two Natures with parallel, but ontologically opposed, five-part series, so prominently placed in Chapter 2, previews the way in which good and evil beings are generally conceived by the Kephalaia compilers and establishes a general ontological framework for the interpretation of all sorts of cosmic phenomena. As such, five-part structure was intimately associated with one of the basic, foundational, and no doubt most primitive, of Manichaean metaphors.[6] In fact, just as Manichaean theology as a whole is sometimes characterized as the doctrine of the "two principles and the three times," Chapter 2 could be stereotyped as encapsulating the Kephalaia's theology in terms of "Two Trees and Five Limbs."

[6] Lieu suggests that the motif of the Two Trees is "unrelated" to the concept of the Two Natures ("Manichaean technici termini," 251), although I do not believe that this assertion can be justified.

CHAPTER TWO

THEOLOGICAL PATTERNING I: LIGHT-REALM

The Faces of the Father

Given the fact that, as we just saw, one of the basic metaphors for Manichaean ontology attributes five qualities to each of the Two Principles, it would be expected that a similar characterization be applied to the Father of Greatness, the ruler of the light-realm and the personification of the good principle. Chapter 21 "On the Father of Greatness, how he is established and defined" (1 Ke 64.21–23) is particularly informative in this regard:

> Just as he [is found] established in his Five Light-Limbs, which are / … the storehouses which are without measure or limit / … Mind, Thought, Insight, Counsel, and [Consideration] / … his Twelve Light-Limbs, which are / his Twelve Wisdoms. Five Great Limbs / of Light are found in each one … Five Great / Fountains of Blessing gush forth … There are Five Great / [Trees(?)] … … of Light (1 Ke 64.20–28).

In this case, the Five Limbs, which we previously saw were applied to the Two Trees, represent those entities which in Theodore bar Khonai's account are known by the Syriac term shekinah (ܫܟܝܢܬܐ), although their apparent characterization as his "Storehouses" (ⲛⲧⲁⲙⲓⲟⲛ) (1 Ke 64.22) may represent an attempt to represent this term more fully.[1] These Five Storehouses, in turn, are associated with Twelve Light-Limbs, also described as Twelve Wisdoms.[2] In turn, we learn that "Five Great Fountains of Blessing" (ϯⲉ ⲛⲛⲁⲟ ⲛϩⲁⲗⲙⲉ ⲛⲧⲉ ⲡⲥⲁⲙⲉ) (1 Ke 64.26–27) surround the Father, and, in what appears to be an extension of the basic tree metaphor, "Five Great Trees(?)" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲛⲁⲟ ⲛⲱⲙ) (1 Ke 64.28). What follows is an enumeration of five characteristics of the Father which, unfortunately, the lacunose state of the text prevents us from completely identifying. All that can be determined for certain from Chapter 21 is the following list 1) light, 2) pleasant odour, 3) living voice of …, 4) …-ness, and 5) great … (1Ke 64.29–65.2). There is, however, a striking parallel between this passage and a section of the Mandaean Right-Ginza, which characterizes the "King of Light" as possessing five qualities: 1) light, 2) fragrance, 3) sweetness of voice, 4) potency of voice, and 5) beauty.[3]

[1] The Greek term tamieion, however, is usually reserved in the Kephalaia for the regions of darkness (see Kephalaia Chapter 6). See also 2 Ps. 200.1. Why the compilers opted for the term "Limbs" rather than "Aeons," as the shekinahs are known in the Synaxeis codex (Funk, personal communication), remains a mystery.

It is unclear whether or not these five qualities are related to the Five Vital Powers found in a Middle Persian fragment attributed to the Shabuhragan by Hutter[4] and discussed by Polotsky[5] from Sogdian fragment M 14, which list 1) life, 2) power, 3) light, 4) beauty, and 5) fragrance as five qualities possessed by the soul,[6] although there is some superficial resemblance. Nevertheless, Chapter 21 does make clear that the Kephalaia compilers conceived of the Father of Greatness as a being with five characteristics, although this characterization is a formulation that appears to be at odds with other evidence indicating that the Father was known (perhaps even canonically) as the "Four-faced God."

The epithet "Four-faced" (τετραπρόσωπος) is known from Greek abjuration formulae (Seven Chapters 3.59, Long Formula 1461C.14)[7] and the Manichaean Psalm-Book (ⲛⲟⲩⲧⲉ ⲛⲇⲧⲟⲩϩⲟ) (2Ps. 191.12; 186.9–12), although Merkelbach[8] made a rather forced attempt to see the same set of four qualities expressed in Kephalaia Chapter 4 "On the Four Great Days …," Chapter 20 "The Chapter on the Name of the Fathers," and Chapter 7 "The Seventh, on the Five Fathers." At any rate, the tetrad is relatively well attested in Iranian, Turkish, and Chinese Manichaean sources from the East as representing 1) divinity, 2) light, 3) power, and 4) wisdom (see Iranian: M 176, M 31, M 324; Turkish: T II D 162; Chinese: Hymnscroll).[9][10] Frequently, however, the abjuration formulae are the only sources cited for the presence of this concept in Western Manichaean tradition.[11] Samuel Lieu, in his article on the Greek abjuration formulae, states that another potential occurrence of this tetrad is to be found in the "Prayer of the Emanations" from Kellis.[12] In this case, however, the hymnist seeks to glorify the 1) power, 2) glory, 3) light, 4) word, and 5) majesty of the Father.[13]

According to Williams Jackson, Mani viewed this four-fold nature of divinity as a "cardinal tenet"[14] of Manichaeism, citing a passage from al-Nadīm in which Mani appears to command his followers to believe in the "Four Greatnesses" of divinity, light, power, and wisdom.[15] Similar statements were made by Widengren[16] and Asmussen who characterized the notion of the "four-fold God" as "the essence and synopsis of the whole Manichaean system."[17] In addition, Williams Jackson made allusion to "a somewhat similar fourfold division" described by Theodore bar Khonai, who lists the "four elements" as ašwqr, pršwqr, zwqr, and zrwn (ܐܫܘܩܪ ܦܪܫܘܩܪ ܙܘܩܪ ܙܪܘܢ) which appear to be Syriac transcriptions of Iranian terms.[18] These were interpreted by Zaehner to represent Zurvanite ideas of cosmic conception, birth, decline, and rebirth.[19] This apparent similarity, however, became one of the key components of the thesis of Manichaeism's Iranian origins and, as such, was used by Cumont to justify the statement that "l'origine première du système doive être cherchée dans le mazdéisme zervaniste, répandu en Mésopotamie,"[20] in spite of the fact that Theodore himself makes no connection between a Zurvanite and Manichaean tetrad. Considering that Theodore seems to have been aware of the Zurvanite tetrad, this seems like a significant oversight if, as Williams Jackson suggests, the tetrad constituted a "cardinal tenet" of Manichaean doctrine and Theodore wanted to "shame" the Manichaeans through an exposé of their "perverse" doctrines. Surely such a scandalous inclusion of a Zurvanite motif would have fuelled the Syriac polemicist's contempt for Mani's followers.

In light of the fact that evidence continues to mount pointing towards the principally Judaeo-Christian origins of Manichaeism,[21] the "four-faced" God is perhaps better understood as a Zurvanite flourish or accommodation. In Mazdaean theology, the god Ohrmizd was conceived as part of a divine tetrad along with time, space, and religion, although the incorporation of this tetrad into "orthodox" Mazdaeism may have been a response to Zurvanite speculations.[22] Williams Jackson admitted, however, that he could really find only one equivalency between the Manichaean and Zurvanite tetrads,[23] and besides, Zaehner identified the Zurvanite tetrad as time, space, wisdom, and power,[24] which differs markedly from Manichaean attestations. Zaehner also suggested that Zurvanite theology in general was based on an elaborate series of tetrads.[25] Thus, it is conceivable that the particularly Manichaean emphasis on five was meant to counter this pattern. Even an Iranist such as Schaeder suggested that Iranian elements in Manichaeism were a result of Umstilisierung rather than deliberate borrowing or influence.[26] More recently P.O. Skjaervø (following Böhlig) has pointed out that, since the basic formulation of Mani's system is obviously Christian, when he wanted to "dress this myth in Zoroastrian garb" he had little choice but to represent figures such as the Father and the First Man by Zurvan and Ohrmizd.[27] Mere terminological similarities say nothing about origins and derivations, especially at a time when Zoroastrian traditions were themselves in such a state of flux. As Skjaervø succinctly states: "On no account … can it be said that the Zurvanite myth was part of Mani's system, only the name of Zurwān was."[28]

As such, Kephalaia Chapter 21 may represent an attempt by the compilers to distance their discourse from a motif that may have appeared too "Iranian," no longer fit their developing vision of how important divinities should be understood and described, or simply had lost its meaning. If Mani himself employed such an epithet for the Father of Greatness, then this would be a striking instance of the Kephalaia compilers rejecting a canonical formulation in favour of one that was seen as more compatible with their systematization efforts.[29] Ultimately, the compilers appear to have been quite determined to assert as a general principle the fact that Manichaean divinities, even the Father of Greatness, ought to be conceived as possessing five qualities.[30] As we shall see, this conception of the highest divinity, in turn, fits with their wider efforts at the pentadization of other cosmogonic, ethical, ecclesiological, and soteriological themes so evident in the first volume of Kephalaia.

The Many Sons of Man

The series of beings known to the Kephalaia primarily as the "Five Sons of First Man" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲱⲏⲣⲉ ⲙⲡⲱⲁⲣⲡ ⲛⲣⲱⲙⲉ) is somewhat problematic due, in part, to the variety of alias under which it was known. Also known as the Five "Elements" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲥⲧⲟⲓⲭⲉⲓⲱⲛ) (1 Ke 43.2), these "Five Sons" (ܒܢܝ ܐܒܗܬܐ) are characterized by Theodore bar Khonai as the "Five Shining Gods" (ܐܠܗ̈ܐ ܢܗܝܪ̈ܐ ܒܢܝ̈ܢ),[31] and though not

[29] Even Merkelbach is forced to admit that certain Kephalaia chapters seem to expand the tetrad into a pentad (Mani, 45), although he offers no explanation.

[30] Interestingly, a Coptic Manichaean text from Kellis (T. Kell. Copt. 1) describes how the "Third Messenger" reflects the "five properties (σχήματα) of the Father" (see Kellis Literary Texts I, 2).

[31] They are also called "Sons of Light" (ܒܢܝ ܢܘܗܪܐ) (Hypatius, 81.43 [Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 234]) and "Shining Sons" (ܒܢܝ ܢܗܝܪ) by Ephraim (Hypatius, 101.5–24 [Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 235]). Such an expression may lie behind the Coptic formulation "Five Splendours of the Son of Man" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲣⲙⲛⲡⲣ̈ⲓⲉ ⲛⲱⲏⲣⲉ ⲙⲡⲣⲱ[ⲙ]ⲉ) (1 Ke 89.8–9). It seemed much more likely to Burkitt that Jesus, to whom the same term "splendour" is also applied, should be styled "Jesus the Living" or "Life-giving." This, of course, is not how Manichaean translators understood the term, since it is eminently clear that the "Five Sons/Elements" of early Manichaean tradition were understood in Coptic as ⲡⲣ̈ⲓⲉ—"shining forth." While it is certainly possible that Manichaean translators misunderstood such a key technical term (see Franzmann, "Syriac-Coptic Bilinguals," 118–119), it seems unlikely. It is far more probably that the basic elements of the light-realm, not to mention Jesus (one of its key emissaries), were explicitly enumerated in his account, are known from Coptic and other sources[32] as representing 1) Living Air (ⲡⲁⲏⲣ ⲉⲧⲁⲛϩ), 2) Wind (ⲡⲧⲏⲩ), 3) Light (ⲡⲟⲩⲁ̈ⲏⲉ), 4) Water (ⲡⲙⲁⲩ), and 5) Fire (ⲧⲥⲉⲧⲉ). As the essence of soul and the antithesis of matter,[33] the Five Sons/Elements play a central role in the Manichaean conception of redemption, since they constitute the luminous essence that must be liberated through Manichaean ascetic and liturgical practice. In this way, they form the most direct link between Manichaean myth and praxis.

Outside of the Kephalaia there are surprisingly few explicit references (other than those mentioned above) to the Five Sons of First Man, the Five Elements, or the Five Intellectuals in other edited Manichaean Coptic texts—although there are a small number of implicit references (2 Ps. 12.25; 36.22), including an enumeration of each element in a "Psalm of the Wanderers" (2 Ps. 137.20–37). In itself, this is not surprising given the liturgical and hagiographical nature of edited texts such as the Psalm-Book and the Homilies. One notable exception, however, can be found in "Bema Psalm 223," where the Father's "strong son" (ⲙⲡⲉϥ[ϣⲏ]ⲣⲉ ⲛϫⲱⲣⲉ) (2 Ps. 10.7) produces "a Virgin equipped with Five Powers" (ⲛⲧⲉϥ[ⲡⲁ]ⲣⲑⲉⲛⲟⲥ ⲉⲥⲧⲏϣ ⲁϩⲣⲏⲓ̈ ⲁ̀ⲧⲉ ⲛⲟⲁⲙ) (2 Ps. 10.8) in order to fight the forces of darkness. This reference not only provides an additional synonym for the Five Sons/Elements, but somewhat surprisingly attributes them to a mysterious virgin-figure, who appears to act as a kind of consort or twin to First Man.

On the surface, it is difficult to see why these light-substances should have been described as "sons" at all, since functionally, the "Five Sons" constitute the "armour" or "garments" (1 Ke 69.18; 262.25) put on by First Man before going out to engage the powers of darkness.[34] Perhaps this was simply a result of conventions of language regularly employed described as entities which reflect their origin by emanating their essence—in other words, they shine.

[32] The canonical order of these elements seems to have been, at least for polemicists, a bit of a problem. Ephraim, for instance, makes reference to air (ܐܘܪ) (Hypatius, 31.11 [Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 260–261]), light (ܢܘܗܪܐ), wind (ܪܘܚܐ), water (ܡܝܐ), and fire (ܢܘܪܐ) (Hypatius, 101.5–24 [Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 235]), while the Acta Archelai gives the somewhat idiosyncratic listing of "wind, light, water, fire, and matter (sic!)" (ἄνεμος, φῶς, ὕδωρ, πῦρ, ὕλη) (Beeson), although "matter" (ὕλη) is usually amended by scholars to "air" (ἀήρ) (See Acta Archelai [Vermes/Lieu], 47 n. 40; see also 2 Ps. 137.36).

[33] Polotsky, "Manichäismus," 115.

[34] Theodore bar Khonai even records a Syriac pun on the words for "shining" (ܙܗܪܐ) and "armour" (ܙܝܪܐ) (Reeves, "Citations from Ephrem," 269 n. 9).

by Manichaeans, whereby a series of secondary entities emanated by or associated with another primary being are called "sons."[35] Such a tendency is, in fact, borne out by the testimony of Ephraim, who records the way in which the expressions "sons of Light" (ܒܢܝ ܢܘܗܪܐ) and "sons of Darkness" (ܒܢܝ ܚܫܘܟܐ)[36] formed part of early Manichaean discourse.

The terminological situation becomes more complex in the Kephalaia, since the compilers made use of a number of other co-referential metaphors for the "Five Sons of First Man," namely the "Five Garments" (ϯϵ ⲛϩⲃⲥⲱ) as in Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos" (1 Ke 69.18),[37] as well as the "Five Luminous Gods" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲛⲟⲩⲧⲉ ⲉⲧⲡⲣⲓ[ⲱ]ⲩ) from Chapter 38 "On the Light-Mind, the Apostles, and the Saints" (1 Ke 95.16), and the "Five Shining Men" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲣⲙⲛⲡⲣⲏϵ) (1 Ke 85.34; 88.15; 89.8). While the concept of the Elements as "garments" is not attested in known canonical traditions, the epithets "Five Luminous Gods" and "Five Shining Men" are presumably a reflection of the "Five Shining Gods" (ܚܡܫ ܐܠܗ̈ ܙܝܘܢܝ) known from Theodore bar Khonai.

One co-referential series in particular, however, that seems to have caused a great deal of confusion for both ancient and modern commentators is the grouping known as the "Five Intellectuals" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲛⲟⲉⲣⲟⲛ). While Iain Gardner, in his Kephalaia "Indices" justifiably lists the Five Limbs under the Five Intellectuals,[38] both the Kephalaia and the Psalm-Book typically associated the Intellectuals with the Five Elements, a fact that has already been noted by Van Lindt in his study of Coptic Manichaean terminology.[39] For instance, in Chapter 2 "The Second, on the Parable of the Tree," the "intellectuals" that "clothe" the body of the Column of Glory/Perfect Man are clearly equated with the

"Elements of Light" (1 Ke 20.1–3).[40] This identification can be corroborated by a "Psalm of the Wanderers" which states that the "Five Intellectuals are the Sons of First Man" (2 Ps. 161.25). Nevertheless, there appears to have been a certain degree of ambiguity as to the identity of the Intellectuals, since in Chapter 31, the Five Limbs were also associated with the preparatory activities of First Man (see below). As such, the exact equations between concepts such as the Five Elements, the Five Limbs, and the Five Intellectuals seem to have been complex and may not have been any clearer to the compilers than they are to us.

On the abstract level, however, the Sons/Elements, collectively known as the "Living Soul," are "a property shared by all objects"[41] within the cosmos and serve as an ontological link between the Father of Greatness and his children. This can be established by interpreting the testimony of Theodore bar Khonai, who records that when the Father sought to defend his kingdom from the dark invasion, he says, "I myself will go" (ܒܢܦܫܝ, literally, "by means of my own soul"). As a result, First Man, whom he calls upon, along with the Five Elements, can be interpreted as the "soul" of the Father sent into battle and eventually captured by the powers of darkness. The Manichaean, in turn, is enjoined to "remember" this imprisonment of the Elements, or Living Soul, and to work for their/its liberation.[42] Once this is recognized, the Manichaean may then become, to use BeDuhn's evocative term, "a cog" in the great cosmic machinery of light-liberation.[43] According to the Cologne Mani Codex, the notion of the suffering Living Soul was perceived by Mani at an early age when he heard the cries and lamentations of plants as they were harvested from his sectarian community's vegetable garden (CMC 6–10). This means that, according to Manichaean hagiography at least, the plight of the Living Soul constituted one of Mani's earliest insights into the true nature of the world around him.

compilers seem to have been primarily interested in using them for the formulation of other rhetorically or doctrinally significant number patterns. For instance, according to Chapter 3 "The Interpretation of Happiness, Wisdom, and Power," these three thematic qualities are said to exist at five levels of divine being, from 1) the Father, through the light-vehicles of 2) Sun and 3) Moon, to 4) the Elements and 5) the Holy Church. At the level of the Elements, "happiness" is said to be constituted by the Column of Glory/Perfect Man, the cosmic apparatus for light-liberation, while the Five Sons of the Living Spirit constitute "wisdom." At the same level, however, "power" is manifested by the Five Sons of First Man, who are "folded into the Universe" (1 Ke 24.25).

Being/Context	Happiness	Wisdom	Power
Father	Father	Great Spirit	rich gods & angels/aeon
Sun	Living Spirit	Mother of Life	rich gods & angels
Moon	Mind (of Father)	Virgin of Light	rich gods & angels
Elements	Column of Glory	5 Sons of Living Spirit	5 Sons of First Man
Church	Apostle of Light	Leaders & Teachers	Elect, Virgins, Ascetics, Catechumens

Similarly, in Chapter 4 "On the Four Great Days, which have come out from one another; along with the Four Nights," the twelve hours of the third day are calculated by adding the Five Sons of First Man and the Five Sons of the Living Spirit to Call and Response (1 Ke 25.25–30).

Four Days	Dwelling	Hours
1) Father	Aeon	12 rich gods
2) Third Messenger	Ship of Light	12 virgins
3) Column	(Cosmos)	5 Sons + 5 Sons + Call &Response
4) Jesus the Splendour	Church	12 Wisdoms

An analogous exegetical manoeuvre occurs in Chapter 10 "On the Meaning of the Fourteen [Great] Aeons about which Sethel spoke in [his] Prayer." In this context, the Five Elements/Sons are added to Call and Response to form a first set of seven, while the Five Sons of the Living Spirit are added to the Living Spirit and First Man to form a second set of seven. These, Mani is made to explain, constitute the fourteen "blessings" (ⲛⲥ[ⲙⲁⲙⲉ]) (1 Ke 43.8) or "persons" (ⲙⲡⲣⲟⲥ[ⲱⲡⲟⲛ]) (1 Ke 43.9) through which the world was established.

*5 Elements/Sons + Call &Response	*5 Sons of Living Spirit + Living Spirit & First Man
(Living Air)	(Keeper of Splendour)
(Wind)	(King of Honour)
(Light)	(King of Glory)
(Water)	(Adamas)
(Fire)	(Porter)
Call	Living Spirit
Response	First Man

*Individual elements and sons not explicitly named in chapter.

Also, the Five Sons of First Man are assigned by Chapter 16 "[On the Five] Greatnesses which have [come] out against the Darkness" to the "Second Greatness," along with Mother of Life and First Man (1 Ke 49.19–23):

	Part I	Part II (fragmentary)	Part III
First Greatness	Father	…	First Man son of king
Second Greatness	Mother of Life Fist Man 5 Sons of First Man	…	Living Spirit judge
Third Greatness	Beloved of Lights Great Builder Living Spirit 5 Sons of Living Spirit	…	Third Ambassador king
Fourth Greatness	Third Ambassador Column of Glory Powers of Light	…	Jesus the Splendour up-rooter of trees
Fifth Greatness	Jesus the Splendor All his Powers	…	Call & Response butter in milk

Finally, in Chapter 39 "On the Three Days and the Two Deaths," the "First Death" is marked by the mixture of Darkness and the Five Sons (1 Ke 102.36–103.2).

3 Days & 2 Deaths	Events
1st day	First Man—Living Spirit—Ambassador
2nd day	New Aeon
3rd day	Father reveals himself
1st death	Mixture of Darkness and 5 Sons of First Man
2nd death	Casting out of sinful blasphemers

In this way, even in spite of obvious terminological problems, the Five Sons/Elements were seen more as a convenient rhetorical tool than a concept that required extended commentary and clarification.

What was it, however, that might have led to Mani's equation of the suffering light-soul to a concept of five elements in the first place? Throughout antiquity, against the canonical Empedoclean doctrine of four elements, there was an alternate theory of five elements as the basic building-blocks of the cosmos.[44] While it is unclear who may have originated the idea (i.e., pre-Socratics such as Pherecydes of Syros, Pythagoras, or Philolaus, although Mattéi suggests that Philolaus expounded this doctrine),[45] it seems to have taken root in the early Academy and influenced Aristotle and post-Aristotelian philosophy well into Late Antiquity.[46] Eventually, the quintessence, as it were, or fifth element, came to be recognized as the ethereal substance of the soul and eventually as that of the heavenly sphere and the stars.[47] As for how such a concept might have entered Mani's immediate environment, a doctrine of five elements seems to have played an important role in the cosmogonic teaching of Syriac sage, Bardaisan of Edessa, and his school. Ephraim the Syrian (in the fourth century CE) called Bardaisan the "teacher of Mani," influencing him particularly in the realm of cosmology.[48] Burkitt accepted Ephraim's analysis that Mani derived at least some of his ideas from Bardaisan, but cautions that Mani and Bardaisan, although similar on certain points, hold very different points of view.[49] Drijvers has also emphasized the difference between the two.[50] Polotsky, in the footnotes to his edition, suggested that there is a veiled allusion to Marcion and/or Bardaisan as precursors to Mani in the Kephalaia's "Introduction" (1 Ke 13.30 ff.). But, as with so many of the most interesting thinkers from Late Antiquity, we are forced to rely largely on fragments and secondary testimony for information about Bardaisan's teaching, some of which may actually be drawn from his followers. Nevertheless, later Syriac tradition attributes to Bardaisan the doctrine that the world came to be from the mixture of five elements: fire, wind, water, light, and darkness.[51] But, as Drijvers points out, Bardaisan's cosmological ideas only came under attack in the wake of Manichaeism.[52] Thus, there may have been some desire on the part of later polemicists and heresiologists to overemphasize the role played by Bardaisanean ideas in the formation of Manichaeism. As such, while it is at least possible that Mani drew or adapted a doctrine of five elements from Bardaisan (however reluctantly), the presence of such a doctrine, and the importance of the fifth element as the substance of the soul (not found in Bardaisan), is sufficiently attested in philosophical traditions from Late Antiquity to make other derivations possible.

Cosmic Parallelism

Two chapters in particular demonstrate the Kephalaia compilers' interest in the correspondence between the macrocosm and the microcosm: Chapter 38 "On the Light-Mind, the Apostles, and the Saints," and Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos." In Chapter 38 especially, five-part patterns are omnipresent in that they provide both the literary as well as the theological framework through which this theme is presented. As such, the compilers draw on three canonical pentads, namely the "Five Sons of the Living Spirit,"[53] the "Five Limbs,"[54] and the "Five Virtues," to communicate their message.

[51] See the table of accounts from Barhadbeshabba (6th cent. CE), Moses bar Kepha (10th cent. CE), Iwannis of Dara (9th cent. CE), and Theodore bar Khonai (8th cent. CE) provided by Drijvers in Bardaiṣan, 98–103.

[52] Bardaiṣan, 96.

[53] According to Theodore bar Khonai, in response to the capture of First Man, the Father of Greatness called out a second triad, made up of "Beloved of Lights" (ܚܒܝܒ ܢܗܝܪܐ), "Great Builder" (ܐܒܐ ܕ), and the "Living Spirit" (ܪܘܚܐ ܚܝܐ). Like First Man (the third being of the first emanation), Living Spirit calls upon "Five Sons" who aid in the slaughter of the Archons and the construction of the cosmos, specifically the "Ten Heavens" and the "Eight Earths." These Five Sons are called "Ornament (or Keeper) of Splendour" (ܙܝܘܐ ܢܛܪ), "Great King of Honour" (ܡܠܟܐ ܪܒܐ ܕܝܩܪܐ), "Adamos (sic = Adamas) of Light" (ܐܕܡܐ ܕܢܘܗܪܐ), "King of Glory" (ܡܠܟ ܫܒܚܐ), and "Porter" (ܦܬܚܐ). Personally, I prefer the use of English equivalents for these names, since the use of Latin terminology, such as Splenditenens, Rex honoris, etc., so frequently used in studies of Manichaean myth, creates the false impression that such terms are somehow more original or accurate when in actual fact they are relatively late.

[54] As we have seen, the most important five-part series in the whole of Manichaean discourse is what came to be known in the Graeco-Coptic tradition as the "Five Limbs" (ϯογ ⲙⲙⲉⲗⲟⲥ). They are usually enumerated as 1) Mind, 2) Thought, 3) Insight, 4) Counsel, and 5) Consideration, although how to accurately translate these terms has

On the rhetorical level, the central importance of five-part patterning to Chapter 38 is made evident by its initial literary frame, since in an effort to have Mani address the issue of theodicy, the unnamed disciple is made to pose a series of five questions:

> Again at one occasion, a disciple questioned the [Apostle], / saying to him: You have told us that the Light-Mind / is that which comes and supports the saints. [You have told] / us therefore that even though it is one of the gods … / … many gods exist in it. You have told / us also that at the time it enters into [the body] / of the flesh and binds the Old Man with his Five Counsels, / setting up its Five Counsels on him in the Five Limbs / [of his] body. Where is it [though], since the Old Man is bound in the / body? For, I (can) see that rebellions occur in its / bond from time to time. Secondly, I ask / you: If indeed it is a great god, unchanging and / immeasurable, how does it come to appear in the smallness of the / body?
> The third thing that I want you to tell / me [is this: If(?)] the Mind is holy and pure, / [how did it come to be joined to(?)] the impurity of this body? /
> Fourthly, if truly, the Light-Mind is present in [the] / saints, why does its likeness not appear to us as it / is? The fifth thing: I want / you to tell me (about) and explain your apostleship. / For, behold, it is not clear to me, since they oppress / you and persecute you in the world. / I implore you that you persuade me about these things which I have asked you (1 Ke 89.21–90.7).

Basically, what the disciple wants to know is how a great and noble divine power such as the Light-Mind can inhabit a small and defiled been the subject of perennial debate within Manichaean studies. The Syriac version of the series ܪܥܝܢܐ ܪܥܬܥܣܐ ܪܚܝܢܐ ܪܟܪܗ ܪܥܡ (Theodore bar Khonai 313.17 [Scher]) is equivalent to the Greek terms νοῦς, ἔννοια, φρόνησις, ἐνθύμησις, λογισμός, which were then rendered into Latin as mens, sensus, prudentia, intellectus, cogitatio (Acta Archelai, 10 [Beeson, 15.11/25]). In Coptic the series is ⲛⲟⲩⲥ, ⲙⲉⲩⲉ, ⲥⲃⲱ, ⲥⲁϫⲛⲉ, ⲙⲁⲕⲙⲉⲕ. Originally, these are what Theodore identifies as the Five shekinahs (ⲥⲏⲙ ⲛⲁⲥⲧⲁⲥⲉ) (Theodore bar Khonai 313.16 [Scher]). In Syriac, the word ܪܥܬܥܣ represents the "dwelling-place" or "presence" of divinity, as in a temple or shrine (Payne-Smith, 576b). In Theodore's account, the ethereal shekinahs of the Father are contrasted with the more concrete "worlds" (حلم) of the King of Darkness. Why the shekinahs were understood as "Limbs" (ⲙⲙⲉⲗⲟⲥ) by the compilers remains a bit of a puzzle, since when associated with the Father of Greatness they would be more properly understood as "aeons" (ⲛⲁⲓⲱⲛ). This is, in fact, precisely how they are characterized in the Coptic version of Mani's Living Gospel (Funk, personal communication). This rendering, however, does not seem to have greatly influenced the Kephalaia tradition, which opted for the occasional use of ⲛⲧⲁⲙⲓⲟⲛ and the more regular use of ⲙⲙⲉⲗⲟⲥ. It does seem, however, that al-Nadīm provides evidence that even in Syriac tradition they may have already been characterized as "Limbs" (Fihrist, 768 [Dodge]).

body. Moreover, if this is indeed the case why does Sin[55] (i.e., "rebellion") persist? These two basic questions, however, are extended (somewhat artificially perhaps) into a five-part schema:

> Question i) Where is the Light-Mind in the body, if there are rebellions?
> Question ii) How can this great god come into a small body?
> Question iii) How can the pure Mind occupy the defiled body?
> Question iv) If the Light-Mind exists in the saints, why don't we see his likeness?
> Question v) What is the nature of your apostolate, if you are persecuted?

In response, Mani is made to begin his discourse with an analogy[56] in five parts. The first part of the analogy suggests that the cosmos (metaphorically understood as "Error" [ⲡⲗⲁⲛⲏ]) is constructed like a human body (1 Ke 90.20–22). Its external aspects are described in descending order from head to feet (1 Ke 90.22–33), while its internal aspects are described from interior to exterior, from heart to skin (1 Ke 91.1–5), followed by several characteristics made unclear by lacunae in the text (1 Ke 91.5–13). According to the second part of the analogy, the soul of the cosmos is represented by the Five Sons of the Living Spirit (the Keeper of Splendor, the King of Honour, the Adamas of Light, the King of Glory, and the Porter), who are characterized as "Five Sleepless Watchers" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛ̀ⲥⲟⲩⲣⲓⲧ ⲛⲁⲧⲛⲕⲁⲧⲉ) (1 Ke 91.19) and are related to the Five Limbs (Mind, Thought, Insight, Counsel, Consideration) (1 Ke 91.14–33). To these two groups of five is added a sixth element in the form of a pair: "call and response" (ⲧⲱϩⲙⲉ / ⲥⲱⲧⲙⲉ) (1 Ke 92.2–3)—the dual values at the core of the Manichaean drama of salvation. Part three states that the Column of Glory represents the Light-Mind at the cosmic level (1 Ke 92.5–6), while part four recounts how the dark powers have rebelled in the watch districts of each of the Five Sons (1 Ke 92.12–93.15). Finally, the fifth part of the analogy describes how the Column of Glory (acting as a kind of Light-Mind for the cosmos) assists the Five Sons in suppressing the rebellions in their respective watch districts (93.16–94.16). By means of this analogy, Mani is made to set up the basic thesis of the discourse, namely that the Light-Mind is indeed present in the body in spite of the presence of sin, thereby answering the first of the disciple's questions.

[56] Nagel characterized this as the "makrokosmisch-mikrokosmisch … Lagerallegorie" ("Anatomie des Menschen in gnostischer und manichäischer Sicht," 88).

This first part of the discourse is expressed using a series of five-fold structures that progressively integrate each part of the argument while consistently enumerating the five thematic elements in canonical order. The rhetorical repetition of five is meant to express the fundamental interconnectedness of all facets of Manichaean teaching and to reflect the quasi-scientific allure of Manichaean doctrines in Late Antiquity. The Elect, to whom this discourse is addressed, would have had no difficulty in accepting the Manichaean logic of this vivid cosmological narrative.

Mani, then, is made to continue with arguments in support of his position by shifting first to the microcosmic level of the body and second to the level of the community. By way of introduction, Mani answers the second of the disciples' five questions (i.e., How can such a great god dwell in a small body?) by stating that even though the gods are great and mighty (1 Ke 95.4), they are nevertheless bound within their proper places (1 Ke 95.4–9). Following this, Mani answers the third of the five questions (i.e., How can the pure Mind occupy the defiled body?) by describing the creation of the body (what Manichaeans term the "Old Man") by the agency of Sin. According to the Apostle of Light, Sin bound the Five Limbs in the body: Mind in bone, Thought in sinew, Insight in vein, Counsel in flesh, and Consideration in skin (1 Ke 95.13–19). The Light Mind, however, acts to free the Limbs from their bonds (1 Ke 96.8–21), and reestablish them in the Five Virtues of the "New Man," or redeemed individual. As such, Mind becomes love, Thought faith, Insight perfection, Counsel patience, and Consideration wisdom (1 Ke 96.25–97.6).

Once again the number five plays a crucial role in the elaboration of this highly structured portion of the discourse. The five-fold schema of the Limbs is enumerated again in the same canonical order (Mind, Thought, Insight, Counsel and Consideration) in each of the three occurrences, which, in turn, reflect the three key points in the salvation narrative in which the Light-Mind plays a critically important role: imprisonment, liberation, and re-creation.

Sin bound LIMBS in the body,	but LIGHT-MIND frees them,	and creates the NEW MAN.
i) MIND in bone,	i) MIND from bone,	i) MIND is love
ii) THOUGHT in sinew,	ii) THOUGHT from sinew,	ii) THOUGHT is faith
iii) INSIGHT in vein,	iii) INSIGHT from vein,	iii) INSIGHT is perfection
iv) COUNSEL in flesh,	iv) COUNSEL from flesh,	iv) COUNSEL is patience
v) CONSIDERATION in skin.	v) CONSIDERATION from skin.	v) CONSIDERATION is wisdom

What follows is a discussion of the implications of Sin and adversity at the community level. Here Mani emphasizes that even though the Light-Mind is king of the New Man, Sin may still cause disruptions and lead to difficulties in the Manichaean church:[57]

> As long as the Limbs of Sin[58] are bound / in this way, Sin is contained. Even though the Light-Mind / [is] king, tribulation may still occur in the body from / time to time. Sometimes Sin rises / up in his Consideration and disturbs Counsel, and confuses / the Wisdom and the understanding of the man (1 Ke 97.23–28).

Each of the New Man's Five Limbs,[59] along with the Five Virtues attached to them, can be disturbed and disrupted by Sin, causing doubt in the believer and his or her possible departure from the church. In this case, however, the presence of the Light-Mind in the individual may be preserved by the members of the community, who attempt to "correct his wisdom" (1 Ke 97.33). Yet even the correction and rebuke of the community may not suffice to keep the Light-Mind active in the individual. Eventually, the Mind "(will) be dispersed from him and return to the Apostle who sent it" (1 Ke 99.13–14). This individual will become like "a bird plucked of its feathers" (1 Ke 99.17). Such statements are presumably meant to justify the loss of community members within the wider context of the persistent activity of sin in the cosmos.

Mani then goes on to restate the answers to the first three questions and respond to the fourth (i.e., If the Light-Mind exists in the saints, why don't we see his likeness?), by suggesting that the likeness of the Light-Mind cannot be known since it is not visible in the body (1 Ke 99.24). In addition, Mani re-enforces the macrocosmic/microcosmic parallelism at the core of his argumentation and re-assures the audience about the strong presence of the Light-Mind:

[57] There is an intriguing correlation here with the Cologne Mani Codex. The actual title of this work is Περὶ τῆς γέννης τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ, "On the Origin of His Body," i.e., of his church. Thus, there may be an implicit parallel understood here in Chapter 38 between the metaphor of the body at the cosmological, anthropological, and ecclesiological levels. See Cameron and Dewey, The Cologne Mani Codex, 2 and Henrichs and Koenen, Der Kölner Mani-Kodex.

[58] Funk, A&C.

[59] In terms of rhetorical structure, it is interesting to note that in this instance, where the Five Limbs are invoked, there is an inversion of their order. This can perhaps be explained by the fact that from a "higher" cosmological perspective the Five Limbs descend in their value, while in the "lower" community context, they ascend. Also, Consideration is presumably weaker than Mind and, as such, would be attacked by sin first.

> Behold the strength and the efficiency of the Light-/Mind: how great it is on all the watch-towers of / the body. It stands in its encampment (and) shields / every impulse of the body from the attractions of Sin. / It fixes them, scatters them, (and) sets them right / according to his will (1 Ke 100.1–100.6).

In conclusion, Mani is made to respond to the fifth and final question by invoking, again in five parts, his own superior status as a prophet. He outlines how he has come into the world as a lone individual and has conquered with the word of God regions which cannot be conquered by force of arms. Even though the powers of the world have attempted to destroy his message, they have failed. In response to such adversities, Mani has freed his children and equipped them with superior wisdom. No one has accomplished more than him, except for Jesus himself (1 Ke 100.15–102.3). In this way, Mani is made to rhetorically re-enforce the superior value of his revelation in the face of persecutions by the worldly powers and thereby validate the chapter's thematic parallelism.

As we can see, Chapter 38 uses an elaborate mixture of five-part theological and literary patterns to communicate its message of reassurance in the face of sin and evil and to emphasize the analogous relationship between the macrocosmic and microcosmic powers. In addition, it reinforces the intimate relationship between three canonical pentads: The Five Sons of the Living Spirit, the Five Limbs, and the Five Virtues. To Manichaeans accustomed to this way of thinking, Chapter 38 no doubt offered an impressive presentation of a persistent theological and community problem.

A similar, although less extensive, analogy between body and cosmos is drawn in Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos." In this chapter, we are told that "the entire cosmos, above and below, resembles the human body" (1 Ke 169.29–30), with each component of the cosmos compared to a part of the body (1 Ke 170.2–16). Here too, as in Chapter 38, the Five Sons of the Living Spirit are described as "Watchers" (ⲙⲙⲁⲛⲣⲁⲓⲥ) (1 Ke 171.28) of five regions of the cosmos (1 Ke 170.21–171.15), called "encampments" (ⲙⲡⲁⲣⲁⲙⲡⲟⲗⲏ) (1 Ke 170.21) or "watch-towers" (ⲛⲟⲩⲣⲱϥⲉ) (1 Ke 171.11), while the Light-Mind guards five "encampments" of the body:

> [Just as] these Five Watchers are found in this great / [bond of these Five] Encampments that I have proclaimed / to you, so too is it with this body, which the / Elect bear. There are Five other Encampments / in it. The Light-Mind guards them along with the / New Man who is with him (1 Ke 171.28–172.4).

Also, as in Chapter 38, "tribulation" (ⲑⲗⲓⲫⲓⲥ) (1 Ke 171.11) is said to persist under the watch of the guardians (1 Ke 171.11–172.1). Finally, each of the Five Sons of the Living Spirit is compared to an Elect who, with the aid of the Light-Mind, is able to control the various parts of the body (1 Ke 172.3–20).

5 Sons of the Living Spirit	who rule	are like Elect who
Keeper of Splendour	First Three Heavens	rules face
King of Honour	Next Seven Heavens	rules heart
Adamas	Firmament to Four Earths	rules chest
King of Glory	Three Wheels & Three Earths	rules stomach
Porter	Great Earth & Four Fixtures	rules feet

In this way it can be seen that, in two different chapters (Chapters 38 and 70), the Kephalaia compilers sought to emphasize the correspondence between the cosmos and the human form—a concept essential to the Manichaean worldview. This was done to reassure the community that parallel processes of rebellion and divine suppression are at work at both levels of being. In this way, readers could imagine their own bodies as encapsulating the cosmic struggle against the powers of darkness.

Fathers of Greatness

One favourite activity of the Kephalaia compilers that speaks to their deliberate efforts at pentadic redaction is the grouping of beings from the light-realm into series known either as the "Five Fathers" or the "Five Greatnesses." The first major discussion of this theme can be found in the work as early as Chapter 7 "The Seventh, on the Five Fathers," where the compiler took the unusual step of numerically identifying the placement of the chapter in its title.[60] In this chapter, Mani is made to explain that the Five Fathers have their origin in the Father of Greatness and that all have shared in the victory over the powers of darkness. Each of the Five Fathers is named, along with three of their emanations:

[60] This seems to occur in only one other chapter in 1 Ke—Chapter 2, and apparently not at all in 2 Ke (see Funk, "Reconstruction," 158–159).

5 Fathers	1st Emanation	2nd Emanation	3rd Emanation
1st Father of Greatness	Great Spirit/Mother	Beloved of Lights	Third Messenger[61]
2nd Third Messenger	Column of Glory	Jesus the Splendour	Virgin of Light
3rd Jesus the Splendour	Light-Mind	Great Judge	Youth
4th Light-Mind	Apostle of Light	Twin	Light-Form
5th Light-Form	Victory-Angel	Garment-Angel	Crown-Angel

Essentially, what this chapter presents is a five-part ontology of salvation. These Five Fathers represent the five ontological levels at which the work of salvation takes place: 1) the pre-cosmic context of the Light-realm (Father of Greatness), 2) the cosmic context of creation and the defeat of the Archons (Third Messenger), 3) the eschatological context of human history, judgement, and redemption (Jesus the Splendour), 4) the prophetological context of revelation and apostleship (Light Mind), and 5) the ethical and ecclesiological context of the Holy Church (Light-Form).

Whereas the canonical version of the myth, as known from Theodore bar Khonai, contains three series of emanations,[62] the compilers of Chapter 7 extend this canonical formulation to a five stage process of salvation, with three emanations occurring at each stage. Moreover, each stage moves towards a progressive focalization of the myth from the generalized, pre-cosmic context of the Father of Greatness down to the specific context of the individual Manichaean who has received the Light-Form. For example, stage one of salvation occurs at the broad, pre-cosmic level where the three "canonical" emanations occur out of the Father of Greatness.[63] This establishes the transcendent framework of salvation. Stage two brings into focus the three components of the Third Messenger, the third canonical emanation, who provides the means by which salvation can be achieved by human beings. Stage three enumerates three hypostases of Jesus the Splendour, the main intermediary from the third emanation, who acts not only as enlightener and bringer of the Light-Mind, but as eschatological judge as well. Stage four speci-

[61] The Third Messenger was prematurely identified as the "Second Father" by the redactor in the list of the Father of Greatness' three emanations (1 Ke 34.33).

[62] This, of course, cannot be verified since Theodore's account of the myth breaks off after Jesus the Splendour's encounter with Adam.

[63] It is important to keep in mind the role of synonymy in early Manichaean discourse. Even though three beings are emanated in each of the three canonical emanations, only one is named here as representative. Even though the Manichaean myth presents a multiplicity of different beings, in many instances they may be understood as diverse manifestations and hypostases of an original triad.

fies the three principal ways in which the Light-Mind, a main hypostasis of Jesus the Splendour, aids humanity. Finally, stage five enumerates the three gifts gained by the individual once he or she has received the Light-Form.

Chapter 20, again with the atypical title of "The Chapter on the Name of the Fathers," presents a similar arrangement of five mythological figures. In this chapter, Mani is made to quiz his disciples about why the Father is called "Father of Greatness" (1 Ke 63.23–24). After their stereotypical plea of ignorance, Mani reveals that the Father of Greatness is so-called because he dwells in the Great Earth, where he is surrounded by all his angels and divine companions (1 Ke 63.28–33). The discourse then turns to identifying the "greatness" of four other beings that are also called "Father." The Third Messenger's greatness is the "Ship of the Living Fire," i.e., the Sun, while Jesus the Splendour's greatness is the "Ship of the Living Water," i.e., the Moon. The Column of Glory's greatness has something to do with "Five Gods," while the greatness of the Light-Mind is identified as the Holy Church (1 Ke 63.34–64.10). This list of Five Fathers from Chapter 20, however, is different from the list found in Chapter 7:

Chapter 7: 5 Fathers	Chapter 20: 5 Fathers
Father of Greatness	Father of Greatness
Third Messenger	Third Messenger
Jesus the Splendour	Jesus the Splendour
Light-Mind	Column of Glory
Light-Form	Light-Mind

Whereas Chapter 7 enumerates a soteriological sequence in which the Light-Form is given a central role at the community level, the account from Chapter 20 inserts the Column of Glory, making no mention of the Light-Form. The aim of Chapter 20, however, although also soteriological in character, seems to be to establish the location of each of the Five Fathers at one of the five principal stopping points of the Manichaean cosmic journey of salvation: from the ritual activity of the Holy Church (Light Mind) to the "Five Gods" (?) administered by the Column of Glory, to the Moon and Sun where Jesus the Splendour and the Third Messenger dwell, on to the Great Earth, the homeland of the Father of Greatness. Whereas Chapter 7 enumerates the five ontological levels of salvation, Chapter 20 lists those five beings whose efforts facilitate the accomplishment of salvation and the liberation of light.

The situation is further complicated when we look at Chapter 25 "On the Five [Fathers: From which Limbs they have come]," where we are presented with yet another variant formulation, only this time the Father of Greatness himself is not included.

Five Fathers	from Five Limbs
Messenger	< Mind
Beloved of Lights	< Thought
Mother of Life	< Insight
Jesus the Beloved (sic)	< Counsel
Virgin of Light	< Consideration

Unfortunately, almost no context is given by this extremely abbreviated chapter, other than the statement that "one came after the other (and) appeared in his time" (1 Ke 76.25). This seems to imply that the series is meant to be understood temporally, although such an understanding seems to contradict what is known about the sequence of the Manichaean myth from other sources such as Theodore bar Khonai. According to the canonical account, a "temporal" progression of these figures would run Mother of Life—Beloved of Lights—Messenger—Jesus the Beloved—Virgin of Light.[64] Nevertheless, a clue as to how this series might be understood can be found in Chapter 7, in which the Third Messenger is called the "model of the King of Light" (1 Ke 35.8) and the "first of all counsellors" (1 Ke 34.33). This would seem to justify the Third Messenger's placement at the head of the Chapter 25 formulation. The selection and arrangement of the other figures, however, remains obscure.

Another, albeit peculiar, presentation of the Five Fathers can be found in Chapter 148 "On the Five Books, that they belong to Five Fathers." In this chapter, Mani is supposed to have associated "five" of his books with the "Fathers of Light" (1 Ke 355.6–7). While the Living Gospel is attributed to the Messenger and the Treasure of Life to the Column of Glory, the three writings, Pragmateia, Book of Mysteries, and Book of [64] This example is further complicated by the fact that some of its irregular features may indicate that the compiler may have been drawing on some very early material. For example, the brevity of the chapter indicates that it may be an early "proto-kephalaic" formulation. In addition, the fact that the first father is identified simply as the "Messenger" rather than the "Third Messenger" parallels a detail which can be found in Theodore bar Khonai's account. Similarly, the unusual formulation of "Jesus the Beloved" may be derived from some early source.

Giants are attributed to the Light-Twin, forming a kind of trilogy. The Letters, however, are said to be Mani's own gifts. Strangely, no fifth book is named or attributed to a Manichaean divinity. Nor is the seventh of Mani's canonical writings mentioned at all.[65] It appears, however, that an attempt has been made to compress this canonical heptateuch into a pentateuch more in line with the compilers' penchant for five-part structures.[66] The fact that only six books are mentioned as four gifts may be due to scribal error,[67] since the construction of such a six-four formulation runs contrary to the compilers' penchant for pentadic redaction. Nevertheless, the enumeration of the Fathers appears equally puzzling, since it too is at variance with the three previously discussed formulations.

Finally, there seems to have been an additional discussion of the Five Fathers in Chapter 191 "There are Five Properties in the Image of our Apostle symbolizing the Five Light Fathers," which unfortunately is entirely obscured by lacunae. At most, a general outline of the discourse can be reconstructed as enumerating Five "Properties" and Five other qualities:

CHAPTER 191 SCHEMA:

INTRO: Again he spoke to his disciples …

DISCOURSE: There are Five Properties in the Image …

[65] That the Manichaean canon contained seven writings is known from 1Ke 5.21–33, 2Ps. 46f., 139f., and Hom 25.2–5, as well as al-Nadīm and the Chinese Compendium (Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 62; Gardner and Lieu, Manichaean Texts from the Roman Empire, 153–156).

[66] That they succeeded in altering the canon is independently verified by Augustine's Contra Felicem, 1.14 (Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 63; see esp. Tardieu's table on page 64).

[67] See Funk 1Ke 335, who suggests that the Psalms and Prayers could have been named before the Letters. If, however, the title was added only later, then we need not assume that the chapter itself was intentionally structured in five-parts (Funk, personal communication).

4) [Fourth …]
5) Fifth is my light-wisdom.

CONCLUSION: I have given victory … over all Sects …

While there is no way of knowing what identity and role the Five Fathers were given in this chapter, it appears as though the emphasis was placed on the qualities attributable to Mani.

As we have seen, the Kephalaia compilers present five formulations of the Five Fathers, four of which can be read. Each of these formulations, however, presents a different sequence of Fathers:

Chapter 7	Chapter 20	Chapter 25	Chapter 148
Father of Greatness	Father of Greatness	Messenger	Messenger
Third Messenger	Third Messenger	Beloved of Lights	Column of Glory
Jesus the Splendour	Jesus the Splendour	Mother of Life	Light Twin
Light-Mind	Column of Glory	Jesus the Beloved	—?
Light-form	Light Mind	Virgin of Light	Mani

While the (Third) Messenger is the only figure found in all four formulations, there are nonetheless some similarities between Chapters 7 and 20 and Chapters 25 and 148. On the one hand, Chapters 7 and 20 appear the most similar, varying only in positions four and five, while Chapters 25 and 148 place the Messenger in the first position.

What then should we make of these variations?[68] While the compilers were obviously using and building upon some kind of earlier material, it is difficult to imagine that a truly canonical series would be subject to such a degree of malleability, given the rigidity with which other series such are the Five Sons are maintained. Nevertheless, given the fact that we find the same expression "Fathers of Light" used in the Psalm-Book (see 2 Ps. 8.8; 36.15; 73.8; 84.29; 202.12) and the Cologne Mani Codex (33.2), we may assume that it was an epithet that existed as part of a canonical Manichaean tradition and was probably used by Mani himself as a general designation for any number of divine beings.[69] That these Fathers of Light came to be thought of in terms of five-part series is likely an additional by-product of the process of pentadic redaction so evident in the Kephalaia. The fact that there are so many variant formulations, however, would seem to represent the various attempts at clarification and elaboration of this quasi-canonical trope, which appears to have been left quite ambiguous and flexible. Perhaps a concept of Five Fathers was needed to balance the recurring image of the Five Sons. Or, perhaps the Five Fathers are an attempt to re-emphasize the fact that the Father is a being endowed with five qualities or Limbs, and as such would have been compelled to send five emissaries into the drama of salvation. Or, the variant formulations might have resulted from an overabundance of hypostases and personages invoked by Mani in his writings—i.e., there were simply too many gods and hypostases to choose from. At any rate, the Kephalaia chapters dealing with the Five Fathers, although frustratingly contradictory, do provide us with an important glimpse into the ongoing and evolutionary process of clarification and systematization of Manichaean discourse undertaken by the Kephalaia compilers. This concept, in particular, appears to have caused considerable confusion and does not appear, at the stage represented by our manuscript at least, to have been resolved.

[68] Unfortunately, other Manichaean Coptic sources provide little in the way of clarification, even though the Fathers of Light are invoked several times in the Psalm-Book. "Bema Psalm 237," however, does enumerate a somewhat ambiguous series of Five Greatnesses of the Fathers involving 1) Mother of Life/First Man, 2) Beloved of Lights/Great Builder, 3) Third Messenger, 4) Column of Glory/Porters, and 5) Virgin/Judge/Light-Mind (2 Ps. 36.20–37.9).

Although only mentioned in one published Kephalaia chapter, the compilers also present a formulation known as the "Five Greatnesses" (ⲧϯⲉ ⲙⲙⲛⲧⲛⲁϭ).[70] According to Chapter 16 "[On the Five] Greatnesses which have [come] out against the Darkness," the entire series of mythical emanations are presented according to a five-stage schema. The "First Greatness" is presented as the Father of Greatness, who has a "solitary existence" (ⲧⲉϥⲟⲩⲥⲓⲁ ⲟⲩⲁⲉⲧϥ) (1 Ke 49.17) in the realm of light. The "Second Greatness" is made up of the Mother of Life, First Man, and the Five Sons of First Man (1 Ke 49.19–23). The "Third Greatness," in turn, contains the Beloved of Lights, Great Builder, and the Living Spirit, along with the Five Sons of the Living Spirit (1 Ke 49.23–25). The "Fourth Greatness" is described as the Third Messenger, the Column of Glory, and (somewhat ambiguously) "all the powers of light who are revealed from him" (ⲛϭⲁⲙ ⲧⲏⲣⲟⲩ ⲛⲟⲩⲁⲩⲓⲛⲉ ⲉⲧⲁⲩⲟⲩⲱⲛϩ [ⲁⲃⲁⲗ ⲙⲙⲁϥ]) (1 Ke 49.26–28). Finally, the "Fifth Greatness" is constituted by Jesus the Splendour and (with similar ambiguity) "all his powers" ([ⲛ]ⲉϥϭⲁⲙ ⲧⲏⲣⲟⲩ) (1 Ke 49.29–31).

[70] The Five Greatnesses are also mentioned in 2 Ps. 136.50.

This formulation varies considerably from the canonical version of the myth known from Theodore bar Khonai. As we have seen, according to his testimony, Mani conceived of his cosmogony as occurring in three emanations, or evocations, each containing three primary figures:

Theodore bar Khonai		Chapter 16
1st Emanation/ Evocation	Father of Greatness Mother of Life First Man 5 Sons of First Man	1st Greatness	Father of Greatness
2nd Emanation/ Evocation	Beloved of Lights Great Builder Living Spirit 5 Sons of Living Spirit	2nd Greatness	Mother of Life First Man 5 Sons of First Man
3rd Emanation/ Evocation	Third Messenger 12 Virgins Jesus the Splendour	3rd Greatness	Beloved of Lights Great Builder Living Spirit 5 Sons of Living Spirit
		4th Greatness	Third Messenger Column of Glory "powers of Light"
		5th Greatness	Jesus the Splendour "all his powers"

As is well known to Manichaean scholars, the third emanation is the most problematic formulation to disentangle.[71] While Theodore states that the Messenger brought forth Twelve Virgins and Jesus the Splendour (although Jesus is not explicitly "called" in Theodore's account), Chapter 7 ("The Seventh, on the Five Fathers") states that the Third Messenger emanated three powers: 1) the Column of Glory/Perfect Man, 2) Jesus the Splendour, and 3) a single Virgin of Light (1 Ke 35.7–17). As we have seen, however, Chapter 16 presents the third emanation as including the Third Messenger, the Column of Glory, and the ambiguous "powers of light" revealed by him (1 Ke 49.26–28). As a result, we are faced with three alternative formulations of the third emanation:

[71] While it is clear that the Messenger is definitely part of the third triad, the remaining two members are ambiguous, since there are essentially three possible candidate: 1) some sort of virgin figure, 2) Jesus the Splendour, and 3) the Column of Glory, also known as the Perfect Man (2 Ps. 133.24–25; 1 Ke 20.15; 24.23; 35.10; 37.3; 155.11).

Theodore bar Khonai	Kephalaia Ch. 7	Kephalaia Ch. 16.
Messenger	Third Messenger	Third Messenger
12 Virgins	Column of Glory/Perfect Man	Column of Glory
Jesus the Splendour	Jesus the Splendour	"powers of light"
	Virgin of Light

While the compilers of Chapter 7, as we saw above, were motivated by a desire to present the Manichaean soteriological narrative through a telescopic five-part frame in which every "father" emanates three other beings, here the compilers of Chapter 16 perform a similar operation by attempting to transform the canonical three-part cosmogonical schema into a five-part formulation. This meant isolating the Father of Greatness from his implicit association with the first emanation and dividing the third emanation into two parts (Greatness Four and Five). The integrity of the second emanation, however, is maintained. This, of course, is another example of the pentadic redaction imposed by the compilers. In this case, the basic frame of the canonical myth is altered from a three-stage to a five-stage formulation. In addition, conflicting accounts of the third evocation point to an inherent ambiguity within the canonical account that appears to have allowed the compilers to so fundamentally alter the basic frame of their cosmogonic discourse.

CHAPTER THREE

THEOLOGICAL PATTERNING II: DARK-REALM

As we have seen, the Kephalaia compilers present a number of five-part patterns associated with the light-realm in order to emphasize the pentadic attributes of its inhabitants as well as the typically five-stage structure of their activities. At the same time, however, they seem to have been equally interested in sorting out the five-part structures associated with the Kingdom of Darkness. Five chapters in particular offer such presentations of the dark-realm: Chapter 6 "On the Five Storehouses which are brought forth from the Land of Darkness from the Beginning; the Five Rulers, the Five Spirits, the Five Bodies, (and) the Five Tastes," Chapter 15 "[On the] … Five [Parts] … World of …," Chapter 27 "On the Five Forms which exist in the Archon(s) of Darkness," Chapter 57 "On the Generation of Adam," and Chapter 69 "On the Twelve Signs of the Zodiac and the Five Stars." As we shall see, the compilers of these chapters were interested in three primary themes—1) the genesis of the dark-realm, 2) the nature of the dark-lord and his companions, and 3) the relation of the dark powers to the zodiac and the planets—which they chose to re-enforce through the use of both theological and literary five-part patterning.

The Evolution of Evil

Unlike the monotheistic theological traditions of Late Antiquity that attempted to arrive at a philosophical solution to the problem of evil by attributing it either to human free-will or divine providence, Manichaeans offered a radically different response in the form of cosmic dualism and attempted to visualize evil by means of vivid mythological images and metaphor. As such, two of the most important presentations of the Land of Darkness from the Kephalaia can be found in Chapter 6 "On the Five Storehouses which are brought forth from the Land of Darkness from the Beginning; the Five Rulers, the Five Spirits, the Five Bodies, (and) the Five Tastes," and Chapter 15 "[On the] … Five [Parts] … World of …." These chapters, which appear to be attempts at a more or less comprehensive description of the dark-realm, contain a literary phenomenon found primarily in association with such sinister contexts that may be termed clustering. This happens when the compiler lumps together a number of associated five-part patterns into one short passage. For instance, in Chapter 6, Mani is made to begin his discourse by saying:

> Five Store-/houses have existed from the beginning in the Land of Darkness. Five / Elements have poured forth from them. Also, from the Five / Elements were fashioned Five Trees, (and) from the Five Trees / were fashioned Five Species of Creatures according to each World, / male and female. But also, the Five Worlds [have] / Five Kings, Five Spirits, [Five] Bodies, (and) Five [Tastes] / according to each world, which do not resemble [one another] (1 Ke 30.17–24).

The function of this cluster is to concisely summarize the stages by which the dark-realm evolved, while at the same time emphasizing its essentially five-part structure. This proposition is even re-enforced by the literary structuring of the introductory passage, which elaborates five basic statements about the dark-realm, with the fifth statement enumerating five items according to the following pattern.

> Statement 1: Five Storehouses exist in the Land of Darkness.
> Statement 2: Five Elements have poured forth from them.
> Statement 3: Five Trees were fashioned from the Five Elements.
> Statement 4: Five Species came from the Five Trees.
> Statement 5: The (1) Five Worlds of Darkness also have (2) Five Kings, (3) Five Spirits, (4) Five Bodies, and (5) Five Tastes.

A similar cluster occurs in Chapter 15, "[On the] … Five [Parts] … World of …":

> The fifth time it spread itself to its offspring that exist [in the Five] / Worlds that were fashioned (and) begotten from the Five / Fruits of Death, which are the Five Worlds of / Flesh, the Five Creations of Darkness which Death established in / them. He spread himself among the Ten Parts, the Five Male Parts and the / Five Female [Parts] … … … (1 Ke 48.17–22).

This passage fits into a more elaborate discourse about the Five "Parts/Times?"[1] that follows a similar structure to that found in the introduction to Chapter 6:

> Part 1: Death-desire …
> Time 2: Five Elements poured fourth …
> Part 3: [Five Trees formed?]

[1] The discourse alternates between enumerating "part" (ⲧⲁϊⲉ) and "time" (ⲥⲁⲡ) in the same five-part list.

Part 4: Five Fruits from Five Trees are Five Worlds.
Time 5: The (1) Five Worlds fashioned from (2) Five Fruits, (3) which are Five Worlds of Flesh, (4), i.e., the Five Creations, distributed in (5) Five Male/Female Parts.

As such, Chapters 6 and 15 present two similar, although variant, accounts of how the Land of Darkness came into being.

Chapter 6	Chapter 15
5 Storehouses	Desire/Death
5 Elements	5 Elements
5 Trees	[5 Trees?]
5 Species of Trees	5 Fruits
5 Worlds, 5 Kings, 5 Spirits, 5 Bodies, 5 Tastes	5 Worlds, 5 Fruits, 5 Flesh, 5 Creations, 5 Parts

Whereas Chapter 6 begins with the Five Storehouses as its point of origin, Chapter 15 begins with a more singular principle known as the "Death-desire" (ⲉⲛⲑⲩⲙⲏⲥⲓⲥ ⲛⲧⲉ ⲡⲙⲟⲩ) (1 Ke 47.34). From this principle, which is essentially a synonym for "Matter" (ϩⲩⲗⲏ) (1 Ke 129.11; 180.15–16), emerge the remaining structures of the dark-realm. In this way the origin of evil is viewed as a generative process in which the Five Dark Elements, spurred on by the evil principle (variously known as Desire, Death, or Matter), develop according to an "organic" process analogous to natural phenomena such as the growth of trees and the production of fruit.

Both Chapter 6 and Chapter 15 present conceptions of the dark-realm which may be related to different streams of Manichaean canonical tradition. For example, Chapter 15 can be compared to the close association between the terms "Matter," "Desire," and "Darkness" known to Ephraim (4th cent. CE), who records that Mani "constructed (the theory) that sometimes Matter (hylē) (ⲕⲗⲟⲙ) displayed purposive thought" (ⲕϩⲧⲥⲥⲧ) [Reeves #3]), while Titus of Bostra (4th cent. CE) (Contra manichaeos, 1.6), Theodoret (5th cent. CE), and Severus of Antioch (6th cent. CE) (likely drawing upon the same canonical source) state that "Matter" and "Darkness" were co-referential terms (89–90 [Reeves]). Theodoret also records that "Matter later divided itself into multiple worlds (αἰῶσι) and its fruits among them" (Kugener/Cumont, 152). Such presumably canonical accounts, however, can be contrasted with other statements from Theodore bar Khonai (8th cent. CE) and al-Nadīm (10th cent. CE), which both place Darkness and its Five Worlds at the beginning of their cosmogonies (Theodore bar Khonai 313.18–21 [Scher]; Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]). In this way, Chapter 15's account can be seen to resemble fragments of canonical tradition from the 4th and 5th centuries CE, while Chapter 5's account is similar to later 8th and 10th century CE accounts. This implies not only that Titus, Theodoret, and Severus drew upon a different source than Theodore and al-Nadim, but also that Chapters 6 and 15 may have drawn upon similarly distinct material.

At any rate, in spite of these differences, the fact that the evolution of the dark-realm is elaborated by the Kephalaia compilers in both chapters as occurring in five basic stages accords well with parallel structures applied to the activities of the light-realm and fits with their general project of pentadic redaction. The fact that these descriptions contain clusters of five-part series is likely meant to draw special attention to the fact that the Kingdom of Darkness is also infused with patterns parallel to those of the Land of Light.

King(s) of Darkness

Just as beings from the Land of Light are often grouped by the compilers into five-part series, the same holds true for the inhabitants of the Kingdom of Darkness. In fact, figuring out the nature of such tenebrous groupings seems to have been a theological issue of great interest to the Kephalaia compilers. One of the best examples of this preoccupation can again be found in Chapter 6, which states that it was the King of the World of Smoke as the "chief of all evil and [all] wickedness" (1 Ke 30.27–28), who "waged war with the Light" and "did battle with the exalted kingdom" (1 Ke 30.32–33). He is said to possess five sets of characteristics: 1) five zoomorphic forms (1 Ke 30.34–31.1), 2) five evil qualities of darkness, stench, ugliness, bitterness, and fire (1 Ke 31.3–6), 3) a body "harder than all iron, brass, and steel" (1 Ke 31.14), "magic arts" (1 Ke 31.17), and the ability to understand the speech and signs of all his minions (1 Ke 32.1–8), 4) he is insect-like, with a thundering voice, and short-sighted, and 5) his body is gold, his taste is salty, and his spirit rules the powers of the world.

	1) 5 Forms	2) 5 (forms)	3) Other	4) Also …	5) Signs
King of Smoke	head lion-faced	Darkness	hard body	insect like	gold body
	hands & feet demon-faced	Stench	kills w/ magic	thunder voice	salty taste shoulders eagle-faced	Ugliness	dark languages	short-sighted	rules powers belly dragon-faced	Bitterness
	tail fish-faced	Fire

This rather vivid description of the dark-lord, however, reveals a number of editorial seams. For instance, the compiler is not quite sure what to call the chief ruler, whom he variously names as "King of the World of Smoke" (ⲡⲣⲣⲟ ⲙⲡⲕⲟⲥⲙⲟⲥ ⲙⲡⲕⲁⲡⲛⲟⲥ [1 Ke 30.25]), "Archon of Smoke" (ⲡⲁⲣⲭⲱⲛ ⲙⲡⲕⲁ[ⲡⲛⲟⲥ] [1 Ke 31.12]), "King (of those) of Darkness" (ⲡⲣⲣⲟ ⲛⲛⲁⲡⲕⲉⲕⲉ [1 Ke 30.33; 31.2, 27–28; 32.1, 14; 33.2, 5]) or simply "King of Darkness" (ⲡⲣⲣⲟ ⲙⲡⲕⲉⲕⲉ [1 Ke 31.24]). Remarkably, in much the same way as Chapter 21's description of the ruler of the light-realm (see above), there appears to be interwoven into this depiction of the dark lord two passages with which parallels have been identified in the Mandaean Right Ginza:[2]

Passage A: Manichaean

Kephalaia, 30.34–31.1: His head [is lion-faced, his] hands and feet are demon- [and devil-]faced, [his] shoulders are eagle-faced, while his belly [is dragon-faced,] (and) his tail is fished-faced.

Mandaean

Right Ginza, 280: His head is that of a lion, his body is that of a serpent, his wings are those of an eagle, his sides are those of a tortoise, his hands and feet are those of a demon (trans. from Puech).

[2] This is an identification already made by Polotsky in the 1940 edition. See translations of this passage by Lidzbarski, Ginza, 278 and Puech, "Le prince des ténèbres," 113. Puech believed that the Mandaean passage was based on the Manichaean, due to what he called "la gaucherie" of the prior (114). Yet, the Manichaean passage is no less (if not more) "gauche" in the way in which the compiler incorporated this outside material. Rather, the Manichaean passage seems more like a development of the Mandaean. It is, however, possible that both passages drew on some unknown antecedent.

Passage B: Manichaean	Mandaean
Kephalaia, 32.15–20: When it pleases him to walk, he spreads out all his limbs, and he walks. When it comes to his mind, he draws in his limbs and takes them to himself and rolls them into one another and he falls down like a grape or a great iron ball. He is terrible in his voice, he causes fear (and) frightens his powers with his voice.	Right Ginza, 280: When it pleases him, he dilates his body; when it pleases him, he makes himself small. He draws in his members and spreads them again … his appearance is horrible, his body rank, his face distorted (trans. from Puech).

Passage A, in fact, does have a precedent in Manichaean canonical tradition, since al-Nadīm attributes the following description of Satan to Mani: "His head is the head of a lion and his body like the body of a dragon (great serpent). His wing is like the wing of a bird, his tail like the tail of a great fish, and his four feet like the feet of a beast of burden" (Fihrist, 778 [Dodge]). Moreover, an additional witness to this zoomorphic description can be found in Kephalaia Chapter 27 "On the Five Forms which exist in the Archon of Darkness" (1 Ke 77.29–78.1):

> As for the Archon, the leader of all the powers / [of Darkness], there are [Five Forms] in his body, according to / [the form] of the seal [of the Five] Creations which exist in the Five / Worlds of Darkness. His head has the face of a lion and / originated from [the] World of Fire. His wings and his / [shoulders] have the face of an eagle, according to the form of the Sons of Wind. / [His hands] and [his feet] are demons, according to the form / [of the Sons] of the World of Smoke. His belly has the face of / [a dragon, according to the form of] the World of Darkness. His tail [has] / the form of the fish, which belongs to [the World of the] Sons of Water. These / Five Forms are found in him; they [have come] from the Five [Creations] / of the Five Worlds of Darkness (1 Ke 77.26–78.3).

This means that we are faced with four variant descriptions of the dark-lord, each of which is expressed in five-parts.

head of lion	head lion-faced	head lion-faced	head of lion
body of dragon	hands/feet demon-faced	wings eagle-faced	body of serpent
wing of bird	shoulders eagle-faced	hands/feet demons	wings of eagle tail of fish	belly dragon-faced	belly dragon-faced	sides of tortoise
feet of beast	tail fish-faced	tail fish-faced	hands/feet of demon

There is obviously a complicated relationship between these accounts. On the one hand the descriptions from Kephalaia Chapters 6 and 27

are essentially the same, varying only slightly in the order of their terminology,[3] while on the other hand, the descriptions preserved by al-Nadīm and the Right Ginza agree in all but two of their features. Interestingly, however, a variant from the Mandaean description, i.e., the demonic hands and feet, is preserved by both Kephalaia accounts. All that we may assume is that a zoomorphic description of some sort did exist as part of Manichaean canonical tradition, although the exact composition of that description remains elusive.[4] After all, it seems difficult to privilege al-Nadīm's testimony from the 10th century, even if he claims to quote Mani directly, over 4th or 5th century descriptions from the Kephalaia.

What then, are we to make of such variations? Perhaps the compiler felt that the canonical description available to him did not achieve the desired effect, or, perhaps he was so impressed by the other account that he sought to weave it into is own literary creation—with mixed results. At any rate, the compiler seems to have been confronted by two problems: first, how to describe the chief ruler of darkness, and second, how to name him while still preserving the canonical order of dark worlds established by Mani.

Unfortunately for the compiler, Mani's description of the dark-realm, even if it did include some sort of zoomorphic description of the dark-lord, seems to have been ambiguous at best. Theodore bar Khonai, for instance, simply records that "the Evil Nature he calls 'King of Darkness' and he says that he dwelt in the Land of Darkness with his Five Worlds: the World of Smoke, the World of Fire, the World of Wind, the World of Water, and the World of Darkness" (313.18–21 [Scher]), as does al-Nadīm (Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]). A certain amount of ambiguity even seems to have surrounded the nature of the term "World" as applied to the regions of Darkness, since according to Theodore bar Khonai, Mani employed the Syriac term ܥܠܡ (ʿālam) which can mean either "world" or "age."[5] Augustine, reacting to the so-called Fundamental Epistle variously described these entities as saecula (De natura boni, 42) and naturae (Fundamental Epistle, Frag. 6b). In De moribus, however, Augustine seems to have imagined them as caves (antra) (2.19), which may dimly reflect the notion of "storehouses" (ταμιεῖα) known to the Kephalaia and Simplicius (35.65–66 [Adam]). Cumont's suggestion that the Latin term saecula was selected via the Greek αἰῶνες[6] seems to be confirmed from what is beginning to be known about the Coptic translation of Mani's Living Gospel (from the Synaxeis codex) in which the Five shekinahs of the light-realm are called ⲛⲁⲓⲱⲛ.[7] At any rate, few specific details other than their order are given about the structure, activities, or inhabitants of these dark worlds in known canonical accounts. For instance, a fragment from the Fundamental Epistle[8] preserved by Augustine, describes the five regions of the land of darkness (this time in reverse order) impressionistically as > deep and of immeasurable extent; in it reside fiery bodies, baneful breeds. Here, emanating out of the same principle came a boundless and incalculable darkness, together with its own progeny. Beyond the darkness lay filthy whirling waters with their inhabitants; further within were terrifying and violent storms with their ruler and progenitors. Next followed another fiery region, a prey to destruction, with its leaders and peoples. In the same way there lived inside it a breed filled with gloom and smoke, among whom loitered the horrible ruler and leader of all these worlds, who had congregated around himself innumerable princes, and he himself was the spirit and source of all of them (trans. Hendry).[9]

[4] Mani does seem to have described evil entities in zoomorphic terms in his Shabuhragan, where he makes reference to "two lion-shaped archdemons" (Klimkeit, Gnosis on the Silk Road, 223).

[5] Cumont, Recherches I, 11 n. 3.

In addition, Severus of Antioch recorded a statement about how "all the members of the Tree of Darkness … rose up and ascended with numerous powers impossible to calculate."[10] Such descriptions drawn apparently from canonical writings do not achieve the clarity and specificity sought by the Kephalaia compilers. This ambiguity is (pardon the pun) in stark contrast to the light-realm, where the Father of Greatness, as we have seen, dwells with his Five Limbs, and from which emanates a well-known cast of characters including the First Man and his Five Sons, the Living Spirit and his Five Sons, as well as the Third Ambassador, the Virgin of Light, and Jesus the Splendour. It would seem then that the compiler of Chapter 6 for some reason felt compelled to clarify just what Mani meant by his seemingly abbreviated, or simply ambiguous, description of the dark-realm and to create a greater degree of parallelism with the World of Light. His efforts, however, left a number of obvious traces.

In order to frame and re-enforce this clarification, the compiler of Chapter 6 gave five-part structures a central compositional role. In the first place, the chapter title (which may in fact have been added at some later stage of the textual history) somewhat awkwardly enumerates five sets of five to be discussed in the chapter, namely, 1) the Five Storehouses, 2) the Five Rulers, 3) the Five Spirits, 4) the Five Bodies, and 5) the Five Tastes, while (as we have seen) the introductory frame re-emphasizes the thematic centrality of five by means of a cluster of five statements (see above). Then, the central discourse begins, which is itself divided into five parts dealing with the five Kings of Darkness, with (as we have also seen) the section about the King of the World of Smoke itself divided into five parts:

1) King of the World of Smoke, chief of evil (1 Ke 30.25–33)
   1) 5 Forms are in him (1 Ke 30.33–31.2)
      i) head lion-faced
      ii) hands-/ feet demon-/ devil-faced
      iii) shoulders eagle-faced
      iv) belly dragon-faced
      v) tail fish-faced
   2) Also, 5 (additional) forms in him (1 Ke 31.3–7)
      i) darkness
      ii) stench
      iii) ugliness
      iv) bitterness
      v) fire
   3) 3 other things (1 Ke 31.8–32.13)
      i) body is harder than any metal
      ii) kills with his magic arts
         (Interpolated admonition [?]: Keep away from magic!
            [1 Ke 31.24–33])
      iii) knows languages of 5 worlds
   4) Also, (1 Ke 32.14–32.30)
      i) he can spread out his limbs or draw them in like an insect.
      ii) his voice is terrible like thunder
      iii) he can't see what is far away
   5) These are his evil signs and symbols (1 Ke 32.30–33.8)
      i) his body is gold
      ii) his taste is salty
      iii) he rules over the powers and authorities of the world.

2) The King of the Worlds of Fire (1 Ke 33.9–17)
   i) lion-faced
   ii) brass body
   iii) sour taste
   iv) his spirit rules the kings of the world and the fire-worshiping sect

3) The King of the Worlds of Wind (1 Ke 33.18–24)
   i) eagle-faced
   ii) iron body
   iii) hot taste
   iv) his spirit rules idol-worshipers

4) The King of the World of Water (1 Ke 33.25–32)
   i) fish-faced
   ii) silver body
   iii) sweet taste
   iv) his spirit rules the baptists

5) The King of the World of Darkness (1 Ke 33.33–34.1)
   i) dragon-faced
   ii) tin body
   iii) bitter taste
   iv) his spirit rules oracles and soothsayers

The descriptions of the Five Kings in Chapter 6 may be summarized by the following table, which reveals that structurally the chapter as a whole enumerates five sets of five: 1) five rulers, 2) five faces, 3) five bodies, 4) five tastes, and 5) spirits or sphere of influence:

5 rulers	5 faces	5 bodies	5 tastes	5 spirits (rule)
(King of Smoke)	(all-faced)	(gold body)	(salty taste)	(powers that be)
King of Fire	lion-faced	brass body	sour taste	fire-worshipers
King of Wind	eagle-faced	iron body	hot taste	idol-worshipers
King of Water	fish-faced	silver body	sweet taste	baptists
King of Darkness	dragon-faced	tin body	bitter taste	oracles etc.

While the concept of Five Worlds of Darkness is relatively well attested in canonical sources (Theodore bar Khonai 313.19 [Scher]; implied by Fundamental Epistle, Frag. 6b; al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]),[11] in the Kephalaia they are known not only as "Five Worlds of Darkness" (1 Ke 31.2; 32.2; 48.17; 48.15; 58.9; 74.29; 77.28; 78.3; 167.23; 169.10;

169.13), but also as "Five Worlds of Flesh" (1 Ke 26.33; 48.19; 121.20; 123.3; 177.18; 266.14) and "Five Storehouses" (1 Ke 28.8; 30.13; 30.17; 155.19). The explicit idea of Five Kings or Archons is known almost exclusively from Chapter 6,[12] where they are also called the "Five Spirits" (1 Ke 30.15; 30.23; 34.9). This, in itself, may not be that surprising given the confusion that seems to have been created for the compiler of Chapter 6,[13] who (as we saw above) found it difficult to reconcile the title "King of Darkness" with the fact that "smoke" is the first of the canonical Five Dark Elements. Nevertheless, the need to dissect the chief ruler of darkness into five sub-rulers is essentially a reflection of the compiler's desire to identify and attribute a particular governing spirit or authority to what he perceived as five spheres of negative influence in the world. In the end, this association serves as the take-home message of this particular chapter.

The danger of these Five Spirits is emphasized at the end of Chapter 6, where we find a grave admonition placed in the mouth of Mani: "Therefore I tell you, my brothers and my members, perfect faithful and holy elect: Keep your hearts with you and keep yourselves from the Five Slaveries of the Five Dark Spirits. Abandon the worship of their Five Bodies. Do not interact with them, so that you might escape their bond and their punishment forever" (1 Ke 34.6–12). This passage needs to be placed in its social context if it is to become comprehensible. As such, the King of the World of Smoke, the chief, is said to rule over the "powers and authorities of the earth and the whole world … those who rule over all of creation, as they humble people in their tyranny according to their will" (1 Ke 33.6–8), a reference that could conceivably be applied to authorities in both the Persian and Rome Empires. The King of the World of Fire is said to rule the "kings of the world" as well as the "Sects who worship fire" (1 Ke 33.15–17), no doubt a more explicit reference to the Sassanian Kings and their Zoroastrian clergy. The King of the World of Wind, in turn, rules in "every temple, eidoleion, place of worship, statues and images, shrines of worldly Error" (1 Ke 33.22–24), presumably those who follow the traditional cults. The King of the World of Water is said to rule "those who baptize with water" (1 Ke 33.31), a reference to Christians, Elchasaites, or perhaps even Mandaeans, while the King of the World of Darkness can be found in the utterances of soothsayers, oracles, and seers (1 Ke 34.3–4), seemingly the more popular religious practices of the time. The compiler's effort to associate a dark ruler with each of these spheres of influences was probably driven by a desire either to draw, or more likely, to keep members of the Manichaean church away from them and in the fold. After the withdrawal of Persian imperial support, which resulted in Mani's execution in 276/277 CE, his community experienced a period of harsh repression, persecution, and no doubt apostasy. As a result there would have been a strong desire, on the part of Manichaean teachers, missionaries, and catechists, to clearly define the dangers associated with these oppressive and competing spheres of political and religious influence, and to do so in a way that contributed to and strengthened the coherence and symmetry of the Manichaean system. Therefore, as Manichaean missionaries and catechists moved from Mesopotamia into Egypt and the Kephalaia (as we know it) began to take shape, numerical patterns, especially in terms of five-part structures, played a key role in how this coherence and symmetry was achieved and communicated.

[13] This may even represent an innovation on the part of the Chapter 6 compiler.

Astrological Polemic

The third major theme addressed by the Kephalaia compilers in their descriptions of the dark-realm is the relation of the dark-powers, specifically the Five Worlds of Darkness, to the twelve signs of the Zodiac and the seven planetary powers. While there are references to the "Twelve Spirits of Error" in Chapter 15 "[On the] … Five [Parts] … World of …" (1 Ke 48.34) and anthropomorphic accounts of their cosmic distribution in Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos" (1 Ke 173.21–175.4), the most explicit description of the relationship between the dark powers and the Zodiac can be found in Chapter 69 "On the Twelve Signs of the Zodiac and the Five Stars." In this chapter the disciples question Mani about what powers rule over the Zodiac and the so-called "Five Stars." In response, Mani is made to begin his discourse with an (unsuccessful) attempt at distributing the twelve signs in pairs to the Five Worlds of Darkness, which inevitably leads to the attribution of three signs to two of the worlds.

> This, however, is how it should be understood: They / are drawn from the Five Worlds of Darkness, are bound in the / Sphere, and two zodiacal signs are taken per world. The Twin[14] / and the Archer[15] belong to the World of Smoke, which / is the Mind. Also, the Ram[16] and the Lion[17] belong to the / World of Fire. The Bull,[18] the Water-bearer,[19] and the Scales,[20] / belong to the World of Wind. The Crab[21] and the Virgin[22] / and the Fish[23] belong to the World of Water. The Goat-horn[24] / and the Scorpion[25] belong to the World of Darkness. These are / [the] twelve Archons of wickedness, those who wickedness does not / … … For they commit every evil and / … [in the] world, either in the tree or in the flesh (1 Ke 167.22–167.33).

Following this, each of the "Five Stars" (i.e., planets) is associated with a particular dark world: 1) Zeus/Jupiter to Smoke, 2) Aphrodite/Venus to Fire, 3) Ares/Mars to Wind, 4) Hermes/Mercury to Water, and 5) Kronos/Saturn to Darkness (1 Ke 167.34–168.6). Then, in the third section of the discourse, the signs are divided according to the quadrants of the sky (1 Ke 168.16–23).

What follows is a sort of astronomical revisionism, whereby the Sun and Moon, normally counted among the seven planets by ancient astronomy but cherished by Manichaeans as Light-ships, are substituted by "Two Ascendants." According to Chapter 69, Mani is made to state that "these seven, which we have named—the Five Stars and the Two Ascendants (ⲁⲛⲁⲃⲓⲃⲁⲍⲱⲛ)—they are the evil-doers who perpetuate every wickedness and evil in every single land" (1 Ke 168.11–13).

According to Roger Beck, the anabibazon is an astronomical concept that represents, along with the katabibazon, the two points (or "nodes") at which the orbits of the Sun and Moon intersect on a monthly basis.[26] According to Beck, this seemingly straightforward astronomical concept may have been interpreted in a sinister light by Manichaeans due to the fact that it is at one of these two points that eclipses of the Sun and Moon may occur.[27] In addition, the fact that these nodes appear to "move" led to their being considered as quasi-planets and to their eventual incorporation into late antique astrology as the "head and tail" of a great dragon responsible for eclipses.[28] Moreover, in Zoroastrian tradition, the nodes came to represent a "Dark Sun" and "Dark Moon" that acted as agents of Ahriman.[29] Yet according to Beck, this reference to the anabibazontes in the Kephalaia likely represents the "earliest unambiguous attested instance of the demonization of the lunar nodes."[30] This became necessary due to the fact that Manichaean theology demanded the removal of the Sun and Moon from the standard series of seven planets,[31] thereby requiring substitutes in the form of the anabibazontes. The substitution, however, remains somewhat awkward, given the fact that, while the compiler of Chapter 69 is determined to associate five of the planets with the Five Worlds of Darkness, ancient astronomy recognized seven. Without this substitution of the Sun and Moon by the nodes Manichaeans would have appeared to violate ancient astronomical koinē, thereby discrediting any claims to astronomical orthodoxy, especially in Mesopotamia where rival religious groups such as Zoroastrians and Mandaeans appears to have been steeped in astrological speculations.[32] Yet even in spite of Manichaean efforts to talk about astronomical concepts, observers such as Alexander of Lycopolis and, later, Augustine remained unconvinced.[33] That Seventh century CE Syriac author Severus Sebokht explained that this dragon is known as the athalia (ܐܬܠܝܐ) (Nau, "La cosmographie," 253–254), a term attested in both the Manichaean Psalm-Book (2 Ps. 196.8: ⲁⲑⲁⲗⲓⲁ) and Syriac Manichaean fragments (Burkitt, Religion of the Manichees, 114: ܐܬܠܝܐ). According to his description of Indian astronomy, al-Biruni states that "the dragon's head" is counted among the unlucky stars by the Hindus (India, 212 [Sachau]).

[31] Mani attributed his recognition of the true nature of the Sun and Moon to Jesus in a fragment preserved by al-Biruni (India, 284 [Sachau]).

[32] Mandaeans, for instance, spoke about the "seven and the twelve" as malevolent powers (Widengren, Mani, 69).

[33] Alexander joked that Manichaeans should have "occasionally visited the astronomers" (Contra Manichaei opiniones disputatio, 22), while Augustine could not reconcile his private study of astronomy with Manichaean teachings (cited by Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 178). See also Ferrari, "Astronomy and Augustine," 263–276, who suggests that eclipses witnessed by Augustine played a role in his break with Manichaeism.

Manichaeans were "amateurs" in astrology[34] does in fact appear to be the case when we do a close reading of Kephalaia Chapter 69, which contains significant compositional or editorial flaws.[35] Similarly, the following chapter, Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos," contains two conflicting melothesiac[36] descriptions of the Zodiac:

Signs of the Zodiac	Description A: 1 Ke 174.3–10	Description B: 1 Ke 174.21–175.2
Ram / Aries	Head	Right Temple
Bull / Taurus	Neck & Shoulders	Right Shoulder
Twin / Gemini	2 Forearms	Right Forearm
Crab / Cancer	Oesophagus	Right Rib
Lion / Leo	Stomach	Right Stomach
Virgin / Virgo	Heart	Right Intestines
Scales / Libra	Spine & Intestines	Left Belly
Archer / Sagittarius	Loins	Left Breast & Kidney
Goat-horn / Capricorn	Feet	Left Elbow
Water-bearer / Aquarius	Shinbones	Left Shoulder
Fish / Pisces	Soles of feet	Left Temple

This chapter, which as Gardner has suggested was likely drawn from "a number of separate sources,"[37] although re-enforcing the compiler's anthropomorphic view of the cosmos, does little to establish his credentials as a serious astrologer.

What then are we to make of this lively, although somewhat incoherent, interest in astrological speculation? Stegemann suggested that the association of the signs of the Zodiac with the Five Worlds was some kind of game with the aspects intended to show the adversarial relationship of the signs to one another.[38] This explanation, however, seems too obscure and technical to have generated any real meaning, even to an educated Manichaean Elect. Instead, I would suggest that the aim of Chapter 69 might not have been astrological at all, but rather polemi-

[35] Such as the attribution of three signs to two of the five worlds.

[36] A similar concept relating the parts of the body to the Zodiac is described by al-Biruni in his chapter on Indian astronomy (India, 218 [Sachau]). Nagel compared these arrangements to melothesiac lists from the Apocryphon of John, although these are not put in relation to the Zodiac ("Anatomie des Menschen," 91). According to Nagel, such formulations are a reflection of the tendency (or "mania" for that matter) of Manichaean discourse for typology, analogy, harmony, and symmetry ("Anatomie des Menschen," 91).

cal. As we have seen, the compilers went to great lengths in Chapter 6 to associate each of the Five Dark Worlds with particular spheres of political or religious influence. Thus, it is possible that a similar manoeuvre is at least being attempted in Chapter 69. For example, while in Chapter 6 the World of Smoke was associated with Roman and Sasanian imperial authorities, Chapter 69's attribution of the Twin (Gemini) and the Archer (Sagittarius) may involve a similar symbolic association. Similarly, the association of the Crab (Cancer), the Virgin (Virgo) and the Fish (Pisces) with the World of Water, could reflect Chapter 6's association of this world with rival Christian and "Baptist" groups. This interpretation (already implied by Khosroyev),[39] although highly speculative, seems at least plausible, given the penchant of the compilers for associating mythological formations with concrete social realities. After all, allegorical interpretations of the signs are known in Jewish,[40] Judaeo-Christian,[41] Gnostic,[42] mainstream Christian,[43] and even Mithraic[44] circles, and the planets themselves were sometimes associated by Hellenistic astrologers with particular religious groups.[45]

At any rate, regardless of whatever polemical or scientific intentions may have been behind such formulations, it is at least clear that the Kephalaia compilers, like so many other aspects of reality, viewed the astrological powers as basically pentadic in structure. This is emphasized also by a passage from Chapter 57 "On the Generation of Adam," where (also in the form of a cluster) Mani is made to describe how

> They increased and again diminished / because there are Five Types of Authority and / Guide set in the sphere of the Zodiac and the / heavens which are above it. In this chapter a certain Babylonian catechumen has questioned Mani about why the lifespan of Adam and his generation seemed so much longer than the people of their time. Mani is made to respond by saying that Five Authorities rule the various life-spans of beings in the world, from year to month to day to hour to minute. The fact that people's lives are becoming increasingly short means that the end is near and that their light substance is dwindling. Whereas Adam and Eve were full of light substance, their lives were longer, they were larger, and produced more offspring, contemporary people are small, ugly and evil, meaning that they are nearly void of light. While this discourse is meant to address the apparent discrepancy between the life-spans of biblical figures and later generations, the explanation is framed by a pentadic conception of both the astrological powers and their influence on history, which is itself conceived of has having five phases. This, of course, represents yet another example of the pervasive emphasis on five-part structures presented by the compilers.

This desire to present a set of astrological speculations based on pentads, although no doubt influenced by the same pentadization process observed above, was also driven in this case by a systemic contradiction generated by Manichaean veneration of the Sun and Moon and their generally negative evaluation of five of the canonical seven planets. In this way, the pentadization of the planets can be seen less as a stylistic or ideological preference and more as a response to a genuine doctrinal problem.

But why go to such great lengths to emphasize the pentadic structure of the powers of Darkness if this is already a quality possessed by the powers of Light? On the doctrinal level, the system appears to demand it, particularly when, as in the image of the Two Trees, the natures are depicted as essentially symmetrical in orientation, with parallel sets of Five Limbs attached to two coeternal sources of being. Besides, as we have seen, Mani himself appears to have described the Land of Darkness as made up of Five Elemental Worlds, although, unlike the Realm of Light, he seems to have left fewer clues as to what impact such a structure had on other aspects of evil. Thus, the Kephalaia compilers were forced to build upon and expand existing material. One particularly difficult issue for the compilers seems to have been the way in which Mani ordered the Dark Elements, with Smoke first and Darkness last. This, as we saw in Chapter 6, caused a great deal of confusion for the compiler, who found it difficult to reconcile a being called "King of Darkness" with the fact that the World of Darkness came fifth in the canonical series. Similarly, the relation of the Sun and Moon to the planets also caused a theological quandary. Such traces of conflicting and contradictory ideas indicated that even at the stage when the surviving text was being edited, the Kephalaia compilers were still engaged in sorting out some of the difficulties contained within the canonical tradition.

CHAPTER FOUR

OTHER TYPES OF PATTERNING

Aside from five-part patterns dealing with specific structural and operational aspects of either the light or dark realms, a variety of other pentadic formulations can also be found in the Kephalaia dealing with a range of 1) soteriological, 2) ethical 3) ecclesiological, 4) polemical, and 5) aetiological themes.

Soteriological Patterning

The Kephalaia compilers' efforts to present general soteriological themes in five-parts is evident in Chapter 13 "On the Five Saviours, Resurrectors of the Dead, along with the Five Resurrections," Chapter 16b (On the Five Advents), Chapter 18 "[On the Five] Wars [which the] Sons of Light waged with [the Sons] of Darkness," Chapter 19 "On the Five Releases; what they mean," Chapter 103 "On the Five Wonderworks that the Light-Mind reveals to the Elect," Chapter 112b (On the Five Things Revealed by Jesus), and Chapter 176 "On the Spiritual Transition in Five(?) Forms and that through which the Church changes."

Chapter 13 presents a series of "Five Resurrecting Saviours" (ϯογ ⲛⲥ̅ⲏ̅ⲣ ⲛⲣⲉϥⲧⲟⲩⲛⲟⲩⲥ) (1 Ke 45.17), although the fragmentation of the text allows for the identification of only the third and fourth. In this series, the Father is placed in third position, which appears strange given the importance usually accorded to him as the foundation of all subsequent being, while Light-Mind is placed in fourth position.

In Chapter 18, the confrontation with the dark-realm is presented as a series of "[Five] Wars" ([ϯογ] ⲙⲡⲟⲗⲉⲙⲟⲥ)[1] waged by the "Sons of Light" (ⲛⲱⲏⲣⲉ ⲙⲡⲟⲩⲁⲓⲛⲉ) (1 Ke 58.2–3). Here an additional series of "five sons" is created, although this time using primary actors not normally designated as "sons" such as First Man, the Living Spirit, Third Messenger, Jesus the Splendour, and Call & Response. Again, as in Chapter 16, the three-part canonical version of the myth is transformed into a series of five conflicts. Interestingly, the same five figures appear in Chapter 16b[2] as a series of five "advents" (ⲛⲟⲓⲛⲉⲓ), with the "advent" of each agent assigned to a particular metaphor. The advent of First Man, for instance, is compared to a noble son deceived by his enemies (1 Ke 50.19–20), while the advent of the Living Spirit is compared to a judge sent by a king to quell an insurrection (1 Ke 50.28 ff.). The advent of the Third Messenger, in turn, is likened to a king who comes to inspect the work of his artisans (1 Ke 52.22 ff.), while the advent of Jesus the Splendour evokes the image of a man sent to root out and burn evil trees (1 Ke 53.19–27). Finally, the advent of Call & Response is compared to the homely image of butter being melted into warm milk (1 Ke 54.26 ff.). Chapter 19 again presents the same series, only this time it is identified as the "Five Releases" (ⲧⲧⲉ ⲛⲟⲓⲛⲣⲃⲁⲗ) or "Liberations" (ⲛⲟⲓⲛⲧⲟⲩⲱ). The fragmentary state of the chapter has obscured many of the details, but in general we find here an additional formulation of Manichaean soteriology in five parts.

Also on the soteriological level, there are a small number of five-part structures relating specifically to the influence of the Light-Mind on the individual. For instance, in Chapter 103 "On the Five Wonderworks that the Light-Mind reveals to the Elect" Mani is made to describe "Five Light Signs" (ⲧⲟⲩ ⲙⲙⲉⲓⲛⲉ ⲛⲟⲩⲁⲓⲛⲉ) (1 Ke 257.13) that the Light-Mind works among the Elect, namely, 1) Wisdom, 2) Faith, 3) …, 4) Love, and 5) Severity of Judgment (1 Ke 257.13–24). It is by means of these Five Signs that the Light-Mind "purifies, refines, raises, and saves" (1 Ke 257. 29–30) the New Man. Although this series of qualities differs from that of the canonical Five Virtues discussed above, which includes 1) Love, 2) Faith, 3) Perfection, 4) Patience, and 5) Wisdom, there is an ecclesiological context to Chapter 103 that seems to justify the arrangement. Whereas Wisdom is the product of the Elect's preaching activity, Faith is the desired result among his hearers. The unknown third quality appears to promote peace in the community, while Love is engendered among the brothers and sisters. Finally, Severity of Judgement enables the Elect to purify the community of error. In this way, the "Five Light

[2] As we can see, Chapter 16 somewhat awkwardly juxtaposes two different series, one labelled as the Five Greatnesses and the other (presumably) the Five Advents. This may indicate that two separate kephalaia have been combined together to form a single chapter. After all, the benediction at the close of Chapter 16 mentions only the Five Advents, a series that is described in elaborate detail, while the Five Greatnesses are given only an abbreviated, formulaic description (see Gardner, Kephalaia of the Teacher, 54).

Signs" revealed by the Light-Mind, although soteriological in nature, are ecclesiological in orientation and can thus be seen to cross over into this category.

An additional soteriological pattern can be found in Chapter 112b (On the Five Things Revealed by Jesus).[3] According to this chapter, Jesus is said to have revealed "Five Great Things" (1 Ke 268.4) to humanity: 1) its affiliation with the race of Light, 2) the condition of the Aeon of Greatness, 3) the heroic activities of the Light, 4) the purpose of his mission, and 5) the imprisonment of the rebels (1 Ke 268.5–18). This list essentially constitutes the "gnosis" originally delivered by Jesus to Adam and Eve (1 Ke 268.2) and, later, by all the "apostles" to humanity. The motif that Jesus revealed to Adam his true nature is recorded by both Theodore bar Khonai (317.15–28 [Scher]) and al-Nadim (Fihrist, 784 [Dodge]) as attributed to Mani, although neither source records such a specific, five-part elaboration of this message. Thus, once again, the compiler seems to have shaped canonical material into a pentadic frame.

A final soteriological pattern can be found in Chapter 176 "On the Spiritual Transition in Five(?) Forms and that through which the Church changes." In this rather fragmentary chapter, several series of five "transitions" (ⲙⲙⲉⲧⲁⲃⲁⲥⲓⲥ) are described. The first series appears to describe the movement of the individual towards righteousness and entry into the Holy Church (1 Ke 453.4–455.6), while the second series describes the fate of the soul after death, as it passes through the various stations and light-vehicles to its eventual reunification with the Father (1 Ke 455.7–456.17). This second series then appears to be re-expressed, although this time with slight variations in detail and an association with the "Five Dwellings" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲙⲙⲟⲛⲏ) (1 Ke 458 ff.). While the exact details of these transition series are impossible to reconstruct, it is at least clear that the movements of the soul were seen as taking place in five-stages.

These chapters demonstrate the degree to which the Kephalaia compilers viewed their drama of salvation as a five-act play, rather than the three acts established by the founder of their religion.

[3] Here I am suggesting that 1 Ke 267.18–268.18 might have constituted a separate chapter that has been embedded within Chapter 112 "The Human Being is less than all the Things of the Cosmos, and He is more shipwrecked than them All" (1 Ke 266.3–268.27). This section even has its own Q & A frame (1 Ke 267.18–28) typical of individual chapters.

Ethical Patterning

Pentadic structures appear to play a role in Manichaean ethics as well, particularly in Chapter 91 "Also on the Catechumen, who is saved in a Single Body," Chapter 146: "The Old Man has Five Foods to live on; the New Man has Five Others," Chapter 165 "Envy exists in Five Forms" and Chapter 189 "[On the Five Temptations]."

Chapter 91 contains two discourses on Catechumenate ethics. For the first discourse, Mani is questioned by an Elect about how a Catechumen can avoid the process of reincarnation. In response, Mani is made to describe three sets of five characteristics that the Catechumen must posses. First, the Catechumen must regard 1) his wife as a stranger, 2) his house as an inn, 3) his family as fellow travellers, 4) his possessions as borrowed, and 5) his thoughts must always be on God (1 Ke 228.24–229.6). Second, the Catechumen must practice continence (enkrateia) by 1) not eating meat, 2) fasting and prayer, 3) almsgiving, 4) lack of malice, and 5) devotion to the church (1 Ke 229.20–29). Third, the good Catechumens can be known by the fact that they are 1) like the "good pearl" mentioned in Mani's Treasure of Life, 2) not bound by the enemy, 3) purified according to their deeds, 4) healed and purified, and 5) constantly at prayer (1 Ke 230.6–29). For the second part of the discourse, Mani is asked about what happens to the prior sins of those Catechumens who were idolaters, blasphemers, murderers, and magicians before entering the church (1 Ke 231.12–24). In response, Mani is made to argue that as long as such a Catechumen 1) accepts the faith, 2) separates Light from Darkness, 3) perceives the mystery of the Living Soul, 4) receives the right-hand of peace, and 5) prays to the Light-Mind for forgiveness (1 Ke 232.1–8) all prior sins will be forgiven. In addition, the Catechumen's position may be improved by 1) abstinence, 2) vigils, 3) fasting, 4) care for the Living Soul, and 5) prayer (1 Ke 233.5–14). What follows is an account of how the Catechumen's sin is divided into five-parts. While four of these parts may be forgiven by the church, the fifth requires further purification (1 Ke 233.21–234.20).

Essentially what Chapter 91 presents is four sets of five-part ethical patterns, two from the first discourse (Discourse A) and two from the second (Discourse B):

Discourse A (1)	Discourse A (2)	Discourse B (1)	Discourse B (2)
abstinence	vegetarian diet	faith	abstinence
hospitality	fasting and prayer	separation of natures	vigils
detachment from family	almsgiving	mystery of Living Soul	fasting
detachment from things	lack of malice	right-hand of peace	care for Living Soul
piety	devotion to church	prayer to Light-Mind	prayer

It is interesting, however, to compare what relation these five-part ethical patterns might have with the "Ten Commandments," which according to al-Nadīm, Mani established for the Hearers (i.e., Catechumens) (Fihrist, 789 [Dodge]), and which are known in various branches of Manichaeism,[4] against 1) idol-worship, 2) lying, 3) greed, 4) killing, 5) fornication, 6) theft, 7) pretences/false teaching, 8) sorcery, 9) doubt, and 10) sloth.[5] In fact, there is little in either of Chapter 91's lists to suggest any conformity with the canonical list from al-Nadīm, although four of the canonical commandments appear to be alluded to when Mani is asked about the prior sins of idolaters, blasphemers, murderers, and magicians just before the second discourse.

It appears as though the compiler of Chapter 91, although apparently interested in the Ten Commandments of the Catechumenate, has decided to divide two variant sets of them into two sets of five, to which he has appended in each case a five-part discussion of purity. It is difficult to imagine why this was done, except perhaps in response to a greater need for ethical flexibility depending on the type of person entering the Catechumenate. Could it be that a generally upstanding person entering the church was subject to a slightly different set of criteria than someone with a criminal past? We cannot be sure. What is clear is that the compiler of Chapter 91 has rejected a ten-part ethical framework in favour of one with five parts.

Chapter 146 presents the radical difference between what influences and sustains the individual prior to and post conversion. Whereas prior to conversion the individual is sustained by 1) physical beauty, 2) evil discourses and myths, 3) beautiful works (of some kind), 4) worldly foods, and 5) sexual desire (1 Ke 349.24–350.3), after conversion this sustenance is exchanged for 1) the spirit of the church leaders, 2) liturgical prayer, 3) joy, 4) itinerate preaching, and 5) scripture (1 Ke 349.5–18). As is so often the case in Kephalaia theology, good and evil, although radically different in their nature, are conceived of as structurally analogous. Just as the Good and Evil Trees both have Five Limbs, so too are the Old Man and New Man driven by five sources of nourishment. Again, this reinforces the fundamentally parallelism of the two opposed natures.

Unfortunately, while the lacunous state of Chapter 165 completely obscures the five forms of envy, two of the five temptations can be read from Chapter 189, namely the fourth, desire for women (1 Ke 485.23), and the fifth, apostasy during persecution (1 Ke 485.30–486.7). Somewhat clearer is the distinction made by Chapter 193 between the "Five Properties" of the Evil One and the Good One. To the "Evil One" are attributed 1) …, 2) slander, 3) murder, 4) greed, and 5) mixing of light and dark (1 Ke 490.27–29), while to the "Good One" are attributed 1) fasting, 2) grief, 3) almsgiving, 4) faith, and 5) separation of light and dark (1 Ke 491.5–6). Here, again, the qualitative rather than the structural difference between the two natures is emphasized.

It is interesting to note that in none of these ethical chapters is reference made to the canonical "Five Virtues" of 1) love, 2) faith, 3) perfection, 4) patience, and 5) wisdom known from Mani's Epistles (50.9–14) and al-Nadīm (Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]). This indicates yet another deviation from canonical traditions by the compilers.

Ecclesiological Patterning

While we could see that some of the soteriological patterns discussed above had certain ecclesiological overtones, one Kephalaia chapter in particular, Chapter 137 "On the Five Types of Brotherhood that are distinguished from one another," contains an important discussion of ecclesiological issues. In this chapter, a distinction is made between five types of individuals who form part of or are associated with the Holy Church, namely 1) brothers, 2) children, 3) disciples, 4) "day-labourers," and 5) slaves (1 Ke 338.25–27). "Brothers" are the "people of righteousness" (ⲛⲣⲱⲙⲉ ⲛⲧⲁ[ⲓⲕⲁⲓⲟⲥⲩⲛⲏ]) (1 Ke 338.29) guided by the Light-Mind, while the "children" are "considerate people" (ⲛⲣⲙⲙⲁⲕⲙⲉⲕ) (1 Ke 339.9) who always follow the ways of truth. "Disciples" are described as "splendid sheep" (ⲛⲉⲥⲁⲩ ⲙⲡⲣⲏⲉ) (1 Ke 339.17), who follow their teacher in patience, while "day-labourers" (ⲛϫⲁⲏⲃⲉⲕⲉ) are those whose commitment to the Church is not total (1 Ke 339.21–29). Finally, "slaves" (ⲛⲟⲗⲟⲩⲟⲛⲉ) are vain and disobedient people who flee at the first signs of persecution (1 Ke 340.1–12). Interestingly, while the discourse classifies Church members according to these five groups, the reader is encouraged to reject the last two as "foreign races" (ⲙⲡⲓⲅⲉⲛⲟⲥ ⲥⲛⲉⲩ ⲛⲱⲙⲙⲟ) (340.14).[6] While this five-fold division of the Church appears to have nothing to do with the formal, five-part hierarchy of 1) Teachers, 2) Bishops, 3) Presbyters/Elders, 4) Elect, and 5) Hearers known from a variety of Manichaean sources,[7] it is important to remember that what is being described by Chapter 137 are not formal, ecclesiastical classes but rather types of relationships. Whereas acceptable members of the Church behave like "brothers," "children," or "disciples," unacceptable members act with the indifference of "day-labourers" or, worst of all, the disloyalty of "slaves."[8]

An additional, albeit enigmatic, reference to five-part ecclesiological structures can be found in Chapter 3 "On the Interpretation of Happiness, Wisdom, and Power; what they mean." This chapter, after enumerating the five levels of existence at which these three concepts can be found, closes with a cluster of references to "Five Happinesses, Five Wisdoms, and Five Powers" (1 Ke 25.3–4) which are then (following a lacuna) set into some kind of relation to "Five Churches" (1 Ke 25.4). What this reference to Five Churches means, however, remains entirely mysterious.

Polemical Patterning

While we have seen that Chapter 6 and Chapter 69 used five-part patterns for polemical ends, a similar technique is used in two additional polemical[9] discussions of rival religious groups. The first instance can

[6] This represents a kind of stylistic division sometimes employed in the Kephalaia whereby a five-part series is divided into three good and two bad components. A similar effect is achieved by Chapter 39 "On the Three Days and the Two Deaths," in which the doctrine of "Three Times" is contrasted with two moments of defeat for the Darkness.

[7] Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 77–78; Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 27.

[8] There is no doubt a social dimension to this metaphoric revilement of "day-labourers" and "slaves" as "foreign races" that would be worthy of exploration.

be found in Chapter 12, where Mani is asked to explain the "Five Words which are proclaimed in the teaching of the Baptists" (1 Ke 44.25–26) and other sects. Unfortunately, the lacunous state of the text once again prevents us from reconstructing what these "Five Words" might have been, with the exception of "Third Messenger" as the second in the series (1 Ke 44.36–45.1). Similarly, in Chapter 100 "On the Dragon, the one with Fourteen Heads; what is it and …," Mani is questioned by a disciple on the existence of a fourteen-headed dragon mentioned in the "laws of the Magi" as dwelling in "Five Hallows" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛϣⲁⲣϣϥ) (1 Ke 252.1–3). In response, Mani is made to give an anthropological interpretation in which the fourteen heads of the dragon are said to represent the seven (sic!)[10] senses of the head and the seven senses of the body (1 Ke 252.19–253.2). The "Five Pits" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲃⲏⲃ) in which the dragon dwells, however, are said to represent five of the internal organs (1 Ke 253.2–7).

Aetiological Patterning

Finally, a small class of what might be termed aetiological[11] patterns can be identified in chapters where Mani is made to account for the existence of certain natural or biological phenomena. For instance, in Chapter 95 Mani is made to offer an explanation of five different manifestations of cloud (1 Ke 240.19–244.13), while in Chapter 65 he is made to describe five aspects of the sun, namely its 1) light, 2) beauty, 3) peace, 4) life, and 5) force (1 Ke 162.1–13). Similarly in Chapter 68, Mani is made to describe five effects of fire, such as the fact that it 1) destroys materials, 2) separates fire, light, ash, and smoke from wood, 3) gives taste to food, 4) helps craftsmen work, and 5) helps people to see (1 Ke 166.19–30). In addition, Chapter 104 presents a particularly enigmatic discussion of five ways in which the energy provided by food is expended by human beings through 1) intellectual pleasure, 2) speech, 3) physical activity, 4) sexual intercourse, and 5) procreation (1 Ke 258.10–23). Interestingly, emphasis is placed on the well-being and needs of the fifth product, the child, as most important, while the other four are seen as unimportant and incidental. Finally, Chapter 107 offers a five-part explication of the production of speech (1 Ke 261.3–12) based on a metaphor involving the work of craftsmen.

[10] One would expect Mani to describe the five senses of the head and the body, but the fact that fourteen heads are mentioned necessitates the description of seven. Besides, if one counts two ears, two eyes, two nostrils, and one mouth, one arrives at seven. See 1 Ke 173.1–4.

[11] I use the term aetiological to mean that the author(s) are attempting to account for and explain the existence of various worldly phenomena through the lens of Manichaean ideology.

Such chapters are generally very brief and seem to have served as simple aetiological discussions about commonplace topics that were likely seen as problematic when viewed through the lens of Manichaean ideology. For instance, the status of fire as both a Light and Dark Element no doubt caused confusion as to its utility. Similarly, Manichaean condemnations of procreation likely perplexed some of the Catechumens with families. The fact that such issues could be explained in terms of five-part patterns would have been reassuring to the Kephalaia's intended audience, for whom a pentadic vision of reality was being constructed.

CONCLUSIONS & IMPLICATIONS

This study of five-part numeric patterns in the Manichaean Kephalaia has led to one primary conclusion, namely, that the text contains a considerable number of theological formulations that appear to be at variance with what we know, or can infer, about canonical Manichaean traditions. This means that the compilers of the work deemed it necessary to alter, expand, and improvise upon the teachings of their founder in order to address a variety of themes that were seen as either pressing or simply of interest. If this is the case, then why did they do it? What were some of the factors that might have stimulated this departure from teachings and traditions that Mani, we assume, had expected to be definitive? In response, three factors appear to have been at work that led to this creative use of numeric patterning: 1) scholastic redaction, 2) response to adversity, and 3) missionary expansion. Moreover, by way of conclusion, some suggestions will be offered as to why the number five was favoured in particular as well as who could have been the driving force behind this numeric interest.

Scholastic Redaction

As was stated above, from what we can piece together from the many scattered remains of Mani's own writings, it does not appear that his work was very systematic in nature. Rather, likely written over a substantial period of time in varying circumstances,[1] Mani's writings seem to have been largely incidental, dealing with a wide range of (often miscellaneous) theological, polemical, and pastoral concerns (as in the Book of Mysteries and Epistles). In some cases, he seems to have presented a more-or-less straightforward narrative of his cosmogonical, prophetological, or eschatological ideas (as in Shabuhragan, Living Gospel, and the source[s] used by Theodore bar Khonai and al-Nadīm), while in others, he appears to have been somewhat of a collector of pre-existing traditions (as in the Book of Giants). Besides, the fact that he attempted to portray his vision artistically by means of his Picture-book implies that Mani may have been more interested in the aesthetic impact of his message than its systematic presentation. More importantly, however, none of these canonical writings appear to have contained the same degree of fascination with numbers and numeric patterns as can be found so prominently expressed in the Kephalaia. This means that, at some point in the (largely obscure) literary history of the work, the compilers of the Kephalaia saw fit to introduce these patterns in order to resolve what may have been a substantial number of "loose-ends" and ambiguities in the canonical tradition. By doing so, they were attempting to construct a more cohesive and, by extension, more competitive theological vision of the cosmos. The fact that the compilers of so many chapters display a pronounced preference for five means that the editorial efforts in which they engaged can be reasonably described as an essentially scholastic process of pentadic redaction.

First, we observed that the compilers of the Kephalaia appear to have adopted as a general theological principle the idea that divine beings—both good and evil, light and dark—ought to be conceived of as having five basic properties. This was, as we saw, dramatically (and it would seem programmatically) expressed in Chapter 2 through the radical opposition between the "Two Trees," an early Manichaean metaphor for the two radically opposed principles. In this case, the two opposed natures, so fundamental to Manichaean cosmology, are conceived of as being qualitatively different, though structurally identical.

Then we directed our attention to the light-realm, where we saw that this interest in conveying the five-fold nature of divine being was extended to the most revered of such beings, the Father of Greatness, who, even though he was known in canonical (and later eastern) traditions both as the "Four-faced God" and as having "Five Limbs," was portrayed by the compiler of Chapter 21 a being characterized by five qualities.

Following this, we looked at the degree to which the Kephalaia compilers were faced with considerable conceptual and terminological challenges in their efforts to describe the constituent elements that give light-being its substance. These "Five Elements," also known as the "Five Sons of First Man," the "Five Luminous Gods," and at times even the "Five Intellectuals," are found in an often bewildering array of contexts that do not always allow for a clear differentiation of concepts. Nevertheless, in spite of this obvious terminological variability and confusion, we also noted that the compilers do not appear to have been interested in sorting them out. Rather, this series, particularly under the guise of the "Five Sons," served as a convenient literary and rhetorical tool for the construction of other more elaborate patterns and formulations involving other number patterns.

Next, we examined the degree to which five-part patterns played a pivotal role in both the theological and literary formulations of Chapter 38, a text that might be considered the centre-piece of Kephalaia volume one. In this chapter, really a treatise, Mani is made to go to great lengths to explain to a reticent disciple his assertion that the human body is really just a microcosmic representation of the macrocosm and that both domains display an equally pentadic structure in which a divine guardian watches over five districts continually disturbed by the rebellions of the dark powers.

Our final foray into the light-realm involved an examination of how the Kephalaia compilers sought to transform the basic pattern of Manichaean conceptions of divine activity from one based on three-stages (most clearly evidenced by Theodore bar Khonai's account) to one based on five. This was expressed by means of the highly variable series known as the "Five Fathers" as well as the grouping identified as the "Five Greatnesses." Each of these cases appears to have represented a deliberate attempt at the pentadic redaction of Manichaean discourse.

When it came to the dark-realm, the compilers were compelled to be more creative in their redaction efforts, since, as far as we can tell, Mani's descriptions of the land of darkness do not appear to have been all that specific. This meant that the compilers had to construct a vision of the dark-realm that was equally rooted in five-part patterns and, as such, could be symmetrically opposed to the light-realm.[2]

[2] Given the obvious and overriding importance of luminous series such as the "Five Limbs" and the "Five Elements," especially in canonical traditions (see above), I do not accept Couliano's suggestion that the Five Planets are the basis of all Manichaean pentads and, therefore, the dark-realm must have preceded the light-realm in Manichaean ideological formulation ("The Counterfeit Spirit," 57). If anything, this study demonstrates that the opposite was the case.

the dark-realm into five separate elemental worlds. How to describe these individual jurisdictions, however, became a challenge, since the canonical ordering of dark elements, which had placed "smoke" in first position and "darkness" last, led to a terminological difficulty that the compilers were not quite able to overcome. As we saw, this problem became most evident in Chapter 6, which applies no less than four different names to the chief ruler of the "Five Worlds of Darkness," although here too, as in Chapter 38, five-part patterning was woven into the literary and rhetorical structure in order to drive home the essentially pentadic nature of evil.

Next, we saw that Manichaeans also got into trouble when they attempted to malign only five of the seven planets known to antiquity, with the exception of the Sun and Moon, which they viewed as light-ships ferrying liberated light-particles back to their homeland. This necessitated the substitution of the "Two Ascendants," an astronomical concept that they do not appear to have completely understood, since as Roger Beck has described it, the "Ascendant" (anabibazon) was meant to be complimented by a "Descendant" (katabibazon).[3] Then, the compilers' attempt to associate the twelve signs of the Zodiac with the "Five Worlds of Darkness" led to equally patchy results, although in this case, this artificial construction seems to have had a polemical motivation.

Then, in a more generalized way, we examined how the Kephalaia compilers used five-part numerical patterns in order to address a variety of soteriological, ethical, ecclesiological, polemical, and aetiological themes. Here too, we observed that, especially in soteriological, ethical, and ecclesiological contexts, the compilers presented pentadic constructions at variance with what can be known from canonical traditions.

Such an extensive, albeit often subtle, reshaping of Manichaean discourse implies that the teaching and writings that Mani left behind were not seen as sufficiently clear and, as such, required extensive commentary and retooling. After all, the mere existence of an apparently scholastic work such as the Kephalaia on such a massive scale indicates that, in fact, there were a considerable number of ambiguities in the Manichaean tradition that needed to be addressed, since we may assume that many chapters have as their kernel some sort of exegetical puzzle found within the canon. This kind of redactional work not only runs contrary to the finality and definitiveness that Mani appears to have claimed for his "gospel," but it also challenges the assumptions of many modern scholars who have allowed themselves to be influenced by such claims. In fact, there is a long tradition in Manichaean Studies of scholars asserting the general uniformity and consistency of Manichaean doctrine across its bewildering array of culturally specific milieux.[4] Even Polotsky talked about the essential unity of Manichaean traditions from North Africa to China.[5] These conventional assumptions about Manichaean discourse can be summarized as follows:

1) that Mani established a complete theological system in all of its details,[6]
2) that this system was transmitted essentially unchanged from one socio-historical context to another,[7] and
3) that this system can be reconstructed from the diverse, but essentially uniform, sources into which it was recorded.[8]

Today, however, it no longer seems appropriate to talk about a unified "Manichaean system," especially one formulated and set-in-stone by Mani himself. Rather, as this study has shown, Manichaean theology, even at a relatively early stage, seems to have existed in varying states of flux and evolution, depending on the context in which it circulated.[9]

[4] Such assumptions, for example, have even led Lieu to assert that "literalist" understandings of Mani's teaching made Manichaeism "a static religion" (Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 32). This implies, however, that basic features of the discourse did not change and made it easily exposed to philosophical attack.

[5] Polotsky, "Manichäismus," 101 [240].

[6] Recently Gardner and Lieu state that in contrast to mainstream Christianity, which worked out its doctrinal formulations over centuries, "Mani took great pains to establish a total religion based upon his own comprehensive scriptures and preaching," thus, there is "less scope in the study of Manichaeism to trace the evolution of doctrine, since all teaching was rigidly tied to the very details of the divine word in Mani's scriptures" (Manichaean Texts from the Roman Empire, 9–10).

[7] Rudolph suggested that Coptic sources come "closest to the original system" (Gnosis, 334), while Heuser, in spite of his efforts to focus on a limited socio-historical source base in his study of Manichaean myth in Coptic texts, suggests that "the Manichaean myth in toto can be deduced from" these sources ("The Manichaean Myth," 5).

[8] In his presentation of the Manichaean "system" Hans Jonas stated that he made use primarily of Theodore bar Khonai, "supplemented by whatever pieces of material from parallel texts fit into a particular passage" (The Gnostic Religion, 209). Later, Klimkeit would allude to the fact that Manichaean sources reveal "a remarkably unified system" (Gnosis on the Silk Road, 4).

However, as Jason BeDuhn has pointed out, Manichaean ritual, in contrast to doctrine, seems to have been one aspect of the religion that remained particularly consistent throughout the wide array of cultural environments, and, in fact, theology may have acted more as a conceptual framework meant to support ritual.[10] Thus, it seems more appropriate to talk about phases of Manichaean theology. Just as mainstream Christian theology can rightly be identified by any number of qualifiers, such as ante-Nicene, post-Chalcedonean, etc., so too would it be desirable for scholars to develop similar nomenclature based on critical evaluation of the sources. This is partly a result of the fact that some scholars have been somewhat overenthusiastic in their desire to hear the authentic voice of Mani preserved in texts such as the Kephalaia, which presents itself (artificially I believe) as a record of his discourses. Such a desire, although not surprising, runs contrary to the function and purpose of the work as identified by this study. A methodological lesson can and should be learned from the degree to which many New Testament scholars are generally sceptical about how much material from the gospels can be directly attributed to Jesus. While Jesus of course never intended to found a religion, it is thought that canonical early Christian writings do contain at least a core of authentic material drawn more or less directly from his teaching (reflected in part by the hypothetically posited Q-document in particular). Many decades of careful study have shown the degree to which this material has been shaped by the redactional and editorial efforts of the first generations of Christians. We should assume that a similar relationship exists between a work such as the Kephalaia and the words of Mani himself,[11] although in his case he seems to have deliberately sought to found (or at least reform) his notion of the true religion. While it may be assumed that on some level a certain amount of Kephalaia material was drawn either from Mani's own writings or from oral traditions passed down by early disciples and teachers, the vast majority seems to have undergone a substantial amount of expansion and revision. It just so happens that this particular study has focused on redactional tendencies by means of numeric patterning, although there would certainly be other thematic gateways worthy of exploration.

Adversity and Persecution

The desire to clarify the teachings of the founder may not have been the only reason that so many Kephalaia chapters were shaped by such a redactional tendency, since some of those most deeply interested in five-part patterns also reveal a keen awareness of both external and internal pressures perceived by the community. External pressures, for example, are evoked most explicitly in the efforts of Chapter 6 to describe the properties of the Five Worlds of Darkness, which ultimately lead to an association of these worlds not only with rival religious communities such as Zoroastrians, Christians, and "pagans," but even, as in the case of the great World of Smoke, the "powers that be." As such, we are told most emphatically that "the spirit of the King of (those of) Darkness is the one who rules / today in the powers and authorities of the earth and the / whole world. I mean those who rule over all of creation, / humbling people in their tyranny according to their will" (1 Ke 33.5–8). This statement no doubt reflects bitter memories of persecution at the hands of Sassanian and Roman authorities.

After the deaths of King Shapur I (ca. 272 CE) and his successor Hormizd (273 CE), both of whom had been favourably disposed to Mani and his teaching, religious and political machinations began within the Sassanian administration against the new, upstart religion. In particular, Kirdir, the Zoroastrian "high-priest," sought to bring the empire's religious minorities under control,[12] as is evidenced by one of his surviving inscriptions, which states, in Middle Persian, that "the Jews, the Buddhists and the Brahmans, the Nazarenes (i.e., Aramaic-speaking Christians) and the Christians (i.e., Greek-speaking), the Baptists and the Manichaeans were struck throughout the land."[13] Eventually, this led to the imprisonment and death of Mani (ca. 276 or 277 CE) and the scattering of the Manichaeans from Mesopotamia. Within fifteen years, Mar Sīsin (i.e. Sisinnios), the successor to Mani as head of the church, or archēgos, was also executed by Vahram II (292 CE).[14] Some Manichaeans, fleeing this persecution, took refuge at the court of King Amaro ('Amr ibn 'Adi) at Hira,[15] to the southwest of Seleucia-Ctesiphon.[16] Eventually, Amaro was even able to convince King Narses to halt the persecution of the Manichaeans, although this was done, in part, strategically, since Emperor Diocletian had recently issued an edict against the Manichaeans on his territory in 303 CE. This was seen by Narses as an opportunity to gain Manichaean support. But, soon enough after, under Hormizd II (303–309 CE), the Zoroastrian priesthood again agitated for the king to strike at the Manichaeans.[17]

Similarly, under the Roman Empire, Manichaeans were faced with periodic persecution and toleration. After making initial inroads into Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, Mani's followers were (unjustly)[18] condemned by Diocletian for purportedly propagating the "damnable customs and perverse laws of the Persians."[19] The so-called "Edict of Milan" (312 CE), however, brought some respite on a whole range of religious matters and, as a result, Manichaeans seem to have flourished in places such as the Nile Valley, where the Coptic Kephalaia were likely produced, Palestine, where a teacher such as Julia could flourish,[20] and Italy, where Augustine, on the recommendation of some rather well connected Manichaean "saints," was appointed Chair of Rhetoric in Milan.[21] This relative religious peace was short-lived, since with the accession of Theodosius anti-heretical measures were reinforced (380 CE). Ultimately, by the time of Justinian, Manichaeans were outlawed and the Elect threatened with death.[22]

While the bitter memories of these persecutions are a well-known feature of the Manichaean Homilies, especially the "Sermon on the Great War,"[23] echoes can also be heard in the Kephalaia, which may in fact draw on traditions pre-dating the Homilies.[24] For instance, in Chapter 189 "[On the Five Temptations]," the fifth temptation menacing the Elect, presumably apostasy, comes during persecution:

> [The fifth is this:] If persecution / [happens] in … through the persecutor … / … the Sects, those who stand in … / … tribulation. Or again as they … / … as they strike him with whips … / … and they come to "crucify"[25] him and he does not turn … / … from his truth and he bears every thing … / … wrath, bond, (and) crucifixion. In these Five / Temptations … … of the Elect / … he receives the … … / … increases in faith and becomes true … / his knowledge … temptation … / … and he returns immediately and reveals / the truth and … gives … (1 Ke 485.30–486.13).

Such a vivid description reveals that persecution formed part of the living memory of the Kephalaia compilers and influenced at least some of their pentadic formulations.

The adverse effects of persecution are also incorporated into Chapter 137 "On the Five Types of Brotherhood that are distinguished from one another." This chapter, which as we previously saw, enumerated five types of people found in the church, suggests that the fourth and fifth classes, the so-called "day-labourers" and, especially, the "slaves" fleed at the first sign of persecution (1 Ke 340.6–7).

While it is obvious that persecution was a subject that the compilers incorporated into some of their numeric formulations, less obvious is the possibility that such formulations acted as a fortification strategy in the face of real or potential persecutions. It seems at least plausible to suggest that the attempt to shape Manichaean discourse and ideology into such regularized and reoccurring patterns could have served as a means to strengthen the faith of adherents, especially the Elect, to whom the Kephalaia as a work appears to have been directed. The broad application of pentadic structures, which were seen as indicative of divinity itself, to such a wide range of phenomena could only serve to reinforce the Manichaean claim to truth and, thereby, support the typical Manichaean boast to have an explanation for everything. Such a vision of reality, if it could be seen to reproduce itself throughout the cosmos, may have helped to keep adherents in the fold and held them fast during times of adversity and repression.

[23] See Pedersen's idiosyncratic, yet thorough, study: Studies in The Sermon on the Great War. According to Pedersen, this homiletic texts was meant "to strengthen the persecuted community in 3rd or 4th century Mesopotamia" (28).

[24] For instance, in the "Sermon on the Great War," Mani is made to say "I weep for my Kephalaia" (Hom 18.6), which may indicate that "kephalaic" literature of some sort existed prior to the composition of the Homilies. See Pedersen, Studies, 90–93.

[25] In this case "crucify" is likely a synonym for torture.

Missionary Expansion

An additional aspect to which numeric patterning may have contributed is the missionary expansion of the movement. As is well known, Manichaeism was a self-consciously missionary religion. As Lieu has written, "misson was the driving force behind the religion from its very inception."[26] Mani's assertion that the previous revelations of Zoroaster, Buddha, and Jesus had been unjustly limited to specific socio-cultural settings meant that he actively sought to deliver his message to a wide range of audiences. As such, modelling himself on Paul, Mani undertook missionary journeys to diverse parts of the Sassanian Empire,[27] which enabled him to encounter and preach to Christians in the west, Buddhists and Brahmins in the east, and Zoroastrians in the Iranian heartland. His disciples followed suit, with Mar Adda being primarily responsible for the western mission and Mar Ammō as the chief organizer of the mission to the east.[28]

Numeric patterning may offer us a glimpse into one of the missionary techniques employed by Manichaeans, at least in the western context to which our texts testify. As Asmussen observed: "Mani and his missionaries knew the importance of repetition. When well-known material and names occurred again and again, a feeling of security and confidence was produced in the minds of the listeners."[29] As such, the repeated presentation of Manichaean doctrines in predictable and self-reinforcing patterns, such as those involving five, could have contributed to the palatability and plausibility of the missionary's teaching. In addition, the fact that the number five was used with such frequency could have also had a mnemonic value, since a series of five points could be easily recalled using five fingers.[30] After all, a number of the Kephalaia

[27] Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 88.
[28] Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 90.
[29] Manichaean Literature, 113.
[30] In fact, ancient theoreticians suggested that the five fingers of the hand could chapters that elaborate five points are extremely brief—almost catechetical (see, for instance, Chapters 25, 33, 37, 68, 107, 193)—with little or no literary frame. Such chapters appear to represent "proto-kephalaia"[31] and it may well be that many more elaborate chapters have their origins in such brief, mnemonically digestible, didactic texts. This means that numeric patterning, especially those patterns involving five, could have served as a valuable pedagogical tool for the Manichaean missionary.

Why five?

But why, we may ask, was five favoured as a figure around which so much of the Manichaean world-view was organized? The fact that five played such a central role in the development of Manichaean discourse is, as we have seen, rooted in the fact that Mani and Manichaeans seem to have believed as a general principle that most beings (both Light and Dark) possess five qualities. This concept, in turn, was connected to the Manichaean conviction that the human being, with its five limbs, five senses, five fingers, and five toes (on each limb), was a microcosmic representation of both the wider macro-cosmos[32] and the divine power at its source. After all, according to Manichaean cosmology, when the demons conspired to create Adam and Eve, they used the androgynous image of the Third Messenger as a model (Theodore bar Khonai 317.7–11 [Scher]). This basic anthropological importance of five, however, was likely drawn from 2nd-century Syriac philosopher Bardaisan, who according to Ephraim taught that all entities possess five aspects corresponding to the five senses. Each must have its own colour, its own smell, its own taste, its own texture, and its own voice;[33] sentiments definitely echoed by the description of the dark ruler in Chapter 6. In addition, the fact that Mani seems to have inherited a concept of

serve as a valuable tool in the memorization of a discourse (Kennedy, A New History of Classical Rhetoric, 124).

[31] See T. Kell. Copt. 1 in Gardner, Kellis Literary Texts, 2.

[32] For example, Kephalaia Chapter 70 is called "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the cosmos." Also, the Manichaean account from the Acta Archelai states that "this body is called cosmos in relation to the great cosmos (i.e., the macrocosmos)" (τὸ γὰρ σῶμα τοῦτο κόσμος καλεῖται πρὸς τὸν μέγαν κόσμον [9.4]).

[33] See Ephraim, Prose Refutations of Mani, Marcion, and Bardaisan, 223 (Mitchell).

Five Elements, perhaps also from the school of Bardaisan, as the basic building blocks of both the soul and its material antithesis, as well as the concept of the Five Limbs, means that some of the most fundamental concepts in Manichaean theology were canonically expressed as pentads. This, in turn, provided the precedent for later teachers and theologians to use, expand, and reinvent this basic paradigm.

Who was responsible?

While we have sought to reconstruct the methods and motivations of an alleged group of anonymous compilers, a clue to who may have instigated or at least influenced this process of enumeration and systematization may be found in a Sogdian fragment from Turfan on the healing of Nafsha of Tadmor/Palmyra. In this text, Mar Adda, the primary Manichaean missionary to the west, is said to have received a vision from the master himself, in which everything, we are told, is explained "fully and completely by numbers."[34] Michel Tardieu suggested that Adda, who held the ecclesiastical rank of "teacher,"[35] may have in fact been the author of the Kephalaia.[36] We may never be able to validate such a bold suggestion, but it at least seems plausible that Adda, if not the actual "author" of the Kephalaia, may have provided the main impetus or model for the development of this interest in enumeration and systematization. This Iranian fragment would seem to provide the much needed "authorization" from Mani for Adda (and/or his associates) to do something that Mani's great religious project was supposed to have made unnecessary—that is, the interpretation, clarification, and systematization of the teaching of God's ultimate messenger. Mani's canonical writings were supposed to have been definitive, but as the "prologue" to the Kephalaia itself reveals (1 Ke 8.34–35), where

[35] Funk has raised the question as to whether or not the "teacher" referred to by the title of the first Kephalaia volume is in actual fact the author rather than Mani ("Reconstruction," 154, n. 17).

[36] Tardieu, "Principes de l'exégèse manichéenne," 134, n. 73. Cited (tentatively) by Funk, "Reconstruction," 154. Adda is known to have composed his own writings, which were sometimes mistaken for those of Mani (Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 91). This, in fact, may have been the result of conscious imitation or attribution of his words to the master, not unlike the situation found within the Kephalaia.

Mani is made to exhort his disciples to record what he taught them, the definitive and final pretence with which Mani packaged his writings was quickly overridden by the needs and circumstances of the communities he left behind.

PART II

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE KEPHALAIA OF THE TEACHER [BERLIN CODEX]

Note on Translations

The following translations have been left in their codex page format in order to facilitate cross-referencing with Part I and comparison with the original edition (to which the reader is strongly encouraged to refer). Also, mythological figures and theological concepts of particular relevance to Part I have been rendered in italics purely for emphasis. In addition, I have made every effort to incorporate (as yet unpublished) Addenda et corrigenda (A&C) by W.-P. Funk into the translation of these selected chapters. The final published version of these A&C is slated to appear at the end of the Polotsky/Böhlig/Funk edition of Kephalaia volume one. As such, references to the A&C are simply meant to indicate that an improved or alternate reading exists. However, as in the case of the translations as a whole, any inaccuracies in the rendering of these valuable A&C are mine. Note also that any words or phrases followed by (?) are conjectural reconstructions.

CHAPTER 2

THE SECOND, ON THE PARABLE OF THE TREE

16.35 The first parable they asked him about (and) implored [him to]
16.36 interpret for them is this: While [crowds of . . .][1]

17.1 were gathered . . . his disciples stood 17.2 before him (and) questioned him, saying: We implore you, our 17.3 Lord, that you [teach us] and interpret for us these 17.4 two trees [which Jesus] described to his disciples, as is written 17.5 in the Gos[pel, where he said]:[2] The good tree produces
17.6 [good fruit,] and [the] evil tree produces bad fruit
17.7 [. . . Neither is there a] good [tree] that produces bad fruit, 17.8 [nor is there an evil tree that] produces good fruit.
17.9 [Every tree is known by] its fruit.
17.10 [We] implore you, then, that you [now teach us about] 17.11 these two trees [and] interpret them [for us] . . .
17.12 . . . as they grow [on the] earth. For they are described . . .
17.13 [in the] writings . . . . . them . . .
17.14 . . . . . word(?) . . .
17.15 . . . . . mystery by mystery.
17.16 There are some among the Sects[3] who interpret these two 17.17 trees, counting them as good trees along with the rest of the good things[4]
17.18 on this mixed earth. Each [one(?)] . . . . . .
17.19 to them, relating them to . . .
17.20 a single interpretation.
17.21 Then our Lord Manichaios, the Apostle, sent [from[5] the] Greatness, spoke 17.22 to his disciples: Very great is this matter which [you uttered . . .]
17.23 . . . . . .
17.24 . . . . . .
17.25 . . . . . .

24.32 and Teachers, who journey in the Holy Church, [proclaiming]
24.33 wisdom and truth. Great [power] … …

25.1 … all the Elect, the Virgins, and the Chaste,
25.2 [along with] the Catechumens, who are in the [Holy] Church …
25.3 … the Five Happinesses, the Five Wisdoms, and the Five Powers …
25.4 … … in the Five Churches. Blessed is
25.5 everyone who will know them, for he … …
25.6 … kingdom forever.

CHAPTER 4

ON THE FOUR GREAT DAYS, WHICH HAVE COME FROM ONE ANOTHER; ALONG WITH THE FOUR NIGHTS

25.11 Again the Enlightener spoke: There are Four Great Days which have come
25.12 [from one another, they] have been called forth [from] one another. The First
25.13 [Great Day] is the Father, the God of Truth, the first …
25.14 … … among the Aeons of his Greatness in his Living
25.15 [Kingdom]. The twelve hours of this Great Day
25.16 [are] the Twelve Great, Rich Gods of [Great]ness,
25.17 [those] who are the first Calls which he called (into being) according to 25.18 his Greatness. He distributed them among the Four Regions,
25.19 three to each side.
25.20 The Second Day is the Third Messenger, who 25.21 dwells in the Ship of Light. Its twelve hours are
25.22 the Twelve Virgins who he summoned in his Greatness.
25.23 [The] Third [Day] is the Column of Glory, [the great]
25.24 [Porter, who is greater than] all [the Porters], who supports …
25.25 all these … those above and those below. Its twelve hours are 25.26 the Five Sons of the First Man, the Five Sons of the Living
25.27 Spirit, those who support all burdens of the 25.28 cosmos, along with the Call and Response, which are counted among their ten
25.29 brothers. These are the twelve light-hours of the Third
25.30 Day. The Fourth Day is Jesus
25.31 the Splendour, who [dwells in] his church. Its twelve
25.32 hours are the twelve Wisdoms, which are his
25.33 [light-hours]. These are the Four Great Days which have come 25.34 [forth from one another] (and) which were called from one another. They …
25.35 … Blessed is everyone who knows them and
25.36 … of Light.

26.1 [Know also this!]: Just as Four Days [exist],
26.2 so too do Four Nights exist.
26.3 The First Night is the Land of Darkness. It has 26.4 twelve dark [shadows], which are the hours of Darkness. The twelve shadows of the first Night are the Five Elements of the Land of Darkness, [which] have poured forth in its Five Senses and …

have … in its Five Elements and its Five …
the Five [Spirits(?)] who dwell in its Elements …
These are the twelve shadows and spirits of the first Night.
    The second Night is Matter, the sculptor … …
… … … who has formed …
and every ruling power that is in the World [of Darkness, which] has fashioned it in Five Senses, Five [Male]
and Five Female, two to a world ,as well as the fire and [lust]
[which] dwell in men and women, inflaming them for one another. These are the twelve Spirits of this second Night. But, this Matter, it is the Thought of Death, which causes the King of Darkness and his powers to prepare for war and battle against the Aeons of Greatness. But, it was caught (and) snared by the First Man (and) carried to … … by the powers … it was brought from the Land of Death (and) placed … above and below in the [entire] cosmos, in the Five Parts which are above in the heavens along with the Five [Parts which] are below in the lower lands, along with the heat [and the] cold, which are the father and the mother, their fire and their desire.
    This is the second Night, which is born our of the first Night. It was snared by the First Man (and) brought by the Living Spirit (and) placed in this mixed world …
above and below. The [upper part is the(?)] senses of men; the lower part [… the senses(?)]
of women. The third [Night is the Five]
Worlds of Flesh … … [five(?)]

[male] and the five female, those who are born of the powers
… they fell upon the earth, while they are revealed in the dryness and cold, along with the fire and desire
[which] dwells in them, which impel them towards one another.
[Matter], however, is the Thought of Death, which is [Mother] of them all, as it is named among them "Night," the male and female [powers][22] of flesh, along with the fire and [desire] … twelve hours of … …
… Night. This, again, is the third Night, in
[the] World of Flesh, which is born out of the second Night, which the Living Spirit crucified in the [22] A&C: [ⲛ̄ⲟ]ⲁⲙ.

27.12 [entire[23] cosmos, above] and below in the heaven …
27.13 … The fourth Night is the Law of [Sin,]
27.14 [which] is the Spirit of Darkness that speaks through the twelve
27.15 [spirits], the twelve Sects, which are the strippings,
27.16 the twelve Zodiacs of Matter, which are 27.17 its thrones. It (that is, Matter) is announced, as it is moulded and 27.18 manifest in the Old Man. But, the hours of this fourth
27.19 Night, which is the Old Man who rules among the Sects, they are the 27.20 twelve evil spirits … the Old Man, who …
27.21 … … … …
27.22 … … … …
27.23 … … … …
27.24 [Blessed is he who(?)] distinguishes the day and the night …
27.25 … … of Death. This is the fourth [Night]
27.26 … … which have come forth from one another, one …
27.27 … … as the Days of Light
27.28 that they come out[24] (and) have revealed one another. So too
27.29 … [do the Nights(?)] come to be from one another.
27.30 Blessed is the one who knows and who distinguishes and
27.31 … … forever.

[23] A&C: [ⲥⲙⲟⲥ ⲧⲏ]ⲣ̣[ⲫ].
[24] A&C: [ϫⲉ] ⲛ̣ⲧ[ⲁⲩⲉⲓ ⲁⲃⲁⲗ] ⲁⲩ̣[ⲥ]ⲱⲗⲡ.

CHAPTER 6

ON THE FIVE STOREHOUSES WHICH HAVE POURED FORTH FROM THE LAND OF DARKNESS FROM THE BEGINNING; THE FIVE ARCHONS, THE FIVE SPIRITS, THE FIVE BODIES, (AND) THE FIVE TASTES

30.17 Again, the Enlightener spoke to his disciples: Five Store-
30.18 Houses have existed from the beginning in the Land of Darkness. Five
30.19 Elements have poured forth from them. Also, from the Five
30.20 Elements were fashioned Five Trees, (and) from the Five Trees
30.21 were fashioned Five Species of Creatures according to each World, 30.22 male and female. But also, the Five Worlds [have]
30.23 Five Kings, Five Spirits, [Five] Bodies, (and) Five [Tastes]
30.24 according to each world, which do not resemble [one another].
30.25 The King of the World of Smoke, [he] … …
30.26 He has come from the depth of [the darkness. This is he who is]
30.27 the chief of all evil and [all] wickedness. The initial 30.28 spread of the war came to be [through] him—all
30.29 battles, fights, quarrels, conflicts, destructions,
30.30 struggles, errors, contests. It is he [who first] stirred
30.31 conflict and war along with his worlds [and his] powers. Afterwards, 30.32 he waged war with the Light, doing battle with 30.33 the exalted kingdom. But,[25] as for [the King] of Darkness, 30.34 there are Five Forms in him: his head [is lion-faced, his]
30.35 hands and feet are demon- [and devil-]faced, [his]
30.36 shoulders are eagle-faced, while his belly [is dragon-faced,]

31.1 (and) his tail is fished-faced. These Five Forms, the imprints of his
31.2 [Five] Worlds, are found in the King of (those belonging to) Darkness.
31.3 There are also Five Properties in him. The first is his 31.4 darkness. The second is his stench. The third is 31.5 his ugliness. The fourth is his bitterness—his very soul.
31.6 The fifth is his fire, which burns like a
31.7 peis[26] of iron being melted by the flame.
31.8 There are also three other things about him: The first is that his [body(?)][27]

[25] A&C: ⲉⲕ[ⲓ ⲇⲉ ⲁⲡⲣⲣⲟ] (cf. 1 Ke 173.27).
[26] Meaning of ⲡⲉⲓϣ unknown, see Polotsky/Böhlig 31 n. 7.
[27] A&C: ⲥϣⲙⲁ (doubtful reading).

31.9 [is hard] (and) very strong, as if (in) its bitterness Matter
31.10 built it …, which is the Thought of Death,
31.11 that which formed it by the nature of the Land of 31.12 Darkness. Thus is the [body(?)] of the Archon of [Smoke]. It is 31.13 harder than all iron, brass, steel, and
31.14 [lead,] since there isn't any cleaver or implement to 31.15 pierce[28] or cut it. For Matter, its fashioner, built it
31.16 … strong and hard. The second (thing is) that he strikes
31.17 [and] kills by the utterance of his magic. His preaching and his 31.18 hearing, all his foolish speech,[29] make magic 31.19 and invocations for him. When it pleases him, he calls it upon 31.20 himself and hides, by his magic, from his
31.21 companions. Also, when it pleases him, he reveals himself to his powers
31.22 [and] appears to them, so that the sorcery which people
31.23 practise today … in this world are the mysteries of 31.24 the King of Darkness. Therefore, I command you
31.25 at all times: Keep yourselves away from magic and the sorcery
31.26 of Darkness, since the person who learns them and
31.27 [practises] them, and perfects them, at the end, where the King
31.28 of (those belonging to) Darkness and his powers will be bound, in that place will 31.29 also be bound the soul of the one who lives by them and 31.30 [walks] in the [magic] of Error. Whether it is a man or a
31.31 [woman], this is the judgement which has been given. They are cut 31.32 … the judgements of God, for he who will 31.33 … and their king.

32.1 The third (is) that the King of (those belonging to) Darkness knows the 32.2 speech and the language of his Five Worlds. He understands
32.3 everything that he hears from their mouths, as they speak with one
32.4 another—each according to his language. [Every] plan
32.5 which they conceive against him (and) every deceit which they discuss 32.6 with one another in order to bring it upon him—he knows them.
32.7 He also knows the gestures by which they give signs
32.8 to one another. But his powers and the archons
32.9 who are under him, they do not understand his speech. All these things
32.10 are revealed to him, although their heart is not revealed to him.
32.11 He does not know their mind and their thought, he does not consider their 32.12 beginning or their end, but he knows and perceives only 32.13 that which is before his eyes.

[28] A&C: [ⲭⲱ]ⲧⲉ.
[29] A&C: ⲥⲉⲭⲉ rather than ⲥⲉⲃⲉ.

32.14 There is also another, different thing in the King of (those belonging to)
32.15 Darkness. When it pleases him to walk, he spreads out all his limbs,
32.16 and he walks. When it comes to his mind, he draws 32.17 in his limbs, takes them to himself, rolls them into 32.18 one another, and falls down like a grape or a
32.19 great iron ball. His voice is terrible.
32.20 He causes fear (and) frightens his powers with his voice.
32.21 For, when he speaks, he is like the thunder
32.22 among the clouds and is like the … of the one who …
32.23 When he cries out and he … and he cries …
32.24 on his powers, they tremble and turn and fall at his feet
32.25 like birds, while they … bird …
32.26 and they fall down to the earth. However, there is only this one thing:
32.27 he does not know what is far from him. He does not see what 32.28 is in the distance, nor does he hear it. But that which is 32.29 before his face, this he sees, hearing it (and)
32.30 knowing it. These signs and evil symbols
32.31 are found in the chief of the demons and
32.32 devils, the King of all the mountains of darkness. [When][30]
32.33 the Land of Darkness produced him, it [begot him in its]
32.34 cruelty, in its evil, in its wrath … …

33.1 more than all his fellow-Archons, who are in all his worlds.
33.2 Gold is the body of the King of (those of) Darkness.
33.3 The bodies of all the powers who belong to the World of 33.4 Smoke are gold. But, the taste of its fruit is 33.5 salty. The spirit of the King of (those belonging to) Darkness is the one who rules
33.6 today in the powers and authorities of the earth and the 33.7 whole world. I mean those who rule over all of creation,
33.8 humbling people in their tyranny according to their will.
33.9 But, the King of the Worlds of Fire is lion-faced, the first of 33.10 all beasts. His body is brass. So too are [the bodies]
33.11 of all the Archons who belong to the fire.
33.12 Their taste is the sour taste in every form.
33.13 But, the spirit of the King of those who belong to the World of Fire is the 33.14 one who rules in the nobles and leaders who are 33.15 under the command of the powers and authorities and the kings of the 33.16 world. His spirit is also the one found in the Sects
33.17 who worship fire, as they offer their sacrifices to the fire.

[30] A&C: ⲡ[ⲥⲁ]ⲡ ⲁⲛ [ⲉⲧⲁ]-.

33.18 Also, the King of the Worlds of Wind has an eagle-face. His 33.19 body is iron. Also, the bodies of all those who belong to 33.20 the wind are iron. Their taste is the burnt taste
33.21 in every form. His spirit is that of the idol-worshippers,
33.22 the spirits of Error that are in every temple, eidoleion,
33.23 place of worship, statues and images, shrines
33.24 of worldly Error.
33.25 But, the King of the World of Water has a fish-face. His 33.26 body is silver. So too, all the Archons that belong to water, 33.27 their bodies are silver. Also, the taste of their fruit is 33.28 the sweetness of water; the sweet taste in every form.
33.29 Also, the spirit of the King of the Archons of Water is the one who 33.30 rules today in the Sects of Error. Those who
33.31 baptize in the baptism of water, (placing) their hope
33.32 [and] their trust in the baptism of water.
33.33 [The] King of the World of Darkness is a dragon. His
33.34 [body is lead] and tin. So too, all the Archons
33.35 [that belong to the World of] Darkness, their bodies are lead and

34.1 tin. But, the taste of their fruit is bitter.
34.2 Also, the spirit, who rules over them, is the spirit
34.3 who speaks even today in the soothsayers, as they give oracles,
34.4 in seers of every kind, (and) in the demented,
34.5 as well as in spirits who give oracles of any kind.
34.6 Therefore I tell you, my brothers and my
34.7 Limbs, perfect faithful and holy elect:
34.8 Keep your hearts with you and keep yourselves from the 34.9 Five Slaveries of the Five Dark Spirits.
34.10 Abandon the worship of their Five Bodies. Do not
34.11 interact with them, so that you might escape their bond
34.12 and their punishment forever.

CHAPTER 7

THE SEVENTH, ON THE FIVE FATHERS

34.16 Again, as the Enlightener, our father the true Apostle,
34.17 sat among his disciples
34.18 proclaiming to them the greatness of God, he said again to 34.19 them in this way in his revelation: There are Five Fathers,
34.20 who have been called forth one from another, and one has also come 34.21 from the other. The First Father is the Father of 34.22 Greatness, the glorious one who is praised, he whose greatness has no
34.23 measure, who is the first monogenes, the first
34.24 eternal who exists with the Five Fathers forever.
34.25 He who exists before all that has existed and 34.26 will exist. He, then, the glorious Father, he has called 34.27 three emanations from himself. The first is the Great
34.28 Spirit, the First Mother, she who has come from the Father, she was 34.29 revealed first. The second is the Beloved of 34.30 Lights, the great, glorious Beloved, who is honoured, [who]
34.31 has come from the Father and has appeared from him.
34.32 The Third {Father}[31] is the Third [Messenger,]
34.33 the first of all counsellors, [who has come from the]

35.1 First Father (and) has appeared. This is the First Father,
35.2 the First Power, he from whom the three great powers have come.
35.3 This is the First Father, the first eternal, the root
35.4 of all lights. He from whom the three emanations have come.
35.5 They have subdued the Darkness (and) destroyed it. It pleased him not (that)
35.6 they alone be given the victory, (so) the victory is also given to their Aeons.
35.7 The Second Father who has come forth from the First Father is the
35.8 Third Messenger, the replica of the King of Light.
35.9 But, he too has called (and) emanated three
35.10 powers. One is the Column of Glory, the Perfect Man,
35.11 he who supports all things, the Great Column
35.12 of Blessing, the Great Porter, who is greater than

[31] Father (ⲉⲓⲱⲧ) here is an error for "emanation" (ⲡⲣⲟⲃⲟⲗⲏ) (Funk, personal communication).

35.13 all the porters.[32] The second is Jesus the Splendour, the glorious,
35.14 the one through whom eternal life is given. The 35.15 third is the Virgin of Light, the Glorious Wisdom, she 35.16 who stole the heart(s) of the Archons and the Powers by her image, fulfilling
35.17 the will of the Greatness.
35.18 The Third Father who has come forth from the Second Father,
35.19 he is Jesus the Splendour, the glorious. He too has summoned
35.20 three calls like the Second Father.
35.21 The first power which he called forth is the Light-Mind,
35.22 the Father of all Apostles, the first of all the churches,
35.23 he who Jesus set, after our likeness, in the Holy 35.24 Church. The second power which Jesus called
35.25 is the Great Judge, who judges all the souls
35.26 of people, his tent being set in the air [under(?)]
35.27 the wheel [of the] stars.[33] The third power is 35.28 the Youth, the great [power of][34] light in his two per-
35.29 sons in … I am talking about that one who he established 35.30 in the Call [and] Response. [He has established] himself through his father
35.31 the King of … the Saviour … see him, as he speaks
35.32 [to the Jews(?)]:[35] "What[36] I have seen by means of my Father,
35.33 [this I say to] you. You too, what you have seen
35.34 [by means of your father], that you do."

36.1 The Fourth Father is the Light-Mind, he who chooses
36.2 all the churches. He, too, has called three
36.3 powers after the likeness of Jesus. The first power is the Apostle
36.4 of Light, he who comes whenever he puts on the Church
36.5 of the flesh of humankind and becomes leader of 36.6 Righteousness. The second (power) is the Twin, who comes to the 36.7 Apostle and reveals himself to him, since he is a companion to him, 36.8 being bound to him everywhere (and) always helping him in 36.9 all the tribulations and the dangers. The third (power)
36.10 is the Light-Form, which the Elect and the 36.11 Catechumens assume when they renounce the world.
36.12 The Fifth Father is the Light-Form which 36.13 reveals itself to each one who leaves his 36.14 body in the same way as the Apostle, along with the Three
36.15 Great, Glorious Angels who come with it. While the one holds

[32] A similar formulation may be found in a hymn/litany from Mani's Living Gospel (Synaxeis) (Funk, personal communication).

[33] A&C: [ⲙ̄ⲡ]ⲧⲣⲟⲭⲟⲥ [ⲛⲛ]ⲥⲓⲟⲩ.

36.16 the Victory-prize in his hand, (and) the second wears the Garment
36.17 of Light, the third is the one who holds the Diadem
36.18 and the Wreath and the Crown of Light. These are the
36.19 Three Angels of Light who come with this Light-36.20 Form and are revealed with it to the Elect and the 36.21 Catechumens. These are the Five Fathers which have come from 36.22 one another, they have revealed (and) appeared from one
36.23 another. Blessed is the one who knows and understands them, 36.24 for he will find eternal life and put on the Garments of 36.25 Light which are given to the Righteous, [the Faithful], the Peace-Giving,
36.26 and the Doers of Good.

CHAPTER 9

THE INTERPRETATION OF THE (SIGN OF) PEACE, WHAT IT MEANS, THE RIGHT HAND, THE KISS, THE ADORATION

37.31 Again, the Disciples asked the Apostle, saying
37.32 [to him]: This (Sign of) Peace and this Greeting which are found in the world, 37.33 from who [have they come]? Or, the Right Hand which exists in 37.34 [the world], since it is honoured by people, whose is it? Or, the 37.35 [Mystery of the] Kiss, with which people greet one another,
37.36 … … Or, who is it who has revealed this

38.1 Adoration, with which people honour one another? Or, the Laying on of 38.2 Hands, which the great one often lays upon the one bowed 38.3 before him, as he honours him (and) makes him great, whose 38.4 Laying on of Hands is it? Then he spoke to his Disciples:
38.5 These five matters which you have asked about, while they appear
38.6 in the world to be minor and small,
38.7 they are, in fact, great (and) glorious. I shall reveal to 38.8 you their mysteries. As for these Five Signs,
38.9 they are the mystery of the First Man, he who came with them
38.10 from the Aeon of Light. Also, after he completed
38.11 his struggle, it was with these good signs that he came up
38.12 (and) was received into the Aeon of Light.
38.13 The First (Sign of) Peace is the one that the Gods and Angels in the Land
38.14 of Light gave to the First Man when he came 38.15 out against the Enemy. The Gods and the Angels
38.16 went with him, accompanying him (and) giving him their (Sign of) Peace and 38.17 their might and their blessedness and their victory. This is the First
38.18 (Sign of) Peace which the Gods and Angels gave the First
38.19 Man as he came out from the Aeon of Light.
38.20 The First Right Hand is that which the Mother of Life gave the First
38.21 Man, when he came out to the struggle.
38.22 The First Kiss is that with which the Mother of Life greeted 38.23 the First Man, as he departed from her (and) went 38.24 down to the struggle. All the rest of the Gods and

38.25 the Angels who are in the Aeon of Light kissed him, as well as all the 38.26 … and shrines(?) of the Church and the Companions who 38.27 belong to the house of his people. They kissed him as 38.28 he was to depart from them. They escorted him, kissing
38.29 him with the kiss of love and affection.
38.30 The First Adoration is the adoration with which the First Man
38.31 adored him when he came [from the depth]
38.32 which is below. He bent his knee, [adoring]
38.33 the God of Truth and all the Aeons [of Light],

39.1 who belong to the house of his people, as he implored them for a power to 39.2 accompany him as he was leaving.
39.3 The First Laying on of Hands which the Mother of Life placed upon
39.4 the head of the First Man armed him (and) made him
39.5 strong. She laid hands on him (and) sent him into battle. He came 39.6 down (and) accomplished his struggle with the Great Powers and the 39.7 Enmity. By these Five Signs, by these Five Mysteries,
39.8 the First Man came from the Aeon of Light
39.9 against the Enemy. He humbled him (and) defeated him with them.
39.10 Also, when he came up from the war, he entered
39.11 the Kingdom of the houses of his people through these Five Mysteries.
39.12 The (Sign of) Peace with which [he came] up is the (Sign of) Peace which the
39.13 Call gave to him, when he was sent by the Father of the 39.14 Living. He gave him the (Sign of) Peace in the World of Darkness.
39.15 This same (Sign of) Peace with which he went down is 39.16 also the one with which he came up from the struggle. Thus, it is according to the
39.17 mystery of this (Sign of) Peace, which the Call gave to 39.18 the First Man, that the (Sign of) Peace is found down here, the one
39.19 which has been named and heard among the powers of the Father. The 39.20 second Right Hand, however, is the one which the Living Spirit gave the 39.21 First Man when he came up from the struggle. According to 39.22 the mystery of that Right Hand has this (other) Right Hand come into being.
39.23 It is the one which exists [among] the people, when they give it to one another,
39.24 which is honoured and [appreciated][37] among them. But, this second Kiss,
39.25 the one with which the [Father of] Life and the Mother of the

[37] See Polotsky/Böhlig note 24. Also, Funk, personal communication.

39.26 Living kissed the First Man after he came back
39.27 from the struggle, this Kiss is also found among the 39.28 people, when they kiss one another with it, or 39.29 when they depart and are far from one another, or also when 39.30 they approach one another in accordance with this mystery.
39.31 [The] second Adoration (is the one) with which the First Man adored
39.32 [before this][38] time the God of Truth and
39.33 [his twelve(?)][39] blessed Aeons and all the Aeons
39.34 [which exist in the][40] whole Great [World] of Light, when

40.1 the Father of Life and the Mother of the Living raised
40.2 the Man from the depth of the struggle. According to the mystery
40.3 of this second Adoration, has this Adoration existed. This is the one
40.4 that is found today among the people who adore
40.5 and honour one another. The second
40.6 Laying on of Hands is this, that after the Living Spirit had led the First
40.7 Man up from the war, he rescued him from all the 40.8 waves. He brought him up (and) gave him rest in the Great
40.9 Aeons of Light which belong to the house of his people.
40.10 He set him before the Father, the Lord of All.
40.11 Then, when he ascended to the great Father of 40.12 Light, a voice came to him from on high, saying:
40.13 "Set my son, my first-born, at my right, that I might 40.14 place all his enemies as a footstool under his feet."
40.15 He received this great Laying on of Hands, so that he might become leader
40.16 of his brothers in the New Aeon. Also, according to the mystery
40.17 of the second Laying on of Hands has the Laying on of Hands
40.18 existed. It is the one which is found among the people, when they lay hands on 40.19 one another, as the great give authority to the small. These Five
40.20 Mysteries, these Five Signs which existed first in the divinity,
40.21 they were proclaimed in this world through an apostle. The people
40.22 have learned them (and) set them in their midst. But[41] these mysteries have not 40.23 existed from the beginning among the 40.24 powers of Darkness. Also, the Light-Mind, which comes 40.25 into the world, it comes in these various forms. With these Five
40.26 Words, it chooses its Church. First and foremost

40.27 it chooses its Church with a (Sign of) Peace
40.28 and gives peace at first to people. If someone receives the 40.29 (Sign of) Peace and becomes a Child of Peace, afterwards, he is chosen
40.30 for the faith.[42] Thus, when he receives the (Sign of) Peace, he receives [the]
40.31 [Right] Hand and belongs to the Right Hand. Thus, when [he receives] the Right
40.32 Hand, the Light-Mind draws him to himself and makes him approach [the]
40.33 Church. With the Right Hand, he receives the [Kiss of Love]
40.34 and becomes a Child of the [Peace[43] . . .]

41.1 With the Kiss, he receives Adoration and adores the God
41.2 of Truth and adores also the Holy Church . . .
41.3 the hope of the faith of good things. When they
41.4 receive the (Sign of) Peace and the Right Hand, the Kiss and the Adoration, 41.5 at the end of these things they lay upon them the Right Hand of Mercy. They 41.6 too receive the Laying on of Hands, which will be laid upon them and 41.7 they will be set and built in the truth and made strong from it forever.
41.8 They come to the Light-Mind with these good signs
41.9 and they make people perfect and adore and 41.10 glorify the God of Truth.
41.11 Furthermore, at the time of their coming forth, when the Light-
41.12 Form goes out before them and spreads them out from the Darkness to the 41.13 Light and [is in them],[44] the Light-Form calms the 41.14 man with the Kiss and its rest from the terror of 41.15 the demons who destroy his body, by its likeness and its
41.16 image. The heart of the Elect which leaves his body
41.17 finds rest in it, and then the angel who holds the Prize
41.18 extends to him (his) Right Hand and draws him from 41.19 the depth of his body and receives him with the Kiss
41.20 and the Love. This soul adores its redeemer,
41.21 which is the Light-Form. But, at the same time
41.22 that . . . he perfects and increases according to . . .
41.23 . . . . . [and become king][45] in the House of the Living and the Gods
41.24 and Angels and all the Apostles, along with the Elect
41.25 and he takes the crown, the blessing,[46] and the glory in eternal life.
41.26 [Therefore], I say to you, my brothers and Limbs,

41.27 let there be these Five [Signs] in your hands, since they are honoured before
41.28 each one of you, which are the (Sign of) Peace, the Right Hand, the 41.29 Kiss, the Adoration, and the Laying on of Hands. This, which I have brought 41.30 to you from the House of the Living, from the Father who has
41.31 sent me. Know that a great mystery
41.32 … … him, by these Five Signs which I have brought 41.33 … … you will separate from the world, since
41.34 … … … you have known the first

42.1 (Sign of) Peace, the first Right Hand, the first Kiss,
42.2 the first Adoration and the first Laying on of Hands.
42.3 Therefore, let this Laying on of Hands be great among you who 42.4 honour and adore the Teachers, Deacons, and Presbyters.
42.5 Those who I have lain hands on, I have set upon them the great
42.6 Laying on of Hands, since they are established in a great mystery:
42.7 (that is) the Laying on of Hands of the Divinity is placed upon the 42.8 head of the Teacher. Therefore, he who rejects it and despises
42.9 it, and considers it nothing, he sins against God in a great
42.10 sin and also against me.
42.11 But, you, my beloved, be zealous in these Five

CHAPTER 10

ON THE MEANING OF THE FOURTEEN [GREAT] AEONS ABOUT WHICH SETHEL SPOKE IN [HIS] PRAYER

42.27 Again, the disciples asked the Apostle (and) said to him: We [implore]

42.29 [in] the prayer of Sethel, the first-born son of Adam, when he says,

[ON THE FIVE] GREATNESSES WHICH HAVE [COME] OUT AGAINST THE DARKNESS

49.13 [Again, the Enlightener spoke] to his disciples: The Light[76]
49.14 … … [the] Darkness, he conquered it with Five Greatnesses.
49.15 [The first Greatness] is the Father of Greatness, he who [exists]
49.16 [in] silence and secret, established in his Land
49.17 [of Light,] in his proper place. Four Greatnesses appeared
49.18 (and) came out from him. They were arranged in ten parts and were established
49.19 as a perfect twelve. The second Great-
49.20 ness which poured forth, appeared, (and) was manifested by the first
49.21 Greatness is the Mother of Life, the Great Spirit, along with 49.22 the First Man [and his] Five Sons. [These are the second]
49.23 Great[ness]. The third [Greatness is the]
49.24 [Beloved of] Lights, the Great Builder, the Living Spirit, and the 49.25 Five Sons of the Living Spirit. These are the third Greatness.
49.26 [The fourth] Greatness is the Third Messenger and
49.27 [the] Column of Glory, and all the powers of light that are revealed
49.28 [from him. These are the] fourth Greatness.
49.29 [The] fifth Greatness which came from the Father is Jesus the 49.30 Splendour and all his powers, which he called forth, his emanations which …
49.31 [are] poured forth (and) revealed by him. As for the fact that they are set forth
49.32 … … these Five Sons of the First Man

50.23 The coming of the Living Spirit, however, and the command he received
50.24 (and) with which he fell upon all the Archons, is different from that of
50.25 the First Man. His coming … the coming of the First
50.26 Man. The coming of the Living Spirit is like

51.7 … … and he binds them, chains them, and hangs some 51.8 … … and he acts towards them in this way by [righteous]
51.9 judgement [and he] kills them in order to flay their skin
51.10 … … that they be killed by slaughter
51.11 … … until they die. Those, however, for whom it is suitable 51.12 … … to remove them from their homes, he will

51.13 [remove them according to] righteous judgement, just like those who committed 51.14 crimes [(and) sinned against] the noble son. Also, the colleagues
51.15 [and the servants] of this judge, those who belong to 51.16 [him, in] great strength, suddenly and
51.17 quickly, they do the will of their lord.
51.18 Just as the pure judge was sent by 51.19 the king (in order to) recover this man, the
51.20 noble son, so too was the Living Spirit
51.21 sent by the King of Light
51.22 [to bring] judgment and to recover the First Man,
51.23 he against whom the King of Darkness sinned (and) committed crimes.
51.24 [He] sinned against him, along with his rebellious powers. When he[81] came,
51.25 he brought up the First Man. Also, all the Archons,
51.26 the Powers of Sin, those who committed crimes (and) sinned against the Sons
51.27 [of] the First Man, he judged them according to righteous
51.28 judgment. He bound them in the heaven and the earth. He placed each one
51.29 of them in the place suited to him. He measured each one of them 51.30 according to his cruelty and according to his humility. While some 51.31 of them he shut[82]
51.32 [in prison], others he hung upside down. Some 51.33 … … are crucified, while others (are made to)

52.1 sit down all the time. Some are fastened to 52.2 their companions, distressed by harsh bonds.
52.3 Others he has made wardens over one another,
52.4 among themselves, in order that they might do his will 52.5 to those that are under them.
52.6 Therefore, know, o my beloved,[83] that after
52.7 the Father of Life passed judgment … …
52.8 he revealed (himself) to all the powers [of Darkness (and)]
52.9 judged them like a just judge …
52.10 … … … …
52.11 [This] is the first judgment which the [Living] Spirit [passed] against the Archons
52.12 [concerning the] First Man. [To the First Man] he

52.13 awarded the victory according to his victory, while the [Archon[84] of Darkness]
52.14 he condemned according to the condemnation by which he erred …
52.15 … he sinned.[85] … Such a bond was found for him …
52.16 the earth until the end-time, when the [world] will be destroyed
52.17 and consumed by the great fire and separated. While [the]
52.18 Light (will) go to its own land, the Darkness (will) remains in 52.19 [the bond] and fetter forever.
52.20 … [As for] the advent of the Third Messenger, who came 52.21 [to inspect] those imprisoned in the Zone, he 52.22 is like a great king who comes and inspects his artisans
52.23 … … and …
52.24 … those who are good among the artisans and the builders
52.25 and the craftsmen who he assigns to each
52.26 place, seeing that they have done their work well
52.27 (and) attended to his works in their way, he rejoices
52.28 [greatly] … he thanks these craftsmen
52.29 who have fixed his things (and) [fulfilled] his orders.
52.30 Just as the great king comes and inspects
52.31 his works and his camps, so [too]
52.32 is the advent of the Third Messenger, [since]
52.33 after he comes, he too sees [his works]
52.34 fixed, accomplished, (and) … …

53.1 ranks of Archons, distributed and fixed
53.2 above and below, outside and
53.3 inside, with great skill, which his brothers had done,
53.4 who came before him to the struggle; those who fixed (and) created 53.5 the world before he had come. He saw the gods and the
53.6 angels standing firm (and) holding camp
53.7 … watching the entire Ruling Power …
53.8 … which the first powers had done,
53.9 [which are the] First Man, the [Living Spirit]
53.10 and [the] Great [Spirit, the] Mother of Life. Then, after he saw 53.11 them, that they [completed with] great wisdom all the works.
53.12 … … … they saw, he spoiled(?) …
53.13 … his [advent], by which he had come (and) [revealed]
53.14 himself. He said to the Living Spirit: The judgment you gave …
53.15 … good, what you proclaimed … …
53.16 you have [given] them accordingly because they have stirred (and) raised
53.17 those who were not worthy.
53.18 The advent of Jesus the Splendour, when he came … …

[84] A&C: ⲡⲁⲣ[ⲭⲱⲛ ⲇⲉ ⲙ̄ⲡⲕⲉⲕⲉ].
[85] A&C: … ⲁⲫ̄ⲛⲁⲃⲉ.

all, since he was like a man being [sent] to root out … … …
burn a hard reed[86] with fire. And so when he first cut the evil trees with his axe, he rooted [them] out … … …
and their bodies with his fire, so that they might not grow again
[from] now on, nor produce fruit, which the evil are to eat
… afterwards, [he] for his part planted his [good] plant, [the]
Tree of Life, which produces good fruit.
Thus, also, is it with the advent of Jesus the Splendour,
[which] happened in [this way]. For he also appointed himself
… … his power and his wisdom, in his
… … appointed(?) him king and saviour
… … in his glorious wisdom

he has destroyed them, bound them, and consumed them. Just as the fire burns and destroys trees, so too did he do his will in the Zone
with many powers, until he reached the fleshly form of Adam and Eve, the first human beings [and did] his will through Eve. He … [he gave] hope also to Adam and the good news …
… glorious, he went up to [the height] …
… [of] light. Then [the Call and the]
Response, the great counsel that came to the Elements, which stood in a mixture, he [combined with] them (and) established himself in silence. He takes up … [until the Last] [Time], when he will awaken and establish himself with the Great Fire and gather to himself his own soul and mould
it into the Last Statue. You (s.) will find him too, as he sweeps away (and) throws into impurity that which is foreign to him. The Life, however, and the Light which are in all things, he collects it to himself and gathers it on his body. When this Last Statue is perfect in all its limbs, then he will depart and ascend from this great struggle through the Living Spirit, his father, he who comes and destroys …
limb and brings it up from the gathering(?) … the dissolution
and end of all things. Now, his counsel, the Call and Response, resembles a stick of butter, (which) a person takes and puts it in warm milk. It melts and blends with this warm milk. It melts again
[in] silence and stillness amid …

[86] A&C: ⲓⲁϩⲕⲉ[ⲙ].

54.30 but, by the power and the taste of this [milk] …
54.31 drawn to it and fixed and makes the [milk cold] …
54.32 in … … and … … [this milk]

55.1 it throws it and casts it out. Also, the cream and the 55.2 fat and the beauty of the milk it draws to itself.
55.3 This is also like the coming of
55.4 that enthumesis, the counsel of life, which
55.5 is the Call and Response that came to the Elements.
55.6 That is, at the end it will awaken and establish itself and gather
55.7 together with itself all life and the light which is 55.8 [left] in all things. Placing them on
55.9 its body, it will gather them to itself …
55.10 … in his image forever … …
55.11 … … from this time. Blessed is
55.12 each one who [believing] in these Five Advents and strengthening himself
55.13 [in the] knowledge of them will ascend to the height and redeem …
55.14 … … and he is not counted …
55.15 … … … …

CHAPTER 18

[ON THE FIVE] WARS [WHICH THE] SONS OF LIGHT WAGED WITH [THE SONS] OF DARKNESS

58.4 [Again][87] the Enlightener spoke: The Sons of Light have waged Five
58.5 [Wars] with the Sons of Darkness, in which the Sons of Light
58.6 [have subdued the] Sons of Darkness completely.
58.7 [The First] War is the that of the First Living Man, he who [has]

58.18 As the Saviour said: Behold, the axe is at the root
58.19 [of] the evil tree, so that it might not produce evil fruit from now on.[89]
58.20 The Second War is the that of the Living Spirit …
58.21 … he established the works and the Worlds of Light.
58.22 He scattered the Archons (and) bound them in the middle …
58.23 … … the stars in the Eight[90] Earths …
58.24 in the Three Vehicles. For the Archons
58.25 rebelled (and) rose up against the Living Spirit. They wanted to

58.27 fetter them with harsh bonds. But he, the Living Spirit,
58.28 with many faces (and) a multitude of terrors, with many hands
58.29 (and) with great hardheartedness, [revealed] himself to them, 58.30 (and) imprisoned them with great skill. None among
58.31 them could be saved from his [great] bond and his fetter[91]

ON THE FIVE RELEASES: WHAT THEY MEAN

60.16 [Again,] our Father spoke: There are Five [Releases]
60.17 by which the Light was saved from all
60.18 [the Archons and] Powers of Darkness.
60.19 [The First] liberation and rescue is the First Man's.
60.20 For, when the First Man escaped from

60.22 him[97] … … …
60.23 the First Man, much light and [much] power
60.24 was rescued from the whole Ruling Power. They ascended
60.25 with the First Man to the Aeons of Greatness. This [is the First]
60.26 Release.
60.27 The Second Rescue is the Living Spirit's, for when 60.28 the Father of Life and the Mother of the Living established the

CHAPTER 20

THE CHAPTER ON THE NAME OF THE FATHERS

63.22 Again, the Enlightener spoke to his disciples: The [Father]
63.23 [of] Greatness, who is so named, why is he called "Father"
63.24 [of] Greatness? His disciples said
63.25 to him: We implore you, our Lord, that you clarify for 63.26 us concerning this Greatness, namely, what it means that he is called
63.27 "Father" of Greatness. Then, he spoke
63.28 [to] his disciples: The Father is the first established (being),
63.29 [who is called] "Father" of Greatness,
63.30 his greatness is the Great Earth, where he dwells (and) is established
63.31 … … the essence of Light, which supports
63.32 all the Rich Ones and Angels and dwellings
63.33 … … established upon him.
63.34 [Also,] the Third Messenger is called
63.35 ["Father." His greatness] is the Light-ship of the Living Fire,

64.1 [in which he dwells] (and) is established.
64.2 [Also,] Jesus the Splendour is called "Father" too.
64.3 His greatness is the Ship of the Living Waters, in which he dwells
64.4 [(and) is established.)
64.5 The Column of Glory [is also called] "Father." His greatness

71.9 comes to this time … … …
71.10 … … he revealed …
71.11 … … From the time that they
71.12 called him (and) he came, until the time that he, in turn, called 71.13 [the Five Shining Gods who] are his sons. They 71.14 too [also spent a long] time with the Father, that 71.15 [is, the time] that lasted from the descent of the 71.16 [First Man] to the ascent of the Last Statue. The 71.17 [Five Gods] spend a period of such length hidden in(?) the First Man.
71.18 But, [during the] time that they waited, they were called (and) came out.
71.19 Hear also this other thing that I will teach to you (about) the 71.20 time when the Mother of Life was called forth from the Father of 71.21 Greatness—Had she pushed herself and come down of her own desire,[106]
71.22 from the height of the Father to the earth, then [she would have spent]
71.23 [a thousand] years and many ten-thousands until she reached the earth.
71.24 [Though] there is no measure or limit to the height of the Father, [when(?)][107]
71.25 he called his Great Spirit, he thus set her on 71.26 the Land of Greatness through one of the three that belong to the twelve,
71.27 those who are hidden in the veil of light, who
71.28 are established in … the southern region.
71.29 [The] work of the Mother [of] Life is like this, when 71.30 [the Father] called her (and) established her in the place where he wanted
71.31 her to be established as the Thought of people, which 71.32 … … many and searched every place where 71.33 … … the blink of an eye or as a

72.2 … … This is also like …
72.3 … the Mother of Life in … when 72.4 … throw it … over to the place …
72.5 … he perfects his Great Spirit and sets her in 72.6 [the place where he wanted] her according to [his will].
72.7 … when[108] the Five Gods called by their Father[109]
72.8 [they stood] before him, as he wished, that …

72.17 … … he armed himself (and) bound himself to …
72.18 in one … of the silence on the edge of the earth …
72.19 He, too, the First Man, spent a long time
72.20 until he gave power to his Sons, until he bore
72.21 them. After his bearing of them, while standing in the
72.22 height between the border, he also spend time
72.23 in this way, like the number and quantity of rain-drops,
72.24 dew, and mist which falls in
72.25 the world. This is how he also spend time standing
72.26 between the borders until the moment when he descended to 72.27 the struggle.
72.28 When the Father of Greatness [called] the Great Spirit
72.29 and the First Man and the Glorious Gods who were destined(?)
72.30 to appear from him at this same time,[110] he 72.31 fashioned the Great Builder in the [Land of] Light [and]
72.32 the Living Spirit and the strong and efficient Gods which came [from]
72.33 him. Also at this time, he fashioned the Messenger
72.34 and Jesus the Splendour and the Virgin of Light
72.35 and the Column of Glory and the Gods who [came from them].

73.1 … the Father [shaped them(?)][111]

ON THE FIVE[126] [FATHERS: FROM WHICH LIMBS THEY HAVE COME]

76.18 Again the Apostle spoke about [the emanation[127] of the Five Fathers]
76.19 [from] the Father, one after the other. Thus he spoke: [the Messenger]
76.20 [came] from his Mind, the Beloved of Lights
76.21 [from his Thought], the Mother of Life from his Insight, [Jesus][128]
76.22 the Beloved from his Counsel, the Virgin of Light
76.23 from his Consideration. This is the way that [these Five] Fathers
76.24 were called (into being). These Five Advents came from the Five Limbs of the 76.25 Father. One came after the other (and) appeared in his time.

CHAPTER 27

ON THE FIVE FORMS WHICH EXIST IN THE ARCHON{S} OF DARKNESS

77.25 [Again] as the Apostle sat in the assembly, he said [to]
77.26 [his] disciples: As for the Archon, the leader of all the powers
77.27 [of Darkness], there are [Five Forms] in his body, according to 77.28 [the form] of the seal [of the Five] Creations which exist in the Five 77.29 Worlds of Darkness. His head has the face of a lion and 77.30 originated from [the] World of Fire. His wings and his
77.31 [shoulders] have the face of an eagle, according to the form of the Sons of Wind.
77.32 [His hands] and [his feet] are demons, according to the form
77.33 [of the Sons] of the World of Smoke. His belly has the face of 77.34 [a dragon, according to the form of the] World of Darkness. His tail [has]

78.1 the form of the fish, which belongs to [the World of the] Sons of Water. These 78.2 Five Forms[129] are found in him; they [have come] from the Five [Creations]
78.3 of the Five Worlds of Darkness. When he wants, [he goes]
78.4 [on] his two feet and … the World of [Smoke]
78.5 Also, when he wants, he [appears] to them as four[130] …
78.6 on his hands and feet[131] like [the] Sons of Fire.
78.7 When he wants, he lifts (himself) with his wings like the Sons of 78.8 the [Wind]. Also, when he wants, he leaps(?)[132] into the waters
78.9 [like the] Sons of the Water. Also, when he wants, he creeps on 78.10 [his belly] like the Sons of Darkness. [These Five] Forms exist
78.11 in him. There are also three other in him. [The First]:
78.12 … his powers … …
78.13 The Second: … …
78.14 his magic. When he [wants, he calls upon it]
78.15 [himself] and hides from his powers. [Also, when he wants]
78.16 he shows himself to them (and) causes wounds and [carnage with his]
78.17 magic. By the word which he utters on occasion, he does [his magic]

78.18 with it. The Third: His body is strong, so that all the …,
78.19 all the teeth and the claws of his powers may not pierce [him].
78.20 No body of iron and copper will be fitting for him nor[133]
78.21 will they imprison him, since he was created and fashioned 78.22 from the bitter Consideration of Matter, the Mother of the demons [and]
78.23 evil spirits. There are also three other (forms) in him. When [he wants]
78.24 his fire blazes and his whole body becomes like a [… of]
78.25 the fire. Also, when he wants, he sends out
78.26 frost and his entire body becomes cold like …
78.27 snow. The Third: When his powers [stand]
78.28 before him, he looks at them and knows what [is]
78.29 in their heart. He knows what is in [their heart]
78.30 and their face so long as they stand before him. [When]
78.31 they retreat from him and remove themselves from him [he does not]
78.32 know what is in their heart. There is no life [in him]
78.33 at all, but his life is the gall of [anger] and [poison,[134] which are visible]
78.34 in his face. By his terror …

79.1 of imprisonment(?) which stands before him. Behold, do not deliver
79.2 yourselves, my beloved, to the forms of this Archon, the root
79.3 of all wickedness, the bosom and camp
79.4 of every ugliness. But, you, keep yourselves
79.5 from him and his evil wisdom which dwells in your 79.6 bodies, lest they mix with you and they destroy your 79.7 gentleness and change your wisdom into a lie.
79.8 But be diligent and perfect
79.9 before the Mind of Truth which has revealed itself to you, that 79.10 you may … and be drawn up …
79.11 to the height and inherit [life] from [eternity]
79.12 [to] eternity.

[134] A&C: ⲙ[ⲛ ⲡ]ⲙⲉⲧϙ[ϒ.

CHAPTER 33

ON THE FIVE THINGS THAT HE CONSTRUCTED WITH THE HARD BODIES OF THE ARCHONS

86.22 Again, the Enlightener spoke: The Living Spirit constructed [Five]
86.23 Great Things from the veins, brains, [and] hard [bodies.]
86.24 The First is the disk which sits on [the]
86.25 shoulders of the Porter. The [Second] is the arch of [the]
86.26 column which is before him. [The] Third is the [shape]
86.27 of the form of gehenna. The Fourth is the [Seven]
86.28 Columns which he set up in the Great Sea in the 86.29 Seven Parts of the world. The Fifth is the Four 86.30 Walls which surround the passage.

CHAPTER 37

ON THE THREE ZONES

89.3 Again the Enlightener spoke about the Living Spirit: When he
89.4 built (and) constructed the worlds, he suspended the zones
89.5 in their zones within their zones again. The First Zone{s}
89.6 are (those of) the Five Powers of Darkness, male and female.
89.7 This (statement) that "he suspended a zone in a zone" (means that) he suspended
89.8 the Five Powers of Darkness in the Five Splendours of the Son of 89.9 Man. For the whole enmity is fastened and bound in them.
89.10 Also, within the zone are the Five Sons of the [Living] Spirit, 89.11 for the entire construction hangs on them as he
89.12 … … heard him too. The other …
89.13 … … after them. That he suspended [the zones(?)] (means that)
89.14 [he suspended them from the] upper firmaments [to the firmaments further down]
89.15 … … which is in a zone is the Great [King of Glory],
89.16 who exists … … within the …
89.17 … the world.

CHAPTER 38

ON THE LIGHT-MIND, THE APOSTLES, AND THE SAINTS

89.21 Again at one occasion, a disciple questioned the [Apostle],
89.22 saying to him: You have told us that the Light-Mind
89.23 is that which comes and supports the saints. [You have told]
89.24 us therefore that even though it is one of the gods …
89.25 … many gods are found in it. You have told
89.26 us also that at the time it enters into [the body]
89.27 of the flesh and binds the Old Man with its Five Counsels,
89.28 setting up its Five Counsels on him in the Five Limbs
89.29 [of his] body. Where is it [though], since the Old Man is bound in the 89.30 body? For, I (can) see that rebellions occur in its 89.31 bond from time to time. Secondly, I ask
89.32 you: If indeed it is a great god, unchanging and 89.33 immeasurable, how does it come to appear in the smallness of the 89.34 body? The third thing that I want you to tell
89.35 me [is this: If(?)] the Mind is holy and pure,
89.36 [how did it come to be joined to(?)] the impurity of this body?

90.1 Fourthly, if truly, the Light-Mind is present in [the]
90.2 saints, why does its likeness not appear to us as it
90.3 is? The fifth thing: I want
90.4 you to tell me (about) and explain your apostleship.
90.5 For, behold, it is not clear to me, since they oppress
90.6 you and persecute you in the world.
90.7 I implore you that you persuade me about these things which I have asked you.
90.8 Then he spoke to this disciple: My entire revelation,
90.9 which I have revealed, I have made it known to my Church
90.10 (and) it is true before you. One and the same is it everywhere. [What, then,]
90.11 are you missing?[135] This disciple said [to the Apostle]:
90.12 While indeed you have revealed everything (and) persuaded [us][136] that they are

[135] A&C: ⲉ[ⲩ ⲡⲉⲧ] |[11]ⲕ[ⲫⲁ]ⲣⲧ ⲙ̄ⲙⲁⲩ.
[136] A&C: ⲁⲕⲡ̣ⲱⲉ̣ [ⲙ̄ⲙⲁⲛ] ⲉ̣[ⲩⲟ ⲙ̄ⲙⲏ]|ⲉ.

90.13 true before us, nevertheless I would also like to get to know[137] the Light-
90.14 Mind as it is.
90.15 Then, the Apostle spoke to him: If I go on once again
90.16 to relate[138] to you these things that you are (already) versed in, they being true
90.17 before you, (then) by means of these things which you are versed in,[139] you will
90.18 come to know [what you are missing]. I will give the perception of those who perceive for your sake. I will let 90.19 the living fountain gush forth for those who thirst, that they might drink and live.
90.20 Then the Apostle said to him: All Error, when the 90.21 Enemy of Light established it, was established after the likeness of 90.22 a human being. The head of the cosmos is the edge of the garments.
90.23 Its neck is the collar[140] of the garments. Its stomach is 90.24 [the] Five Folds which are the … of the garments.
90.25 Its ribs are [all] the firmaments. Its navel [is the]

91.16 they are its soul and its life … …
91.17 is a sinful person … …
91.18 … the Living Spirit and the Messenger …
91.19 the Five Sleepless Watchers. He has …
91.20 the Keeper of Splendour, the Mind, which is … [in the]
91.21 [world] of the upper Mind. It has …
91.22 the whole … of the powers of heaven [which] in … …
91.23 the great King of Glory who is [the Thought found]
91.24 in the Seventh Firmament. He humbled … …
91.25 … also the Adamas of Light, who is the Insight …
91.26 in this mēte. He gave … because of the Desire of Matter.[145] [He has]
91.27 also placed the King of Glory, who is the Counsel …
91.28 the long-suffering upon the Three Images, that of wind, that of 91.29 fire, (and) that of water. He has given him the …

91.31 [The …] also of the Porter, who is Consideration …
91.32 [the] wisdom in the … which is above, he made him …
91.33 … … the foundation, [which is below] …

92.1 Again, the Messenger distilled from them the Five
92.2 Intellectuals of Life. Also, the Call and Response were set
92.3 in them, now making them six Sons of the Living Spirit,
92.4 along with six Sons of the First Man.
92.5 Again, the Messenger set in them the Great Mind,
92.6 which is the Column of Glory, the Perfect Man.
92.7 Again, Jesus the Youth was set among them, who is
92.8 the Image of the Living Word, of the Proclamation and the Hearing.
92.9 He strengthened these camps, above and below,
92.10 so that each one of them may secure itself in the circuit of its 92.11 watch-post, (and) so that rebellion and deceit might not occur in its watch.
92.12 Look, then, and see: The Keeper of Splendour stands in the
92.13 Great Mind, in the camp that (sits) above the prison
92.14 of those who are bound, so that he might bring to naught all the gloom of death.
92.15 But, deceit and rebellion occurred. Sin aborted,
92.16 [intertwined] with the soul, and mixed with the Light which was 92.17 freed by the image of the Messenger (and) went [up to] …
92.18 … [in the] Third Firmament, which is above the watch-tower

92.19 … the Keeper of Splendour. From this place, too, it intertwined
92.20 with the Light. It came out (and) went down
92.21 to the dry and the moist. It [fashioned] the trees [in][146]
92.22 the dry, while in the sea it took form immediately
92.23 and made a great rebellion in the sea.
92.24 Behold and see that the great King of Honour, he who is
92.25 the Thought found in the Third Firmament, he is [terrible]
92.26 with wrath. But, rebellion (still) [occurred], since deceit and 92.27 hate are found in the camp, (that is,) the Watchers
92.28 of heaven who came down to the earth during his watch:
92.29 they engaged in every act of deceit. They revealed the arts
92.30 in the world (and) unveiled to human beings the mysteries [of] 92.31 heaven. There is no limit to (the) rebellion and destruction (that) occurred on the
92.32 earth. The Adamas … …
92.33 … perfection, he stands on … …

93.1 and deceit occurred in his camp: which is, when
93.2 the abortions fell down, Adam and Eve
93.3 were formed and begotten, so that by means of them they might rule the world.
93.4 They accomplished all the works of Desire on the 93.5 earth; the whole world was filled with their Desire. By 93.6 means of this mēte,[147] they also persecute the churches (and) kill
93.7 the apostles and the righteous in the watch-district of the Adamas
93.8 of Light, from time to time throughout the generations.
93.9 Also, in the watch of the great King of Glory, he who is 93.10 the great Counsel (and) who has authority over the Three
93.11 Wheels, disturbance and tribulation occurred, since they …
93.12 the earth (and) disturbed the Three Earths. When the Messenger
93.13 revealed his image, the roads closed to their [escape(?)]
93.14 … their departure was hindered [when(?)]
93.15 the wind, the water, and the fire came into them.
93.16 Also, in the watch of the Porter, he who humbled …
93.17 rebellion in the lower depths … …
93.18 bent, the lower fixtures stripped … …
93.19 in the lower foundation. … …
93.20 Because of the earthquake which occurred in the watch of the Keeper
93.21 of Splendour, the Column of Glory came forth being … … and acted as 93.22 [a(?)] helper to the Keeper of Splendour. He bore all the 93.23 weight. Also, because of the deceit and the rebellion which [147] Meaning no known, but something like "leeway"(?).

93.24 occurred during the watch of the great King of Honour, (that is,) the
93.25 Watchers who came down to the earth from the heavens,[148] because of them
93.26 the Four Angels were commanded (to) bind the Watchers
93.27 with a bond forever in the prison of those who are black.[149]
93.28 Their sons were wiped off (the face of) the earth.
93.29 Since the abortions also came down during the watch of the Adamas
93.30 (and) begot Adam and Eve, because of this great deceit
93.31 and the mystery of evil, he sent Jesus
93.32 … the prayer of the Five Sons, he bore …
93.33 … the abortions, he fastened them beneath the
93.34 … the Mind of Adam.

94.1 Also, because of the earthquake which occurred in these Three 94.2 Earths, and because the roads ended (and) the fountains of 94.3 wind, water, and fire ceased, Jesus descended (and)
94.4 bore Eve. He made straight the paths of the wind, the water, and 94.5 the fire, opened to them the fountains, (and) constructed for them the paths
94.6 of ascent. Again, since the
94.7 earth which is below the Porter (was) stripped [of the] fixtures which 94.8 … indeed, because of this, Jesus came down to bear
94.9 [Eve.] Before he reached that place, he ordered (and) strengthened 94.10 the fixtures which are below, (then) returned (and) went back up to his
94.11 resting-place. Then the Apostle said to him:
94.12 See all these watches of the Zone, in which these great gods
94.13 are lords, watching over them … …
94.14 rebellion and deceit occurred in them. The …
94.15 … in them from time to time, in great humility,
94.16 until they humble the powers of enmity.
94.17 This is also how it is with the body—a great power dwells
94.18 within it. Even though it is small in its form, Sin nevertheless 94.19 dwells within it along with the Old Man, who resides in it. It is inhabited
94.20 by a very great wisdom, until the Light-Mind
94.21 finds the way to humble this body and drive it [according]
94.22 to its will. As in the watches
94.23 of his great brothers who are lords out in the Zone—
94.24 (that is,) the great body, (where) earthquake and deceit occur
94.25 from time to time—so too in the watch-tower of the

[148] According to Henning this passages represents a fragment from Mani's Book of Giants (W.B. Henning: Selected Papers II [Leiden: Brill, 1977], 135).

[149] See Polotsky/Böhlig 93.27. This passage is a puzzling piece of Manichaean cosmology, perhaps reflecting the influence of another (Enochic?) tradition.

94.26 Mind, which is the body of the flesh, does Sin raise
94.27 from time to time its agitations in the body.
94.28 But, in this way, know that the powers of Light
94.29 are good. The beginning and the end are revealed to them.
94.30 Everything they do, they do with correct judgement.
94.31 Because of this, they allow the enmity
94.32 to initiate Error and to do its will [for]
94.33 a while. Then, they are seized …

95.1 … they have acted first in righteous judgement.
95.2 But, as for this other (question), which you posed: How does the Light-
95.3 Mind come, this great strength, and endure such a small
95.4 body of flesh? Behold, again, and see these gods that 95.5 … they [are] great and strong, yet each one of them is limited (and)
95.6 confined in [the] place where it stands, like trees
95.7 cleaving to their taproot.[150] This also is the way that each one
95.8 of them cleaves to its taproot in the world, according to 95.9 [the] size of the place where he stands, enduring until
95.10 … the end[151] … But, know also
95.11 … … the world stands, being established …
95.12 … [the] Living Spirit in all his Limbs
95.13 … … Sin took this body away from the [Land]
95.14 [of Light and(?)] established it in his Limbs. It removed his [body]
95.15 [from the Five] Bodies of Darkness (and) established the body. His 95.16 [soul], however, he took from the Five Luminous Gods
95.17 (and) bound it to the Five Limbs of the Body. It bound Mind
95.18 in bone, Thought in sinew, Insight in vein, Counsel
95.19 in flesh, Consideration in skin. It set
95.20 [it] in its Five Powers: Its Mind on the Mind of the soul,
95.21 [its] Thought on the Thought of the soul, its Insight on the Insight
95.22 [of] the soul, its Counsel on the Counsel of the soul, (and) its 95.23 Consideration on the Consideration of the soul. It set its Five
95.24 Angels and its Authorities on the Five Limbs
95.25 [of the Soul], which he took (and) bound in the flesh.
95.26 … impregnating the soul, drawing it each time to 95.27 all (sorts of) evil works, to all sins of Desire, to the 95.28 worship of idols, to the Sects of Error, to 95.29 humility in the humility of slavery, as it stands serving
95.30 the foul things which do not last, worshipping

96.14 [releases] it from bone. It releases the Thought [of the Soul]
96.15 from sinew and binds, in turn, the Thought [of Sin in]
96.16 sinew. It releases the Insight of the Soul from vein,
96.17 and binds, in turn, the Insight of Sin in vein. It
96.18 frees the Counsel of the Soul and releases it from the flesh
96.19 and binds, in turn, the Counsel of Sin in the flesh. It
96.20 releases the Consideration of the Soul from the skin and binds
96.21 the Consideration of Sin in the skin.
96.22 This is how it releases the Limbs of the Soul
96.23 and makes them free from the Five Limbs of Sin.
96.24 These Five Limbs of Sin which are released,
96.25 it binds them. It establishes the Limbs of the Soul, builds them up,
96.26 refines them, and establishes them in the New Man, a son of 96.27 righteousness. When it fashions and establishes
96.28 and purifies the New Man, then it acquires Five
96.29 Great, Living Limbs from the Five Great Limbs
96.30 and places them in the Limbs of the New Man. It places its Mind,
96.31 which is Love, in the Mind of the New Man. Thought,

97.17 foolishness in these Five Limbs of the Body. [Just as]
97.18 the Spirit of Darkness is enclosed with them in a bond and in
97.19 a severe affliction, the New Man, on the other hand, rules
97.20 in his Love, in his Belief, in his Perfection, in his
97.21 Long-suffering, and in his Wisdom. Also, his king, who[158]
97.22 [is the Light-Mind], is king over all. It [rules over him]
97.23 [according to] its will. As long as the Limbs of Sin are bound[159]
97.24 in this way, Sin is contained. Even though the Light-Mind
97.25 [is] king, tribulation may still occur in the body from
97.26 time to time. Sometimes Sin rises
97.27 up in his Consideration and disturbs Counsel, and confuses
97.28 Wisdom and the understanding of the man and causes truth
97.29 to leave him in favour of doubt and to make statements (that) are
97.30 inane and without salt.[160] When the sign of his

98.4 Sin rises up again from Consideration to

98.13 … him and they quiet the … …
98.14 … they put him in his place again …
98.15 one another in his struggle. If, however, …
98.16 that place, then Sin rises up again to …
98.17 … and clothes him with Desire and pretension and
98.18 pride, and he leaves his Teacher and brothers.
98.19 He always wants to go in and out alone,
98.20 he wants to eat (and) drink alone, as a solitary. He 98.21 always wants to walk alone. This, then, is the
98.22 sign that the habit of his brothers does not please him. If he 98.23 [lets] his heart [succumb(?)] to lust, Sin will again raise 98.24 the Death-desire in his Thought. He … to
98.25 vanity and he gives up his faith and his truth leaves
98.26 him. When the sign of his foolishness
98.27 appears and his notoriety spreads though the Church, the
98.28 wise ones of the Church assemble so that they might strengthen his [heart]
98.29 and build him up in the rule[165] of God. (Then), if he has accepted [the]
98.30 advice of his brothers and heard the … …
98.31 and has turned away from his anger and … …,

99.1 (then) it is possible that he (might) live and conquer Sin and all its
99.2 wars. But if he does not strengthen this watch, it (will) come back
99.3 and put on and disturb his Mind, which was originally 99.4 at rest. It (will) disturb his love for his Teacher and his
99.5 instructor. It (will) remove from his heart the love for the Church
99.6 and fill it totally with hate, and all his brothers (will) become hateful
99.7 to him. His brothers and his beloved and his companions,
99.8 who love him, they (will) be like enemies to him.
99.9 Now, if[166] this man is disturbed in this way, and he abandons his
99.10 love and his desire to change himself, (then) this
99.11 man (will) become, in turn, a lost vessel and he (will) leave the
99.12 Church and he (will) reach his end in the world.
99.13 The Mind which was in him (will) be dispersed from him and return
99.14 to the Apostle who sent it. He becomes filled with evil spirits
99.15 and they play with [him], drawing him here and there, and he, in turn,
99.16 becomes like an worldly man, changing and being like a
99.17 bird plucked of its feathers {and becomes earthly}.

99.18 Behold![167] I have shown you (s.) and clarified for you (s.) that, just as
99.19 agitation occurs in the Zone, in the camps of
99.20 these great and mighty gods. So too
99.21 disturbance happens from time to time in the jurisdiction[168] of the
99.22 Light-Mind. Just as these watchers stand
99.23 [in] the Zone (and) are not visible, so too is it with the
99.24 Light-Mind, [since] it is not visible in the body.
99.25 Also, just as these outer [watchers] are great,
99.26 but bend (and) [bow] (and) shrink according to the size of the task
99.27 assigned to each one of them, so too is it with the
99.28 Mind. It too is great and exalted, but it has bent itself
99.29 (and) shrunk according to this small, repulsive body.
99.30 Just as the gods [in the] outer Zone are excellent,
99.31 pure, (and) established [in] the mixture of the All, and yet not polluted,
99.32 [so too does the] Light-[Mind] stand in its 99.33 … … … …

100.1 Behold the strength and the efficiency of the Light-
100.2 Mind: how great it is on all the watch-towers of 100.3 the body. It stands in its encampment (and) shields
100.4 every impulse of the body from the attractions of Sin.
100.5 It fixes them, scatters them, (and) sets them right
100.6 according to its will. It also does another excellent (and)
100.7 exceptional thing—it sets a great spirit on the 100.8 Elect. Indeed, you (s.) find him established on the earth, 100.9 rising in his heart, (and) going up to the Father, the 100.10 God of Truth, he who is established above
100.11 all the works of loss. It also rushes in 100.12 his Insight and his Consideration, and goes down to 100.13 the Land of Darkness, from which the Darkness has sprung.
100.14 His heart runs and meets everything, after having … them.
100.15 Then he said to that disciple: Behold![169] I have taught you (about)
100.16 the deeds of the Light-Mind. To the one who has 100.17 open and perceptive eyes it will be visible, (but) to the one who 100.18 does not have these eyes it will not be visible.
100.19 As for my work, which is [revealed] (but) is not clear to you—
100.20 the works that I have done—I am the one who will teach

100.25 both gold and silver, both brass … money and 100.26 numerous gifts, both armour and armaments, [the]
100.27 multitude of humanity have submitted to me—
100.28 many divinities and idols from the 100.29 furnaces. You have seen the [kingdom] of the world, how 100.30 with many graces and gifts, with 100.31 armour and war and [violence] they have hardly humbled the 100.32 cities and subdued the lands. [I, however, I have subdued]
100.33 without armour and without [armaments …][171] distant [cities]

101.1 through the word of God. In distant lands
101.2 they bless my name and it is glorified in all lands.
101.3 Know also this other thing that I will teach you: the 101.4 kings have striven with me, along with the princes and the 101.5 officials and their functionaries, so that they might destroy this truth,
101.6 (but) they have had no power over me in this regard. Now, if I am alone,
101.7 why did they have no power over me, namely, all those who strove
101.8 with me? The third thing is that [there is]
101.9 no one in the world who has given freedom to his children and 101.10 his brothers and his relatives (and) freed them
101.11 from the variability of all things just as I
101.12 have made all my sons free from every toil, and [how I have][172]
101.13 granted every freedom(?).[173] The fourth thing: I have [clothed] them
101.14 with the armour [of] wisdom, so that you (s.) will not find one single
101.15 person who will … and conquer them. Just as no
101.16 one has been able to conquer me in the entire world, so too is it
101.17 with my children. No one will be able to conquer them.
101.18 The fifth thing: I have chosen with my power this entire, great
101.19 election. I have given to my children my staffs of knowledge[174]
101.20 and the great fountains of wisdom. Because the previous[175]
101.21 apostles did not give their churches wisdom[176] as I
101.22 gave to mine,[177] I have strengthened my church (and) have left it
101.23 every good thing that is useful to it in every (sort of) work.
101.24 I have planted good and sown truth in every land, near 101.25 and far. Apostles and elders
101.26 have I sent to every land. Because the previous

101.27 apostles who went to them earlier did not accomplish what I have accomplished
101.28 [in] this past generation, save for Jesus alone, the son of 101.29 [the] Greatness who is the father of all apostles.
101.30 For all the apostles have not accomplished what 101.31 [I have] accomplished. Behold and see now how great is my 101.32 [power] and my diligence. For no one among the previous 101.33 [apostles, who appeared before me(?)][178] in the flesh was like me in 101.34 … … through me. For this great

102.1 door has been opened, which I have opened, to the gods and angels and 102.2 the people and all the spirits and living souls which are 102.3 prepared for life and eternal rest.
102.4 Then, when his disciples heard all these words which he had 102.5 proclaimed to them, they answered (and) said to him: Great 102.6 and strong are all these things which you have proclaimed to us; (things) which 102.7 you have done by your power and the power of the one who sent you. Who 102.8 could fully repay you for the grace which you have 102.9 done for us, except this one who sent you? But, this is the only 102.10 thanks available to us to repay you, (namely) that we strengthen ourselves in 102.11 your faith and keep your commandments and, moreover, that we be content 102.12 with the words you have proclaimed to us.

CHAPTER 39

ON THE THREE DAYS[179] AND THE TWO DEATHS

102.16 Again the Apostle spoke to his disciples:
102.17 Know! my beloved ones, that three great, mighty days
102.18 occur in the universe as well as two great,
102.19 bitter deaths. When his disciples heard (this)
102.20 they said to him: Tell us, our father, what are these 102.21 three great days or what are these two bitter
102.22 deaths. He said to them:
102.23 The first day is our Father, the Man—from the moment
102.24 that the First Man came down to the depth of the Darkness (and)
102.25 was submerged in it. (Then), the Living Spirit was sent(?), who went (down)
102.26 (and) brought him up. After the Man ascended, the Father of 102.27 Life and the Great Spirit set in order the affairs and the worlds
102.28 (both) above and below. Moreover, the glorious Messenger
102.29 came and boarded the Ship of the Day.
102.30 He revealed his glorious image (and) purified [the Light]
102.31 from all things. He journeyed through the heights of the 102.32 heavens, until the time when the world will be dissolved,
102.33 all things destroyed, the Great [Fire] unleashed,
102.34 and the Last Statue ascends. These three deeds
102.35 were begun on this first [day, when the First Man]
102.36 was sent along with his Five [Sons. The first death],[180]

103.1 however, is the Darkness, which mixed with the Five Sons
103.2 of the First Man. The second day
103.3 is when the Fathers of Light, who were victorious in the struggle,
103.4 will sit on their thrones in the New Age and dwell
103.5 on the New Earth. They (will) rule in the New [Age]
103.6 until the time when the Father will unveil his image
103.7 above them. It is necessary that they dwell[181] in the New Age 103.8 for the length of the first day that he spent [in affliction].
103.9 They will rule in this way and rejoice in [the New] 103.10 Age. The great third day [is when]

[179] The topic of the "three days" was, according to al-Nadīm, the subject of a chapter of Mani's work, Treasure of Life (Dodge, 798; Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 52).

[180] Something like "night" might make more sense here (Funk, personal communication).

[181] A&C: ⲧⲟⲩ(ⲟⲩ)ⲱϩ.

the Father will unveil his [image] over them …
… … and raise them up …
and take them into his hidden storehouse …
and give … to his soul. He will pour upon them …
his ambrosia and his sweet aroma, which will take away
all the tribulation that they saw with their (own) eyes, and give them[182] relief and eternal joy. When his grace satisfies them and he gives them his fruit[183] and they are renewed, he will then call them [in] peace and silence and perfect their substance [in] the same measure as his former aeons and reveal every power in its aeon, in its dwelling place. They will dwell in the New Age with their aeons. When they dwell with their aeons, they will become immeasurably rich for timeless eternity. From this moment on, they will not count this time among them, nor the number of days and hours through every generation, forever and ever. The Father will not be hidden from them from this moment on. Once he has been unveiled to them, he will [stay] unveiled forever. These are the three great days
[that the Father of] Greatness has accounted for in the reckoning of
[the number] of days.[184] The two deaths, however, which I have [proclaimed to you are these:

The first death is from the moment when the Light fell into the Darkness (and) mixed together with the Archons of Darkness until the moment when the Light will be purified and separate from the Darkness through that Great Fire. The remainder, which will be left over in it, will (be) built (onto) and add(ed) to this Last Statue. The second death is the death by which the souls of sinful people die, when [they] will be stripped of the shining Light which illumined
the world and they are, in turn, separated from the Living Air from which they received breath, and they are deprived of the Living Soul which
… in the world, and they are separated and swept away from this Last Statue …
… and they are bound in every limb
… … the woman(?)[185] will become … and …
their torture and their tribulation, because their deeds …

CHAPTER 48

ON THE CONDUITS(?)[186]

120.23 Again, the Enlightener spoke: Three conduits are found
120.24 in the entire Zone (running) from the depth to the height.
120.25 The first conduit is the root of all the higher powers:
120.26 those that are found in all the heavens; those that come down
120.27 (and) are bound to the lower earths. Since the lower earth
120.28 is the hide,[187] the garment, and the body of higher powers
120.29 in the heavens. For when the Father of Life
120.30 established the worlds of heaven, he stripped them of their bodies (and)
120.31 threw them to the lower earths. While the upper worlds
120.32 became psychic and pneumatic, the lower worlds
120.33 became somatic and carcass-like …

121.1 Because of this, he … the powers of heaven (and) sealed
121.2 it on their bodies and their carcasses that are in the earths, so that 121.3 when Life comes up from the fullness of these earths,
121.4 it may be completely drawn to the height through the roots of the heavenly, those 121.5 that are nailed in their bodies, and all Life will be distilled from these 121.6 places. The dregs, however, that is swept away from the purity
121.7 which comes up to the height, is left to fall down
121.8 into the channels(?)[188] of the conduits and flow down to …
121.9 and be thrown into the deep.[189] This is the first conduit, which 121.10 runs from the powers of heaven to their bodies and their 121.11 carcasses on the earth. (It) also (runs) from their bodies and [their]
121.12 carcasses on the earth to the powers of heaven.
121.13 The second conduit is the one that runs from the temples and the 121.14 dwellings and the cities in heaven down to

[186] The precise meaning of ⲁⲓϩⲙⲉ is uncertain.

[187] According to Theodore bar Khonai, the Living Spirit uses the flayed skins of the Archons, i.e., "their hides" (ܦܓܪܝܗܘܢ) (315.10 [Scher]) to construct the heavens and their corpses to construct the earths. This may be the idea reflected by the Coptic term ⲡⲕⲱⲕ ⲁϩⲏⲩ, which Polotsky/Böhlig translated as das Ausgezogene and Gardner as "stripping off."

[188] Even though the same word, ⲁⲓϩⲙⲉ, is used, it seems to imply another aspect of the "conduit."

[189] What is being imagined here is some kind of distillation apparatus.

the Five Kinds of Trees that grow upon the earth. Life comes up from the Trees to the temples and the cities. But, the Life and the Fire of the heavenly ones comes down to the Trees in their conduits. The third conduit, however, is all the powers and the companions who dwell in all the firmaments, those whose roots run down from them to the Five
Worlds of Flesh that creep upon the earth, fixed to one another.
While Power and Life gather together in the Worlds
of Flesh and go out from them in various forms, the powers of heaven draw it to them upwards through the conduits.
[The] dregs, however, and the desires and the evils and the wraths, which abound in the powers [of] heaven, they are poured their various conduits. They are poured into human beings [and] the rest of the beasts. When the heavenly cause the dregs, the stink, and the poison to flow down to the creations of flesh below, the creations abound
in desire, in wrath, (and) in evil
[through] the energy of their fathers on high.
The Apostle [spoke]:[190] As for the wheel of the stars. It does not have [a root on this earth] but its roots are bound in the
[All.] But, [the wheel of the stars], thriving on the Power and the Life that comes up [from] the earth through the conduits

and the firmament above, draws Life from these conduits that lead up to the firmaments and the worlds
of heaven above it, drawing Life from that place.
Then the disciples asked the Enlightener (and) said to him: If the wheel has no root on this earth, where then do the stars and the zodiacal signs find the power to become masters over these Five Fleshes and the Five Trees, even though you tell us that the wheel has no root? For you have told us that as everything diminishes on the earth, the powers above in the heavens gather it through a conduit. Also, we see that every thing which happens to a man—whether wealth comes to him or he is struck by poverty,
his sickness or his health—it happens to him
through the Zodiac and the stars under which he was begotten.
Then he spoke to his disciples: That which I proclaimed to you—that the wheel has no root—I proclaimed it to you correctly. It is certainly correct here, since when the [190] This may indicate an originally separate chapter.

122.19 Living Spirit, the Father of Life, established the heavens and 122.20 the firmaments above, he bound their roots together with 122.21 the earths below in their carcasses, which he had stripped from 122.22 them. But, after he established the wheel, he did not 122.23 bind its root to the earths, but rather bound the 122.24 root of the wheel to the sea-giant. Then, when the 122.25 Messenger came, he revealed his image,
122.26 purified and took [away] the light from all the heavens, then Matter,
122.27 in turn, which is found in all the Archons, leapt out
122.28 from them against the image of the Messenger (and) ascended
122.29 so that it might attain it, (but) it did not attain it. It turned and fell 122.30 down. Then, when if fell from the height,
122.31 it scattered itself into three parts. The first part
122.32 fell onto the wheel, another [part fell onto the earth, (and still) another]

123.1 one fell into the sea. [From][191] the part which fell to 123.2 the sphere, the roots were bound in the trees and (the) flesh.
123.3 Because of this, they took power and ruled in the Five
123.4 Worlds of Flesh and the Five Worlds of the Tree.
123.5 Through the nature (i.e., of Matter) that came down upon the wheel, 123.6 the root was bound in the trees. Also, through the abortions that 123.7 came down, other roots were bound in the flesh. Because of 123.8 this, too, the stars and the zodiacal signs took power over the trees
123.9 and the fleshes through the root of Sin, which fell down,
123.10 and the root of the abortions who were aborted and fell
123.11 down. But, these other conduits, which the Living Spirit
123.12 bound in the earths, those by which the soul of the Elements came 123.13 to the heavens, they are not bound to the wheel,
123.14 but are robbed from the powers in the wheel
123.15 to which they are attached. The disciples spoke to the 123.16 Enlightener: We implore you, our lord, that as you proclaimed
123.17 to us (and) gathered these words …
123.18 you have told us (about) the first kind of conduit.
123.19 The first is that which runs from the firmament to the earths and 123.20 that which runs from the wheel to the sea-giant.
123.21 This is only one, but the other root runs
123.22 from [the temples] the to the trees. The third (is) the one that is bound 123.23 by the abortions in the flesh. Also, bound in the flesh are the fathers of the 123.24 abortions, who are in heaven … and fettered with and those who 123.25 … We implore you, our lord, that you clarify
123.26 for us [which][192] conduit is it that surpasses its

123.27 [counterpart] … with more life and soul being drawn 123.28 [by it] than its counterpart.
123.29 The Enlightener [spoke] to his disciples: You have examined
123.30 … you have asked about this statement in greatness, great
123.31 … [the] earth, many lives come down
123.32 … … the Father of Life has drawn them

124.1 (and) fastened them from [every(?)][193] power. He bound them together with 124.2 the earths which are the roots
124.3 of every ruling power. These (are the conduits) through which the Life of the 124.4 Living Soul is drawn up, coming up from 124.5 the entire earth, from all the mountains, the fields
124.6 and the islands. Second to this first great root
124.7 comes the root of the trees, which was bound to the temples
124.8 and the buildings which are above. Then, since so much life
124.9 comes up from the tree and the whole cross,
124.10 being drawn from them to the height, (it is) like
124.11 a great host. But, the one which is reduced …
124.12 their conduits … taking up …
124.13 place (?)[194] the roots [on][195] earth. They are woven (and) knit [with] the 124.14 entire earth in all worlds. Also, those of the trees are found on 124.15 the entire earth, whether small or great. But the root
124.16 of people and that of beasts is[196] not found 124.17 on the entire earth, but only in this world of the 124.18 south. These fleshes do not yet make … in the 124.19 entire world of the south … there is a little
124.20 bunch of them in … … above
124.21 the world of the south in … …
124.22 also in their number beyond … … I have explained
124.23 to you about the roots [and those (things) that][197] are found in them. [I have]
124.24 taught you that they are bound in their [roots] …
124.25 together with one another. They move toward one another, drawing the 124.26 life from one another through the energy of the higher powers,
124.27 which move toward the nature which dwells in all of them.
124.28 But when they crush the Matter which is in [them] and

CHAPTER 57

ON THE GENERATION OF ADAM

144.15 Again, a Babylonian catechumen questioned the 144.16 Enlightener, saying to him: Speak to me, my lord, and 144.17 clarify for me about Adam, the first man. When 144.18 was he created, in what way was he formed,
144.19 or in what way was he begotten? Does[198] his generation
144.20 resemble the generation which is begotten today among 144.21 humankind, or else is there a distinction to be found between his birth
144.22 and what happens today? For, behold,
144.23 Adam was strong in his substance, great was his 144.24 size, (and) long were his years. He passed many years
144.25 in the world. But he is not the only one that we 144.26 have found to be strong, but also all the others who were 144.27 begotten in his generation. Long were their years also. These 144.28 people, however, who are begotten today, their substance
144.29 diminishes (while) their power and the remainder of their years wane. Why,
144.30 then, is the birth of those begotten today
144.31 different than that of the first … …

145.1 in his very place. Behold also the stars and the zodiacal signs, they remain
145.2 in their places. Why then has the life-span and 145.3 the years of these latter ones diminished and gotten shorter than 145.4 these ancients who are counted among this first generation?
145.5 But he, our Enlightener, in his deep wisdom
145.6 and his great understanding said to this catechumen
145.7 who had asked him: They increased and again diminished
145.8 because there are Five Types of Authority and 145.9 Guide set in the sphere of the Zodiac and the 145.10 heavens which are above it. They have ⟨Five⟩[199] Names, by which 145.11 they are called. The first name is the "year", the 145.12 second is the "month", the third is the "day", the 145.13 [fourth] is the "hour", (and) the fifth is the "minute." These Five 145.14 Places and these Five Dwellings are found in the sphere and 145.15 the heavens. These regions have Five Powers ruling over

198 A&C: [ⲁ]ⲣⲁ ⲟⲩⲛ.
199 See Polotsky/Böhlig, 145.10 note.

145.16 them. The ruler of the year is found there, (as is) the ruler of the month,
145.17 the ruler of the day, the ruler of the hour,
145.18 (and) the ruler of the minute; (each) one above his 145.19 companion. The one who is above in each case is lord over the one who is below
145.20 him. As to humanity, which is being begotten along with 145.21 the animals, it is by these powers that it is begotten; but they, these powers, 145.22 have authority from the beginning of creation to the end of the 145.23 world. At the beginning of the generations, it was the powers that rule
145.24 over the years that ruled. Because of this, the offspring
145.25 begotten in their generation and their era found their 145.26 years long, passing many life-spans in the generation of Adam and 145.27 that of Sethel, his son, as well as (the generation) of those who came after him.
145.28 After they ceased to rule, that is, the powers that ruled over the 145.29 years, the powers that rule over the months ruled in turn. Just as the 145.30 months are shorter than the years, so also 145.31 the life-span of the offspring begotten by them is shorter
145.32 [than the life-span of those begotten] in the generation of the powers who ruled

146.1 the years. When the authority of the powers who ruled the months
146.2 was finished, the powers of the days took power after 146.3 them. Therefore, since the days are shorter than the months,
146.4 so too was the life-span of the offspring begotten by them
146.5 shorter than the life-span of those begotten by the powers who ruled 146.6 over the months. Also, in the same way, the offspring who were begotten by the 146.7 hours as well as that of the minute, their lihme[200] are shorter than that of 146.8 the months and that of the days. The Enlightener spoke to this
146.9 Babylonian catechumen: Behold how the end
146.10 of the world is nigh! The life-span of 146.11 people is down to nothing. Their days lessen (and) their years
146.12 wane because the Life and the Light [which] 146.13 was in the world in these previous generations was greater than that of 146.14 today. Because of this, they are shrinking in their substance (and) their life-span
146.15 has become shorter. Again, this Babylonian
146.16 catechumen spoke to the Enlightener: I implore
146.17 you, my lord! Just as you clarified for me and persuaded

[200] Perhaps this means that the "conduits" through which life flows into every being are getting shorter or more restricted (Funk, personal communication).

me regarding the years—why the years of these ancients increased and why, in turn,
these latter ones decrease; you told me, also, that they have lessened in their substance (and) you said that all these ones lessen because of the Life and the Light which they received in the world—proclaim to us this other thing, by what sort of birth was all this offspring of humankind made by one man and one woman, Adam and Eve? The Enlightener spoke to this catechumen: You rightly ask about this matter, so know and understand it. For, just as these first generations were greater in their Light, purer in their substance, and also greater are their years, so too were their offspring more numerous than the offspring of this time.
They passed a longer time being … in [the] belly of their mother. Afterwards … …

conceived a multitude in a single womb. Sometimes they would beget five in a single womb. Sometimes they would beget six in a single belly—sometimes less, sometimes more. Because of this, the offspring of Eve and that of her children were more numerous and the earth was filled with them alone.
Since the offspring of the generation of the ancient people who were begotten in the world was much different than that of today, their conception and their birth does not resemble that of those born later, who are born today in the womb of a woman.
For those who are begotten today in these latter generations, standing small, they are crippled and, it is even as single ones that they are begotten in a single belly, barely two, more or less,
being ugly in their appearance, reduced in their size, and weak in their limbs. Their teachings and [their] thoughts are filled with evil. They are evil-doers. They are drowned.
They consume their life-span with suffering (until) death takes them quickly. After this catechumen heard these words, he adored and gave glory, saying to the Enlighterner:
I thank you, my lord, for you have satisfied my heart (and) persuaded me by making progress about these things that I asked you about.

CHAPTER 65B

(ON THE FIVE QUALITIES OF THE SUN)

161.31 Again, he added and said to his disciples:
161.32 [There are] Five Qualities in the Sun which it manifests
161.33 [every time][201] it comes into the world.

162.1 The first is its light, for it illuminates, by means of its light,
162.2 the world and all the creatures found in it.
162.3 The second is its beauty, because when it shines it
162.4 floods beauty and splendour on all creatures
162.5 and all things.
162.6 The third is its peace, because when the Sun
162.7 lights up the world, all people are greeted 162.8 by it and they offer peace to one another.
162.9 The fourth is the Life of the Living Soul, that it releases
162.10 from all bonds and fetters of heaven and earth.
162.11 The fifth: it empowers the Elements, and also gives 162.12 scent and taste to the entire Cross of Light. Just as you
162.13 can see that its light illuminates
162.14 more than all lights found in the world, so too is 162.15 its beauty more beautiful than the beauty of all people. Its peace,
162.16 too, surpasses all the powers and watchers that are found
162.17 in the world. Its liberation, with which it liberates
162.18 the Living Soul, is a full day more than 162.19 all the liberations. The power that is in its Limbs
162.20 is a great power and is stronger than all powers.

[201] A&C: [ⲛ̄ⲥⲁⲓ ⲛⲓⲙ].

CHAPTER 68

ON FIRE

166.19 Again he spoke: This fire that burns (and) is revealed to 166.20 today's world does Five Things.
166.21 The first thing that it does is this: It destroys
166.22 (and) burns wood and everything that is placed on it.
166.23 Second: It separates four properties from wood. These 166.24 are fire and light, ash and 166.25 smoke. Third: It gives taste and aroma to 166.26 what(ever) is cooked by it. It also gives warmth and 166.27 joy to who(ever) is brought near to it. The fourth thing that 166.28 it does: All craftsmen mould
166.29 the implements with which they fashion. Fifth:
166.30 It reveals light and people can see with its help.

CHAPTER 69

ON THE TWELVE SIGNS OF THE ZODIAC AND THE FIVE STARS

166.34 Again, one time as the Apostle [sat]

167.1 in the assembly, a disciple stood before him (and) asked
167.2 him, saying: We implore you, our lord, that you proclaim
167.3 to us and clarify about the twelve signs of the Zodiac
167.4 which are set in the Sphere. How are they ordered, or to which place do
167.5 they belong according to their nature? Or for that matter these Five Stars
167.6 that surround them, where do they come from, or why did the craftsman appoint
167.7 them as authorities and guides? He who is the Great 167.8 Builder, who established the whole of creation, he bound them (and) 167.9 closed them in the Sphere. We implore you, our 167.10 lord, that you satisfy us regarding these things which are hidden from everybody.
167.11 Then, he spoke to this disciple who had asked him: Both 167.12 these twelve zodiacal signs that he put in the sphere and these 167.13 Five Stars that turn above them, they are present in all the Archons
167.14 according to their nature. They are all enemies and adversaries to 167.15 one another.[202] They plunder one another through the activity of the Great
167.16 Builder who fashioned all the worlds. He set
167.17 [them] (and) bound them in the Sphere above, which always turns.
167.18 When it turns and moves them, they do everything
167.19 that pleases them above and below according to their will.
167.20 But, there is a governor above them, a debt-collector
167.21 causing them to act, coercing them, (and) taking from them what 167.22 is theirs. This, however, is how it should be understood: They 167.23 are drawn from the Five Worlds of Darkness, are bound in the 167.24 Sphere, and two zodiacal signs are taken per world. The Twin[203]
167.25 and the Archer[204] belong to the World of Smoke, which

[202] Written above line 15: "one is pressing the other; they are hung from one another" (Polotsky/Böhlig).
[203] Gemini.
[204] Sagittarius.

is the Mind. Also, the Ram[205] and the Lion[206] belong to the World of Fire. The Bull,[207] the Water-bearer,[208] and the Scales,[209] belong to the World of Wind. The Crab[210] and the Virgin[211] and the Fish[212] belong to the World of Water. The Goat-horn[213] and the Scorpion[214] belong to the World of Darkness. These are [the] twelve Archons of wickedness, those who wickedness does not
… … For it is they commit every evil and
… [in the] world, either in the tree or in the flesh.

Know, also about these Five Stars,[215] the wanderers(?),[216] how they are put in place. The star of Zeus is generated by the World of Smoke, which is the Mind. Aphrodite, in turn, came to be from the World of Fire.
Ares, however, belongs to the World of Wind. Hermes belongs to the World of Water, while Kronos belongs to the World of Darkness. The Two Ascendants,[217] however, belong to fire and lust, which are dryness and moisture, they are the father and mother of all these things. But, the Sun and the Moon, who are counted along with them,
{in the …}
[they are counted] among their race, but they are counted among them[218]
artificially, so that they might be ruled over. You will find them tormenting them
at every moment. These seven, which we have named—the Five Stars
and the Two Ascendants—they are the evil-doers who perpetrate every wickedness and evil in every single land, above and below, in every creation, in dryness
and moisture, in tree and flesh.
Again, I am revealing to you about these zodiacal signs: They are [205] Aries.

[206] Leo.
[207] Taurus.
[208] Aquarius.
[209] Libra.
[210] Cancer.
[211] Virgo.
[212] Pisces.
[213] Capricorn.
[214] Scorpio.
[215] Zeus = Jupiter; Aphrodite = Venus; Ares = Mars; Hermes = Mercury; Kronos = Saturn.
[216] That is, the planets.
[217] The anabibazontes, see discussion above.
[218] Inserted between lines 10 and 11 (Polotsky/Böhlig 168). A homoioleteuton seems to have occurred due to the double occurrence of ⲁϩⲟⲩⲛ ⲛⲉⲙⲉⲩ. See A&C.

168.18 distributed and ordered to four sides, three at each corner in 168.19 these four places. They are fastened to the Sphere that turns. The Ram, 168.20 the Lion, and the Archer, these three belong to one side.
168.21 The Bull, however, the Goat-horn, and the Virgin,
168.22 these three belong to the other side. But, the Twin,
168.23 the Scales, and the Water-bearer belong to another side. The Scorpion, 168.24 the Fish, and the Crab belong to another corner. They are 168.25 set in this way. They are fixed to these four sides (and) distributed 168.26 in the Sphere. When the side of the Ram,
168.27 the Lion, and the Archer is plundered by the governor
168.28 who is above it, who coerces it along with the guiding (stars) who 168.29 go above it, tribulation
168.30 overtakes every four-footed beast below this place.
168.31 But, when the [side] of the Bull,
168.32 the Virgin, and the Goat-horn is plundered, [tribulation]

169.1 at once comes to be in the herbs and the vegetables and 169.2 all the fruits of the trees. But, when 169.3 the side of the Scorpion, the Fish, and the Crab, is plundered
169.4 there will be a lack of water on the earth
169.5 and famine will occur everywhere. However, when 169.6 the side of the Twin, the Scales, and the Water-bearer
169.7 is plundered, deficiency and diminishment in the category
169.8 of humanity will occur everywhere.
169.9 Behold, I have clarified for you about these twelve
169.10 zodiacal signs, that they have been formed from the Five 169.11 Worlds of Darkness and bound in the Sphere. I have 169.12 also taught you about the Five Stars, that they too have come to be 169.13 from the Five Worlds of Darkness. I have proclaimed
169.14 to you, also, about the Two Ascendants, that they stand (according) to 169.15 the mystery of fire and lust, which is 169.16 dryness and moisture, the father and mother.
169.17 I have also revealed to you about the Sun and the Moon, that they are 169.18 foreign to them. But because of the (irresistible) force of the planned arrangement
169.19 according to which one thing takes on the other, and they are being plundered
169.20 them, that is why they were counted among them according to the numerical
169.21 value, although the Sun and Moon come from the Greatness, 169.22 (and) do not belong to the stars and the zodiacal signs.

CHAPTER 70

ON THE BODY, THAT IT WAS MADE TO RESEMBLE THE COSMOS

169.27 [Again], at a time when the Apostle was sitting in 169.28 the assembly amidst the congregation, he spoke to his 169.29 disciples: While the entire cosmos, above and 169.30 below, resembles the human body,
169.31 [the] makeup of this body of flesh (also)

170.1 resembles the cosmos. Its head resembles
170.2 by way of example the Five Garments. But, from its neck
170.3 down to the site of its heart, it resembles
170.4 the Ten Firmaments. The heart is there
170.5 in resemblance of the wheel of the Sphere that turns. From its heart
170.6 down to its mid-section, it resembles that air
170.7 which flows from the Sphere down to the earth. The male (part) 170.8 of the body resembles the Great Earth. From its 170.9 intestines down to its loins it resembles
170.10 the Three Earths. But, the shinbones of its foot
170.11 resemble the space where the Porter stands.
170.12 The soles of its feet resemble the Great Earth on which the 170.13 Porter stands and the Four Fixtures which are under his 170.14 feet. Its liver resembles the Vehicle of Fire.
170.15 Its flesh resembles the Vehicle of Darkness. Its 170.16 blood resembles the Vehicle of Water. In this way, 170.17 the small body resembles the great
170.18 cosmos in its firmaments, in its rank, in its 170.19 mountains, its walls, and its vehicles, as I have 170.20 revealed to you. Again, I am revealing to you
170.21 that there are Five Great Camps in this 170.22 great outer zone, over which the Five Sons of the Living
170.23 Spirit rule. In the first upper watch-tower,
170.24 the one in which the Keeper of Splendour rules,
170.25 the pinnacle of all things, his authority is placed 170.26 over the Three Heavens. Those that are under him are,
170.27 nevertheless, above the great King of Honour.
170.28 As for the second watch-tower, the one in which the great King of Honour
170.29 rules, his authority (is) placed over the Seven 170.30 Firmaments below him. As for the third watch-tower, the one over which the Adamas [has authority,][219] ruling from the firmament down to the [earth], it commands[220] according to his authority the Sphere and the worlds of air, along with the other four worlds, which are fixed on this earth. The fourth watch-tower, which the King of Glory possesses is the Three Wheels. But, his authority lays over the Three Earths which are over the Porter. The fifth watch-tower is the watchtower over which the Porter has authority, since he also rules, according to his authority, over this Great Earth, which is established on it, along with the Four Fixtures which are his feet. Tribulation has occurred in the Five Watch-Towers from time to time. In the watch-tower of the Keeper of Splendour, Sin wanted to gush forth against the image of the Messenger, but it was hindered at that place. He made it turn in shame.

Also, an earthquake and deceit occurred in the watch-tower of the great
King of Honour, that is, the watchers, who existed
when they … … they came down, namely, those who had been sent, until they were humbled. Also, in the watch-tower of the Adamas, the abortions came down (and) fashioned the
there was movement in these Three Earths, which are above
the Porter. The route and the ascent of these Three Wheels—(the wheel) of wind, of water, and of fire—were blocked. Also, in the watch-tower of the Porter, the lower fixtures were stripped off (and) their bonds levelled. A great earthquake occurred in that place.
[Just as] these Five Watchers are found in this great
[bond of these Five] Encampments that I have proclaimed to you, so too is it with this body, which the Elect bear. There are Five other Encampments

in it. The Light-Mind guards them along with the New Man who is with him. The elect person who dominates and humbles the countenance of his face, which is above his body, and guides it to the good, he symbolizes the mystery of the Keeper of Splendour who has power over the watch-tower above the Zone. He who rules

[219] A&C: [ⲟ ⲛ̄ⲉⲍⲟⲩⲥⲓⲁ ⲁⲭⲱⲥ ⲉⲕ].
[220] A&C: ⲉ[ⲕ]ϫⲓⲟⲩⲱ.

[over] his heart and humbles it symbolizes the great King of Honour who humbles the Seven Heavens. He who rules his chest and humbles his desire becomes like the mystery of the Adamas of Light, he who humbles Matter. He who humbles the stomach and rules the fire found in it, but also the purity of the food that enters it, he symbolizes
the King of Glory, he who turns the wheels (and) sends life upward. He who rules over the rank of the archons beneath his feet and binds it with the bond of peace symbolizes the Porter, he who humbles with his feet the lower abyss. Also, the teaching of wisdom, which circulates through this body,
symbolizes the Virgin of Light, who goes up
(and) comes down in the Zone that is above and below. Also, the Love and the Joy, the Faith and the Truth by which a person lives symbolizes these Two Light Ships. For, it is through them that the Living Soul ascends, is liberated, leaves the lower abyss, and attains
the upper height. Again, know this other thing, that there are Four Worlds in this Body of Flesh (and) there are Seven Archons in every one [of these Four] Worlds. The first [world is from its] neck upwards, but the Seven Archons that are found in this upper world, they are the two eyes

and the two ears and the two nostrils.
The other is the mouth, which is the taste organ.
[The] second world is from its neck down to its entire stomach, but the Seven Archons which are found in this second world, they are its two arms—
those that symbolize its two ears found in its first world above—and its two breasts, which symbolize its nostrils,
and the two eyes of its heart and the depth of the stomach
between the two breasts, which are in the chest symbolize the mouth. Again, there are Seven Archons in the third world of the body, which are the fat, the lung(s), the spleen, the liver, the gall,
and its two kidneys. Also, in the fourth world below, there are seven others in the same pattern—its two buttocks, its two testicles, its two loins,
and the member from which the seed comes, which begets
all the forms.
Again, the Enlightener said to those who were listening to him:

The

173.22 Ram, the Bull, the Twin, the Crab, the Lion, 173.23 the Virgin, the Scale, the Scorpion, the Archer, the 173.24 Goat-horn, the Water-bearer, and the Fish, these are the twelve 173.25 zodiacal signs that are found in the world of heaven, that are in the 173.26 Sphere, fastened and bound to this turning wheel, the one by which 173.27 they are forced, nailed, and planted. But, behold all these twelve
173.28 zodiacal signs, this is how they are ordered and made head
173.29 [and] … in the Sphere above heaven, which is the wheel of the 173.30 [stars]. This, then, is how they are ordered. They are ordered so that you might 173.31 find the head … and find the tail between one another.[221]
173.32 … … they also exist in this way, namely

174.1 those which we have proclaimed one after the other in this body. They 174.2 are counted among them in their sum and number from the head to the
174.3 feet. Its head is the Ram, its neck and its shoulders
174.4 the Bull, its two forearms the Twin,
174.5 its oesophagus(?)[222] the Crab, its stomach
174.6 [the] Lion, its heart the Virgin, the backbone of the
174.7 statue and its diaphragm the Scales, its chest
174.8 [the] Scorpion, its loins the Archer, its feet
174.9 the Goat-horn, its shinbones the Water-bearer, (and)
174.10 the soles of its feet the Fish. Behold (how) these too
174.11 are distributed among them. They are found in this body,
174.12 turned aside (and) bent like these twelve zodiacal signs.
174.13 They are ordered and spread among one another, the head
174.14 to the tail, just as they are in the wheel
174.15 … which is turned to heaven.[223] They, too, are counted among 174.16 the sum and number of the body and all its limbs.
174.17 But, what we have proclaimed—that they are turned to the side, bent, (and)
174.18 spread out—this is so, because from its head down to its
174.19 loins, they are counted six on its left, (and) six others on its right.
174.20 The six that are on its lower right are those which I
174.21 will proclaim. The right temple is the Ram, its right shoulder
174.22 the Bull, its right forearm
174.23 the Twin, its right rib the Crab,
174.24 its stomach the Lion, (and) the right side of its intestines
174.25 the Virgin. The other six which we have spoken
174.26 about, they are found on the left side, going

[222] While ⲫⲗⲁⲫⲡⲉ normally means "stomach," Böhlig suggested oesophagus (Speiseröhre) due to the fact that stomach comes next in the list.
[223] A&C: ⲉⲧⲥ[ⲓⲧⲉ].

174.27 from its loins to its head. Its left …
174.28 is the Scales, its left rib the Scorpion,
174.29 its left breast and its left kidney [the]
174.30 Archer, its left elbow the Goat-horn,

175.1 its left shoulder the Water-bearer, (and)
175.2 its left temple the Fish. This is the way that the 175.3 craftsman of the body ordered (and)
175.4 arranged (and) made them level to one another, head to [tail].
175.5 Again, he spoke: Hear this other word which I will proclaim
175.6 to you. Know that there are many powers found
175.7 in this body—these are the companions who are its leaders.
175.8 There are eight-hundred and forty myriads of Archons
175.9 ruling over the human body. They are distributed 175.10 (and) established four to a dwelling. The sum and 175.11 the number of their dwellings is two-hundred and ten myriads.
175.12 When all these Archons come, creeping (and) wandering
175.13 within the body, and they meet one another, they 175.14 break against one another and destroy one another and …
175.15 in them there. When powers … …
175.16 together(?) they leap out of the body in which a person is going to 175.17 dies, and they cause evil tumours and blows and burning wounds
175.18 on the body. Either they make him sick inside [or][224]
175.19 else they would come out upon him externally. These wounds
175.20 contract at first and pour forth their liquid.
175.21 They release their ooze until they contract …
175.22 … and the core is dug out of the wound. Afterwards,
175.23 their wounds are carved out and healed and relieved
175.24 at the site where they came out.

[224] A&C: [н].

CHAPTER 91

ON THE CATECHUMEN, WHO IS SAVED IN A SINGLE BODY

228.8 Again, this Elect spoke to the Apostle:[225] I have
228.9 heard you, my lord, say that there is a Catechumen
228.10 who does not enter a body other than this one alone. Rather 228.11 when he leaves his body, his soul
228.12 … in the firmament above and he journeys to the place
228.13 of [rest]. Now, I implore you, my lord, that you
228.14 open my eyes to the deeds of this Catechumen
228.15 who does not enter into another body—What kind are they or what is 228.16 his form or what is his sign so that I might 228.17 know it and tell the rest of my brothers, that they might proclaim
228.18 it to the Catechumens, so that they might be exalted by 228.19 this and ascend in peace to the Good?
228.20 Then, the Apostle said to him: I will open your 228.21 eyes to the deeds of these Catechumens
228.22 of faith, who do not enter into (another) body. The sign of 228.23 this perfect Catechumen is this—You find his[226]
228.24 wife in the house with him, dealing with him as if they are strangers.
228.25 Also, his house he treats like an inn.
228.26 He says, "I dwell in a house rented by days
228.27 and months." His brothers and his relations
228.28 are considered by him to be strangers attached to him,
228.29 journeying with him on the road, knowing that …
228.30 they will be separated from him and each one returns to [their own place].[227]
228.31 Gold, silver, and vessels of … …

229.1 house, they are considered by him (to be) like vessels on loan. [He] 229.2 takes them, and they serve him, (but) afterwards he gives them [to] 229.3 their owner. He does not place his trust in them or his wealth.
229.4 He removes his Thought from the world, and places his 229.5 heart in the Holy Church. At all times, his Thought 229.6 is set upon God. But, what's more than all that—229.7 solicitude, respect, and love for the saints who 229.8 are with him—he cares for the Church like [his] house,

[225] A&C: ⲁⲡⲁⲡⲟⲥⲧⲟⲗⲟⲥ.
[226] A&C: ⲧⲉ[ⲫ]-.
[227] A&C: ⲟⲩ[ⲉ ⲯ]ⲉ ⲛⲉⲫ ⲁⲡ[ⲉⲫⲙⲁ].

229.9 in fact more than his house. He entrusts all his wealth to the 229.10 Elect men and women. For this is what [the] Saviour
229.11 preached through the mouth of his Apostle:[228] From today
229.12 onwards those who have wives, let them become like those who do not.
229.13 Those who buy like those not buying, those who rejoice like those not rejoicing,
229.14 those who weep like those not weeping, those who profit from this world
229.15 like those not in wantonness. Those who … those which …
229.16 proclaimed, were proclaimed about these perfect Catechumens, 229.17 who depart from this body alone and return to 229.18 the height. They are like the Elect in their behaviour.
229.19 This is the sign of these Catechumens who 229.20 do not enter a body. There are others too who possess
229.21 self-control, [keeping] the flesh of every beast from 229.22 their mouths, being eager for fasting and daily prayer,
229.23 helping the Church according to their means
229.24 through almsgiving. Malice is dead in them.
229.25 The motions of their feet made it towards the Church more than towards 229.26 their home. Their hearts are upon it at all times. Their posture and 229.27 their comportment is like that of the Elect. They have stripped all the 229.28 affairs of the world from their hearts. But, this person,
229.29 with the mind set upon the Holy Church
229.30 … at every moment and his gifts and 229.31 … and his honour and his grace which benefits

230.1 his life, as he journeys with them to the Holy Church
230.2 along with those who come to the Church, whether 230.3 they are his children or his wife or one of his relations.
230.4 He rejoices greatly over them and he loves
230.5 them, sharing all his wealth with them.
230.6 Behold! This is the sign and the model of these Catechumens
230.7 who do not (re)enter a body. Like the "good pearl,"
230.8 which I described for you in the Treasure of Life—
230.9 it is priceless.[229]
230.10 So too is it for these Catechumens
230.11 who do not (re)enter a body. But, when they do leave
230.12 their bodies, they journey in their way and pass
230.13 on to a higher place and enter into life.
230.14 They are not, however, condemned and bound by the chains of the enemy, but[230]
230.15 they are purified in the heavens and plucked like a fruit

[228] See 1 Cor 7:29–31.

[229] A&C pace Böhlig: "die keinen Wert hat."

[230] A&C: Line 14 of manuscript was missed in original edition. Read and renumber accordingly: ⲙⲁⲩ[ⲧ]ⲁϧⲁⲩ ⲛ̄ⲧⲁⲩ ⲛ̄ⲥⲉⲙⲁⲣⲟⲩ ϩⲛ̄ ⲧⲙ̄ⲣⲣⲉ ⲙ̄ⲡⲭⲁϧⲉ ⲁⲗⲗⲁ.

230.16 that will ripened and be plucked from the tree. This is also how the
230.17 almsgiving that is passed on to the Elect resembles it
230.18 in many forms, purifies it, and enters into 230.19 the Land of the Living. This is also how the souls
230.20 of these Catechumens resemble it, those who do not (re)enter
230.21 a body. But, as for the matter of the Catechumens,
230.22 I have written it down in the Treasure of Life.
230.23 Just as they are freed and are purified one by one
230.24 according to their deeds, according to their approach to the Church,
230.25 this is also the way that their ascent comes closer to them,
230.26 their healing and their purity.
230.27 Therefore, it is also fitting for the Catechumen that he pray at 230.28 all times for repentance and forgiveness of sins from God
230.29 and the Holy Church. Because of his prior
230.30 and present sins, his deeds will be gathered together,
230.31 the earlier and the later ones, and allotted to him.

231.1 Then, after his disciples heard these words from him, 231.2 they blessed him and glorified him with great praise. They 231.3 said: You are praised, our father, (and) you are glorious. Blessed is 231.4 the hope that endures in us because of you. For great is the [wisdom]
231.5 that you bring to souls. For (to) the Elect you have revealed
231.6 the works and the commandments of the election
231.7 in which they will live. And even regarding the Catechumens, 231.8 have you not neglected them, but you have taught them in various 231.9 degrees,[231] stages, and steps so that they might rise
231.10 from them to the Good, each one according to (his) [ability], and 231.11 attain the Land of the Living.
231.12 But now we implore you, our lord, that you proceed and 231.13 preach to us about this matter that we have asked you about[232] and open 231.14 our eyes as to the people who become disciples[233] (and) …
231.15 and enter into the Church, [either] Elect or[234]
231.16 Catechumens. The former sins that they committed [in] the 231.17 world before they became disciples, where do they go? Since
231.18 there are some among them (who) formerly adored idols, worshipping
231.19 (and) revering the gods. Others also among them were firmly established
231.20 in the teaching of the Sects, blaspheming God.

[232] A&C: ⲉⲧⲁⲛϣⲛ[ⲧⲕ ⲁ]ⲣⲁⲩ.
[233] A&C: ⲉⲧⲉϣⲁⲩⲙⲁⲑⲏⲧⲉⲩⲉ.
[234] A&C: ⲉⲓ[ⲧⲉ ⲍ]ⲛ̄ⲉⲕⲗⲉⲕⲧⲟⲥ [ⲛⲉ] ⲏ ⲍⲛ̄.

They have also blasphemed other enlighteners, who are in the heavens.
Some among them also committed other sins: whether it be theft[235] or murder or adultery or …
the sin of magic or error of false witness or other … These are evident in the wicked works of the world in which people first [walked]. Then, when they[236]
hear the word of God, will they put aside
(their) prior sins or will they not?
[We implore] you, then, our lord, that you open our eyes
[as to this question] which we have asked[237] you and give rest to our hearts.

Then the Apostle spoke to them: Very great is this question
[that] you have asked me. I will reveal (the answer) to you.
[Know],[238] therefore, that every person who accepts the hope
[and the faith] has separated the Light from the Darkness, he has perceived
[the] mysteries of the Living Soul, he has received the right hand of Peace brought (by) the Light-Mind, who dwells in the Holy Church, and he has prayed for forgiveness of sins from the Light-
Mind. Know, therefore, that all his prior sins which he committed from the day he was born until the day that he accepts the hope of God (and) has removed his heart from all the Sects and the idols of Error, they are all forgiven him. He will not be asked about them from now on, nor will he receive retribution for them—if it is the case that he remains in his faith and [live] without committing henceforth these prior sins, which he committed. Afterwards, he has borne …
… … they have been forgiven him, they will not protect[239] him henceforth from all his prior sins.
Should he return again to his prior actions
and re-offend, then they will be counted against him along with all his sins, the former and the latter. He will receive retribution for all of them, since God granted him repentance and forgiveness from his folly, but he still did not persevere in the repentance that God
granted to him. But, had he persevered in the catechumenate
(and) in his faith and left all his prior deeds

[235] A&C: ⲏ [ⲟ]ⲩ[ⲭ]ⲓ[ⲟ]ⲩⲉ |[23][ⲡⲉ ⲏ ⲟ]ⲩⲫⲟⲛⲟⲥ.
[236] A&C: ⲉⲧⲉ[ⲟⲩ]ⲉ.
[237] A&C: ⲉ]ⲧⲁⲛ[ⲭ][ⲛ]ⲟⲩⲕ.
[238] A&C: [ⲙ̄ⲙⲉ].
[239] A&C: ⲛ[ⲱ][ⲗ]ⲧ.

232.26 behind him, then all his sins would be left
232.27 to him, whether he is an Elect in his election,
232.28 [or] a Catechumen in his catechumenate.
232.29 The one, then, who is a Catechumen, he will [stand firm]
232.30 in his catechumenate. The latter[240] sins [which]
232.31 he commits, they will be forgiven him en masse,
232.32 because of his fasting, and [his prayer and his]

233.1 almsgiving. Hear, now, how I (will) reveal to you
233.2 the works of the faithful Catechumens. The truly
233.3 faithful Catechumen performs his Fifty Fasts,
233.4 fasting on the Fifty Lord's Days of the [year].
233.5 He also retains their purity, restraining himself [from]
233.6 the desire for his wife. He purifies his bed by 233.7 abstaining on all of these Lord's Days. He (restrains himself[?]) 233.8 in his eating, and does not defile his food with the …
233.9 of fish or all the pollution of flesh and blood. Also, he [does not]
233.10 eat anything polluted on these Lord's Days. [He] also keeps
233.11 his hands from wounding or inflicting pain on the Living
233.12 [Soul]. Their prayers[241] are observed by him; he observes
233.13 them (and) comes to prayer daily—every hour (of) every 233.14 day. All these hours of prayer will be added[242]
233.15 to his fasting and his almsgiving, which he offers 233.16 every day of the year. Also every act of charity is added to 233.17 his goods: the fasting, which he performed, the clothing which he has given
233.18 to the Saints. They share a daily communion
233.19 with them in their fasting and their good(ness).
233.20 These are counted along with the others and one half of his works
233.21 are performed for good, the other half for sin. Truly, the sins
233.22 which he commits half of the year are 233.23 divided into Five Parts. Four of them are forgiven him by 233.24 the patronage of the Holy Church through the faith
233.25 [and the] love of the Elect. On the one hand because of this, but on 233.26 the other, because he is aware of the knowledge (gnosis)—he has separated the 233.27 [Light] from the Darkness (and) offered hymns and prayers
233.28 [to the] Enlightener from heaven. Also, the rest that he has 233.29 [taken] … this … Because of these good (deeds) that 233.30 [he performs], four parts are permitted him, four 233.31 … … sins that he has committed

240 A&C: ⲛ[ϩ]ⲁⲉⲉⲩⲉ.
241 That is, the prayers of the Lord's Day.

234.1 from the day that he became a Catechumen. As for the rest,
234.2 he will be questioned about a single part and receive
234.3 a thrashing[243] and an immersion, and is later
234.4 purified, either above or below. He is 234.5 purified according to the value of his works, and he is 234.6 purified, cleansed, and adorned. Afterwards, he 234.7 is fashioned a Light-image
234.8 and is drawn and elevated to the Land of Rest, so that,
234.9 where his heart is, his treasure is there too.
234.10 Until he becomes strong in his catechumenate
234.11 he will receive repayment for his good (works) in this way.
234.12 If, however, he should lie or turn away from the truth, then 234.13 all his sins will be counted against him again, the former and 234.14 the latter. The judgement [which] condemns his sins will be poured over him.
234.15 But, if he should confirm himself in his faith and 234.16 become strong in it, then a fate will be (assigned[?]) to him and he will come
234.17 back again, be just, escape, and save
234.18 his live in eternal life. At the time of his 234.19 departure, he will go and rest in eternal
234.20 life. When the disciples heard
234.21 these words of wisdom, they glorified their teacher (and) contemplated
234.22 the first Light, which makes wise through the Mind and the 234.23 richness of his knowledge.

CHAPTER 95

THE APOSTLE ASKS HIS DISCIPLES: WHAT DOES CLOUD MEAN?

240.16 Again, as the Apostle sat in the assembly of his 240.17 disciples, the sky was cloudy that day,
240.18 (so) he raised his eyes and looked at this cloud
240.19 (and) said to his disciples: This cloud, which appears
240.20 before you, as you look at it, I will reveal to you
240.21 and teach you how it ascended.
240.22 Know that it is stripped from
240.23 Five Places, ascends above this Great Earth, is then revealed 240.24 and is visible in the middle-air.
240.25 The cloud that ascends from the upper fire
240.26 towards the image of the Virgin of Light, which she 240.27 makes visible to it, its sign is the flash
240.28 found in lightning-bolts … passing away …
240.29 But it is purified towards [the image of the Virgin of][244]
240.30 Light [to whom] it becomes visible.[245]

241.1 … the Archons are stripped off of the lightning-bolts. They go out 241.2 and separate, but these angels are sent to 241.3 them immediately so that they might seize them.
241.4 Knowing that they never do good, (and that) every place that they touch
241.5 they cause death and ruin, when
241.6 the angels make for them and come beside(?) …
241.7 they flee in their distress before them and come [to]
241.8 what(ever) they meet and assume it. Like a 241.9 thief, (when he) is caught (and) flees from a man stronger than him, who 241.10 pursues him in order to overtake him. Now, these Archons
241.11 who escape to this cloud, they bear that 241.12 which they meet … … in …
241.13 it, which they do not … will seize
241.14 this little bit, whether a tree [that] they found
241.15 in the way or beasts or people. In short,
241.16 every place that they assume, they burn and

[244] A&C: [ⲡⲓⲛⲉ ⲛ̄ⲧⲡⲁⲣⲑⲉⲛⲟⲥ ⲙ̄]-.
[245] A&C: [ⲛⲉⲥ ⲁⲃⲁⲗ].

241.17 destroy with the fire of their bodies—that is the Archons, the 241.18 sons of fire, those who are stripped of the fire.
241.19 The cloud, however, that rises up from the 241.20 water and ascends to the Virgin of 241.21 Light, its sign(s) are this thunder and this noise which 241.22 is in the air in various forms and (which people) hear.
241.23 … when the Archons who belong
241.24 to those found in the cloud find time, they strip themselves
241.25 of this cloud,[246] flee from it and leave it behind
241.26 [them. But, their sign][247] is this, that in every place which [they]
241.27 [destroy] they make frost and hail and snow,
241.28 and they lay waste[248] to seeds and fruit and plants, and they 241.29 … every place [that] they destroy. Angels are also sent 241.30 [down][249] to seize them. But,

242.1 the angels,[250] while pursuing them in order to seize them, cause this destruction.
242.2 [The] cloud, however, which rises up from the wind,
242.3 comes up to the middle-air, towards the image of the 242.4 Virgin who makes it visible—its sign is 242.5 [the] dark wind that blows bitterly.
242.6 By these winds, however, and these storm, living beings
242.7 are purified in her. But, the Archons who are stripped of the wind
242.8 cloud descend from it, being secure in 242.9 their image. All these rivers and seas, which 242.10 they reach and attain, they make waves in them and 242.11 raise … and they … the ships and they
242.12 cause destruction among those who they destroy[251] and they seize them
242.13 and bring them … astray(?).
242.14 Also, the cloud that belongs to the Light, when they
242.15 are stripped of it … …
242.16 … … … the Virgin becomes visible.
242.17 sign(?) too … but its sign is
242.18 this—so that you might find it as it journeys in rest and calm.
242.19 Living beings are purified in it by rest and calm,
242.20 but the Archons that are stripped from it and run (to) every place[252]

242.21 to which ⟨they⟩[253] come, they leave … and take life[254]
242.22 from them … sent to them[255] and the angels
242.23 seize them. Also, the cloud that rises [up]
242.24 from the mixed air and comes up to [the image]
242.25 of the Virgin, its sign is this, that [their living beings][256]
242.26 are purified by it[257] in rest and peace. These Archons, however,
242.27 who are stripped of this cloud, they come
242.28 down from every place (in which) they are found …
242.29 They cause them(?) … …
242.30 The colour[258] … until [the angels come …][259]

243.1 they seize them and take them in their midst. Their strippings, 243.2 which are left behind at every place 243.3 that they reach, either the begetting of trees or the begetting [of] 243.4 flesh, they bear to the middle … withering(?), 243.5 they cause great danger, but (as for) 243.6 these Archons, the angels are also [sent] 243.7 to the middle and draw the Light from them and 243.8 throw the demons down to those Seven Pits, [which] (are)
243.9 beyond the Great Sea that is the passage of 243.10 the waters found outside of the cosmos.
243.11 Then, his disciples said to him: Open our eyes,
243.12 our Lord, to which place these Seven Pits come
243.13 down to. [The Apostle] spoke to them:
243.14 These pits and these roads [descend][260] until 243.15 they reach the lower earths, and [meet][261] the 243.16 feet of the Porter. Hear, also this other thing:
243.17 Sometimes these angels are dispatched to them
243.18 to catch the Archons. When the Archons …
243.19 because the angels pursue them, they approach[262] them …
243.20 those who are given the commands. But, these Archons
243.21 free themselves and bear
243.22 [the tree] and [the flesh] and swallow them in these two[263] offspring, 243.23 [that of the][264] tree and that of the flesh. The angels leave their

243.25 [these] Archons will be stripped of the tree and the 243.28 … … to them in their first

244.1 and they take the Light from those left behind.
244.2 But, they too throw them down to these Seven outer 244.3 [Paths] that are in the Great Sea, the place where 244.4 they threw these first ones. When they return to the middle 244.5 … come and bear the Light that is in them.
244.6 Behold, then, I have opened your eyes concerning this cloud, how 244.7 it ascends to the height and (how) the living beings that are purified in it.
244.8 I have also taught you (about) the Archons that are in it, how 244.9 they cause these adversities and how they are seized
244.10 and thrown into the prison below by the angels
244.11 who were given the command by the power of the Virgin
244.12 of Light, she who has authority over the entire Zone to[266] purify 244.13 the living beings that are in it. Then, after his disciples
244.14 heard [these things from him],[267] they glorified him, saying:
244.15 You … [(have) revealed][268] all the secrets, o
244.16 instructor of all revelations. We thank 244.17 you, our father, with great professions, since you have 244.18 opened our eyes concerning everything. You have given us great 244.19 [staffs][269] of knowledge, so that through them we might give discrimination

CHAPTER 100

ON THE DRAGON, THE ONE WITH FOURTEEN HEADS; WHAT IS IT AND . . .

251.29 [Again] one of his disciples asked the [Apostle . . .]
251.30 . . . . . spreading . . . . . .
251.31 . . . . . .
251.32 . . . . . .

252.1 The laws of the Magi say that there is a
252.2 dragon with fourteen heads holed
252.3 up (in his) lair, in Five Hollows! Now, I implore 252.4 you, my lord, that you open my eyes concerning this statement.
252.5 Is there really a real[270]
252.6 dragon who has fourteen heads or is there, rather, a spiritual 252.7 explanation? Then the Apostle said to him:
252.8 There is never any dragon in the flesh, nor does it have fourteen heads,
252.9 as the Magi claim. Rather, this statement is a [parable][271]
252.10 that they have proclaimed in [error(?)][272]
252.11 . . . the Magi did not know, however, the true
252.12 meaning of[273] all the statements that they recorded,
252.13 [supposing them] (to be) real.[274] This is also the way with this 252.14 dragon, which they . . . considering it (to be) a real
252.15 dragon . . . I will open our eyes
252.16 to . . . . . the dragon is the teaching . . .
252.17 . . . . . of the flesh . . .
252.18 . . . the fourteen heads, however, which are attributed to 252.19 the [dragon], they are like this: the seven senses that are found 252.20 on [the] head of the body, which are the two eyes with which 252.21 it sees, the two ears with which it hears,
252.22 the two nostrils with which it smells, as well as 252.23 its tongue[275] with which he selects and tastes

[270] I take σωματικόν here to mean "real", rather than "bodily" or "corporeal", states that imply real existence. The disciple seems to want to know whether such a dragon really exists.

[271] A&C: ⲟⲩⲡⲁⲣⲁ[ⲃⲟ] |[10][ⲗⲏ] ⲡⲉ.

[272] A&C: ⲟⲩⲙⲛⲧ[ⲡⲁⲣⲁⲡⲉⲛⲟⲩⲧ].

[273] A&C: ⲇ[ⲉ] ⲁ̣ⲑ̣ⲉ̣[ⲣ] |[12][ⲙⲏⲛ]ⲓ̣ⲁ̣ ⲙ̣ⲙ̣ⲏ̣[ⲉ].

[274] A&C: ⲁ[ⲣⲁ]ⲩ ⲉⲩ |[13]ⲱ̣[ⲡ ⲛ̄]ⲙ̣ⲁⲩ ⲁ[ⲡⲥⲱⲙⲁ]ⲧⲓⲕⲟⲛ.

[275] A&C: ⲡ]ⲉ̣ⲭⲙⲁⲛ̣[ⲭ]ⲓ[ⲧⲡ]ⲉ.

252.24 the various flavours that are found in every form.
252.25 [These are] the seven heads of the dragon, the seven
252.26 senses that (are part of) the human form …
252.27 … below. The seven of the body
252.28 are these: two hips,[276] two buttocks, [two …]
252.29 … Archon … …
252.30 … … … …
252.31 … … [the] seven [heads that]

253.1 above and below, they add up and make [four]teen 253.2 heads for the dragon. The Five Pits, however, which they 253.3 spoke about, in which the dragon is holed
253.4 up (and) spread, they are these: The first is [the] tongue,
253.5 the second is the lung, the third is the heart,
253.6 the fourth is the spleen, and the fifth is the [blood that] 253.7 flows through them. He also looks out from them [and]
253.8 reveals his image and his appearance from above
253.9 and below as he makes war [with]
253.10 his fourteen heads. He who recognizes
253.11 the dragon, which is the desire of [the]
253.12 body, struggles with it, conquers it, and kills
253.13 it in them, will thus [he be called][277]
253.14 the righteous one, holy and elect, a good
253.15 man. He conquers without suffering on the day [of] his 253.16 advent. Behold, then, I have taught you about the dragon, the 253.17 one with fourteen heads and his Five Pits,
253.18 in which he hides and conceals (himself), doing his will 253.19 from them at all times. Then this disciple said
253.20 to him: My heart is persuaded, my lord, by that which you have 253.21 proclaimed to me. You have taught me about the dragon, the one with fourteen
253.22 heads. Blessed is everyone in whom it is dead, killed,
253.23 or damaged. He will live forever and become a person who is victorious
253.24 in all his works.

[276] A&C: ⲧⲕⲉ[ϩ]ⲧⲉ.
[277] A&C: ⲛ̄[ⲧ]ⲓ[ϩ]ⲉ ⲉⲩⲛⲁⲙ[ⲟ]ⲩⲧ[ⲉ] ⲁⲣⲁ[ⲫ] ⲉⲩⲛ[ⲁ]ⲙⲟⲩⲧⲉ |[14][ⲁ]ⲣⲁⲫ.

CHAPTER 103

ON THE FIVE WONDERWORKS THAT THE LIGHT-MIND REVEALS IN THE ELECT

257.12 Again, the Apostle spoke: The Light-Mind
257.13 works Five Light-Wonders for the Elect. The first
257.14 sign is the Wisdom that the Elect preaches
257.15 and proclaims in all its forms, in all its kinds,
257.16 (and) in all its places. The second is Faith,
257.17 since after his preaching of Wisdom, he … the Wisdom[278]
257.18 preached and the others hear it and believe.
257.19 The third is [the] … … in his Wisdom
257.20 by his preaching, with which he proclaims Peace
257.21 to the assembly of his brothers …
257.22 [The] fourth is Love, because he loves Wisdom and the 257.23 brothers and sisters who sit in his [presence.]
257.24 [The] fifth is the terrible Severity of Judgement, with which 257.25 he separates those who have not received the hope[279] of God. Also, those 257.26 in error, whom he finds in the Church, he severely judges
257.27 them rightly on account of their foolishness.
257.28 [The] Light-[Mind] places these Five Signs in the New Man, 257.29 [whom] it has purified, refined, raised up, (and) 257.30 [saved] … Blessed is everyone
257.31 … … the Mind and is diligent in his Wisdom
257.32 … this other thing: These Five Signs

258.1 are established and perfected in him and perfect him so that 258.2 [he might] become a spotless vessel and a priceless pearl[280]
258.3 forever and ever.

[278] A&C: ⲉ[.] . . ⲭⲧⲁ … [. .] . . ⲁⲧⲥⲟⲫⲓⲁ.

[279] Here "hope" is synonymous with "message" or "gospel" (see Kephalaia, "Prologue" 7.18–8.7 and Kephalaia 371.6–30). Possibly a reflection of Syriac ܒܫܪܬܐ "gospel" from ܫܒܪ "hope."

[280] Compare Kephalaia Chapter 91 "On the Catechumen" (1 Ke 230.6–11).

CHAPTER 104

ON FOOD, THAT IT IS APPOINTED TO FIVE PRODUCTS IN THE HUMAN BODY

258.7 [Again] he spoke to his disciples: The food that 258.8 people gather together of every kind,
258.9 so that they might eat it and (have) it enter into the body, it breaks down into 258.10 Five Products. The first product is that which 258.11 comes out of the human being in amazement, raises in 258.12 the Mind, and comes out of all the limbs—it is without 258.13 measure. The second is that which comes out of the 258.14 human being in sound and word. The third is that which 258.15 leaps from them in power and diligence.
258.16 The fourth is that which is produced in the pleasure of desire 258.17 between male and female. The fifth is that 258.18 which is made and formed in the flesh and 258.19 is produced and issues from them—this is this corporeal
258.20 product. This product, which they produce, only its 258.21 parents know. Its affection and its 258.22 reason and its love they seek daily for 258.23 all time. The other four products they do not perceive,
258.24 nor do they pity them, since
258.25 they are not evident to them.

CHAPTER 107

ON THE KIND OF SPEECH THAT . . .

260.31 Again, he spoke about the production of speech, which [comes]
260.32 from the mouth and is heard with the [ears].
260.33 He said … … …

261.1 … and the throat draws it in, the tongue
261.2 is spread, the teeth cut it, and the lips [gather]
261.3 it together. Speech comes out through the power of [these Five] 261.4 Limbs and is heard outside. Just as 261.5 a coin that one (person) smelts, [another]
261.6 forges, and still another cuts as it is turned, another
261.7 puts a seal on it, (while) another wipes the sieve, [so]
261.8 these Five Craftsmen beautify and fashion [their]
261.9 coin, and it comes into people's use and becomes a good
261.10 by which they buy and sell—so too is this speech
261.11 fashioned and adorned by the Five [Limbs],
261.12 when it comes out (and) is heard by the ears [of]
261.13 others.

CHAPTER III

ON THE FOUR QUALITIES THAT ARE FOUND IN THE EYE AND THE FIFTH, WHICH IS HIDDEN IN THEM; TO WHOM THEY BELONG

265.13 [Again] he spoke: There are Four Qualities found in [the eyes][281]
265.14 of human beings that see, as they look at … …
265.15 [without][282] the four that are hidden in them … they belong …
265.16 While [the cold] that is in the [eye] belongs [to them, the heat(?)][283]
265.17 belongs to the fire. The pupil,[284] however, belongs to the Light-
265.18 Mind, which perceives what is hidden in all things,
265.19 since it inhabits the Living Air.
265.20 [Again] he spoke: Why does the pupil of the eye [see],
265.21 seeing during the day, but the approaching night it [does not see]?
265.22 Which mystery does this signify?
265.23 [This (thing),[285] which] you do not know, I will explain [it]
265.24 [to you.[286] The fact that] the pupil of the eye [cannot see at night]
265.25 [signifies the] mystery of the [First Man] …
265.26 … … is the door …
265.27 … … below …
265.28 … the other four regions. Since in the …
265.29 … … above, he has …
265.30 … … great … they have …
265.31 … … also that which comes down[287] …
265.32 … … the Living Spirit[288] …

266.1 [the] First Man has risen through him (and) has known 266.2 everything.

CHAPTER 112B

(ON THE FIVE THINGS REVEALED BY JESUS)

267.18 Then, after he had proclaimed this,
267.19 at that moment one of his disciples said
267.20 to him from among those standing before him: Tell
267.21 us, our Lord, and clarify to us this matter.
267.22 If this likeness of humanity does not belong to 267.23 God, as you spoke about, why did Jesus come into 267.24 the world, the Son of the Living God, reveal
267.25 himself (and) suffer tribulation and persecution, get hung 267.26 upon the cross (and) have his enemies commit against him the 267.27 torture and shame of their wickedness?
267.28 [The] Apostle [said] to him: Jesus did not come (and) reveal[289]
267.29 (himself) to the world because of humanity alone, but 267.30 [rather, before he][290] came (and) revealed (himself) on the earth, 267.31 [he accomplished first his][291] great and strong [works] outside of 267.32 [the great world].[292] But, when he finished doing his

268.1 [work] outside of the great world, he came …
268.2 [he sōrs][293] out with Adam and Eve (and) revealed [to them].
268.3 Indeed it was he who sent the Apostles for the Good
268.4 to every generation, and revealed to them Five Great Things:
268.5 [First]: He told them that they belonged to the race of Light.
268.6 Second: He revealed to them about the Aeons [of Great-]
268.7 [ness], how they exist, and he taught them about [the]
268.8 [nature][294] of Darkness, how it too exists.
268.9 The Third time: He proclaimed to them about the [Heroism][295]
268.10 of Light, how it overcame the power
268.11 [of] Darkness (and) defeated it.
268.12 Fourth: He taught them that he had come to the region of death
268.13 in their midst, which is the flesh, until he might benefit them and bring 268.14 them from the gate of hell below in which they

that the rebels will be bound by a great fetter, those who rebel against the Good and against the righteousness which has been proclaimed by the Apostle.

CHAPTER 137

ON THE FIVE TYPES OF BROTHERHOOD THAT ARE DISTINCT FROM ONE ANOTHER

338.22 Again, the Apostle spoke to his disciples …
338.23 as he was sitting among his community: There [are Five]
338.24 Types (of Brotherhood) found in the Church that I have chosen. The [first]
338.25 are the "brothers," the second are the "children," the [third are] 338.26 the "disciples," the fourth are the "day-labourers," (and the fifth are)
338.27 … (the "slaves")[296] … …
338.28 … which are in it … …
338.29 … the people of righteousness …
338.30 … … … …
338.31 … after he mad e it ready … …

339.1 … their [shadow(?)] is light in the Church …
339.2 … this way. The Light-Mind …
339.3 … which is their shepherd and separates them from …
339.4 … each one according to the hue that it …
339.5 … for they are like brothers, who do not hide themselves [from]
339.6 the task which is appointed them, but rather the task which [they]
339.7 are able to do in the Church, they really do it.
339.8 [The] "children," however, are those caring and wise people,
339.9 the craftsmen, those considerate people …
339.10 … every moment, as they preach the truth always, with 339.11 no falsehood in their mouths at all. Every single Church
339.12 in which a judgement is found, they do not … this
339.13 judgement, but rather they judge according to righteous
339.14 judgement. They do even more and seek God.[297]
339.15 But, they do not separate from him, since they are [his] "children".
339.16 [The] "disciples," too, they are honourable and 339.17 patient people, splendid sheep, who live in 339.18 wisdom, following their teacher in patience
339.19 … as they follow the foot-prints of their shepherd, who 339.20 [is a guide] for them toward (what is) good and useful.
339.21 [The "day-]labourers," however, are those people who stand in

[296] See 340.15. W.-P. Funk, Kephalaia (I): Zweite Hälfte [Lieferung 13–14] (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1999), 168 note line 338.27.
[297] Funk, personal communication.

339.22 righteousness according to three things: on account of the … in order to 339.23 … and on account of the clothing in order to acquire and wear,
339.24 and on account of bodily honour, since they are honoured
339.25 by empty praise until the time
339.26 … When one of these three [things] will be lacking,
339.27 [they …] and they flee and become strangers
339.28 … … … their guide
339.29 … … … …

340.1 But, [the "slaves,"] they are the people who reproach
340.2 … their spirit, which is full of vanity, as they …
340.3 … are heedless and cruel, not heeding
340.4 [their] shepherd. But, their sign is this: as long as …
340.5 … the rest, as they stand in the Church. But, when 340.6 tribulation rises against them
340.7 and persecution comes upon them, they attach themselves to whatever comes 340.8 to them immediately and carry it away by stealth and run away from the 340.9 Church, without anyone knowing, (and) become strangers to it, and 340.10 go to another foreign place—while the people of this place
340.11 do not know—so that they might do the will of their 340.12 desire. Because of this, I say to you
340.13 that blessed is every one who guards himself and does not accept 340.14 the type of these two foreign races, which are the 340.15 "day-labourers" and the "slaves" who are in the 340.16 Holy Church. Rather, he (should) receive … the type of these 340.17 other three: the "brothers," or the "children," or the "disciples,"
340.18 accepting their type so that he might live forever
340.19 in their (Way of) Life.

CHAPTER 146

THE OLD MAN HAS FIVE FOODS TO LIVE ON; THE NEW MAN HAS FIVE OTHERS

348.31 [Again] he spoke … … …

349.1 there is holy food with which the Holy
349.2 Spirit feeds his children, as he …
349.3 … through them in the holy images …
349.4 … … … …
349.5 [The] first food is the spirit, that [of the great(?)]
349.6 teacher, that of the leaders, that of the brothers, and that [of] the 349.7 sisters, which the perfect Elect see and 349.8 rejoice in.
349.9 The second food is the prayer that he (i.e., the Elect) prays
349.10 hour after hour.
349.11 The third food is the joy that he
349.12 proclaims hour after hour and rejoices in.
349.13 The fourth food is the preaching [that he preaches]
349.14 everywhere he goes.
349.15 The fifth food is a holy book that he carries
349.16 in his hand, either reading everything written inside
349.17 or listening to the one who reads it. Or, having read,
349.18 he gets others to listen
349.19 and finds the way to make them read it.
349.20 These are the Five Foods which the Elect
349.21 … practices and receives …
349.22 … … the food of life
349.23 … life through it forever.
349.24 Again, he spoke: Five Foods also come
349.25 [from] Matter, those on which it feeds …
349.26 … the image of the Old Man.
349.27 [The first] food is every sight of the world
349.28 the various … of pleasant forms
349.29 [that] he will see and rejoice at.
349.30 [The second] food is the evil discourses …
349.31 … the telling of holy myths
349.32 … and the lying speech (found) in
349.33 [them] … the statements and exaggerations …
349.34 … to proclaim, profiting them …
349.35 [The third food] is the beautiful work …

349.36 … … hou ıs of …
349.37 [The fourth food] is the food [of the world(?)]

350.1 which people eat and from which they are sated and rest.
350.2 The [fifth] food is the sexual desire
350.3 with which people fornicate.
350.4 These [are] the Five Foods of Matter which 350.5 … sin, (and) from which the Old Man
350.6 eats and becomes strong.
350.7 Blessed is every holy Elect who keeps his 350.8 heart from these Five Foods and the dinners of 350.9 Matter … all to snare and sin
350.10 … and drive him to their retribution and their 350.11 torment, under which they will (have to) suffer, that is, those who eat from 350.12 [them].

CHAPTER 148

ON THE FIVE BOOKS, THAT THEY BELONG TO FIVE FATHERS

355.4 Again the Enlightener spoke to his disciples:
355.5 These great writings that I have written for you, they are 355.6 gifts given freely to you by the Fathers of 355.7 Light.
355.8 The great Living Gospel is the gift
355.9 of the Messenger
355.10 The Treasure of Life is the gift of the Column of 355.11 Glory. The Pragmateia and the Book
355.12 of Mysteries and the Writing of the Giants, these 355.13 three holy writings which form a single one,
355.14 they are the gifts of the Light-Twin.
355.15 All the Epistles, too, that I have written to you,
355.16 from time to time, they are my gifts and my 355.17 presents. This is the good fruit that I have given
355.18 [to you] from the Good Tree.
355.19 [Be thankful], you yourselves, my beloved,
355.20 [be] encouraged by these good writings,
355.21 [those] which have been freely given to you by 355.22 [the Fathers] of Light. Receive them into your 355.23 [hearts] and believe in them. Write them on you
355.24 … memory, for you will …
355.25 [through them] to eternal life.

CHAPTER 165

ENVY EXISTS IN FIVE FORMS

409.10 [Again] the Enlightener spoke to his disciples: …
409.11 … … … …
409.12 … what is envy? …[298]
409.13 … … … …
409.14 … … … …
409.15 … … … …
409.16 … … … …
409.17 … … … …
409.18 … … … …
409.19 … … … …
409.20 … being wise in wisdom …
409.21 … Also, the third envy is …
409.22 … … … …
409.23 … … … …
409.24 … … … …
409.25 … … … …
409.26 … on account of what … envying …
409.27 … living in … …
409.28 … … … …
409.29 … … … …
409.30 ?
409.31 ?

410.1 either [in] the name of a teacher or because of a
410.2 disciple, either great or small …
410.3 Envy … … …
410.4 alms … … …
410.5 b rother(?) … … …
410.6 … … … …
410.7 … … … …
410.8 … … … …
410.9 … … … …
410.10 … … … …
410.11 … … … …
410.12 Behold, I have clarified for you envy (and) 410.13 its Five Forms … … …

CHAPTER 176

ON SPIRITUAL TRANSITION IN [FIVE(?)] FORMS AND THAT THROUGH WHICH THE CHURCH ADAPTS

452.31 Again the Apostle spoke to his [disciples who sat]
452.32 in his presence about the [transition . . .]

453.1 . . . done in the Church. He said [to them]:
453.2 [There are] Five Transitions, through which . . .
453.3 . . . transitions from [the] body.
453.4 [The first] transition: He passes from the body
453.5 of heaven and earth and the body of human beings. Afterwards,
453.6 he will come to this statue of humanity.
453.7 [The second] transition: He changes from the 453.8 . . . . . .
453.9 . . . . . bearing the body . . .
453.10 . . . the Catechumen.
453.11 [The third] transition: He changes . . .
453.12 . . . . . .
453.13 . . . riches and . . . . . .
453.14 . . . the world and his . . . . . .
453.15 . . . and the [just(?)] . . . . . his righteousness
453.16 he bears the body . . . their righteousness
453.17 . . . . . .
453.18 . . . . . .
453.19 . . . . . .
453.20 . . . . . .
453.21 . . . . . .
453.22 . . . . . .
453.23 . . . . . .
453.24 . . . in the place . . . from the . . .
453.25 . . . . . to the good place . . .
453.26 . . . . . the soul . . .
453.27 . . . . . in the resting place . . .
453.28 . . . The fourth transition . . . . . .
453.29 . . . . . pass . . .
453.30 . . . . . the life of the human being in . . .
453.31 . . . . . .

454.1 The . . . which it . . . . . .
454.2 . . . the entire profit that is polluted . . .

454.3 every … and earthen vessels and herbs …
454.4 … the vessel so that he may acquire it …
454.5 … … the quarrel …
454.6 … retum … …
454.7 … … … …
454.8 … … … …
454.9 … … … …
454.10 … changes … …
454.11 … rest … …
454.12 … … great …
454.13 … … … …
454.14 … … great …
454.15 … … … …
454.16 … … … …
454.17 … … … …
454.18 … … … …
454.19 … … … …
454.20 … … … …
454.21 … … … …
454.22 … … … …
454.23 … … twelve …
454.24 … … … …
454.25 … every … …
454.26 … … … …
454.27 … … … …
454.28 … a man, and he changes …
454.29 … … … …

455.1 … the New Man, who comes to him …
455.2 … he becomes a healthy man …
455.3 … and he does the will that his good physician
455.4 has prescribed for him, which is the commandment of [transition].
455.5 [He] becomes a solitary …
455.6 … as is written in the scripture.
455.7 [He said]: There are Five other Transitions,
455.8 through which the human being transitions in …
455.9 [of the] body. The first transition that [he experiences]
455.10 is [this]: When the time comes and he leaves his 455.11 body, he passes from the body of destruction,
455.12 from the image of flesh and blood, and abandons human
455.13 custom, he renounces all the mirages
455.14 of this world and enters into the presence of the Great 455.15 [Judge]. His deeds … him before
455.16 [the] Judge of Truth. The second transition
455.17 [that] he experiences: He passes from …
455.18 … … to the First Man …
455.19 … [the] Enlightener of the Night toward the place that …

455.20 … it receives him … …
455.21 … this Holy Church.
455.22 The third transition is this: He passes from 455.23 [the Enlightener] of the Night and goes to the place of the 455.24 Enlightener of the Day. He enters the Ship of the Day
455.25 … holy … of his riches …
455.26 … he has glorified(?) … …
455.27 … … again to the Ship of
455.28 [the Night. The fourth] transition: [He] passes
455.29 [from the Third] Messenger and
455.30 [transitions …] and goes to the place of the Great

456.1 [First] Righteous One. He reaches him and rests in himself …
456.2 … of the teacher. The Great First Righteous One …
456.3 … with the spirit of his brothers and they …
456.4 … and he reaches this place and rejoices for them.
456.5 [The last] transition is when he changes from …
456.6 … at the end time. On the day when the Father will …
456.7 [unveil his(?)] face and all the Fathers of Light
456.8 … to the secrets of the Father, this Elect
456.9 will also rise and all the spirits
456.10 of his brothers elect, and will come to the 456.11 Father, the God of Truth, and find rest by 456.12 their Father. They remain with him for all time, which …
456.13 they, too, the course will suffice for them. The …
456.14 … he will purify them and send them to peace [and]
456.15 rest, and he (will) raise them up and assign them [each]
456.16 one in his place. They (will) dwell in the Light [and]
456.17 live forever, [being] in the heart of the Father …
456.18 … These are the Five [Spiritual] Transitions
456.19 through which the spiritual person passes
456.20 from place to place. But whenever …
456.21 … and they reveal life in the presence [of the Aeon] …
456.22 … forever. Because of this, I say to you
456.23 that blessed is every faithful Elect [who knows]
456.24 that the commandment of this transition is great before … because 456.25 of it, he will become a perfect and thoughtful man, so
456.26 that he might perfect all the commandments …
456.27 and [become] free of fault …
456.28 … … … …
456.29 … the transition. Again [he spoke:(?) I implore you(?) my]
456.30 lord, that you tell me about and [open my eyes to]
456.31 the commandment of transition. The …

457.1 … … also transitions …
457.2 … … from … belongs to
457.3 [whose mystery]? Or does the testimony of this

457.4 [transition] …? Then the Apostle spoke to this 457.5 [disciple]: Rightly have you asked. I will tell
457.6 [you] … say …
457.7 … … … …
457.8 … … … …
457.9 … … likeness of the mystery of …
457.10 … … The soul also …
457.11 … … it will live …
457.12 … … … …
457.13 … the transition of … but …
457.14 … it will bear the earths and clothe them
457.15 … tribulation. … it will cast out in 457.16 … [Sun(?)] and Moon and bears
457.17 … … … …
457.18 … … spirit …
457.19 … … … …
457.20 … … it bears the …
457.21 … Again, it distils it and purifies the 457.22 … and it … and it transitions

APPENDIX

THEODORE BAR KHONAI'S RÉSUMÉ OF THE MANICHAEAN MYTH (ANNOTATED TRANSLATION)

Translated from Theodore bar Khonai's Syriac Liber scholiorum (ed. Addai Scher; CSCO 69; Louvain: Imprimerie orientaliste L. Durbecq, 1954, pp. 313–318), this excerpt, in spite of its relatively late date, is perhaps the most important secondary witness to how Mani likely conceived of his own cosmogonic myth, especially in terms of Syriac terminology.[1]

313.10 On his abominable teaching: It is, however, necessary that we set down
313.11 a little of the fictitious blasphemy of Mani the wicked in this book
313.12 in order to shame the Manichaeans. For he says that before
313.13 there was heaven and earth and all that is in them, there were two 313.14 natures[2]–one good and the other evil. The good 313.15 nature dwelt in the Realm of Light, and he calls him "Father
313.16 of Greatness." He also says that his Five Shekinahs dwelt beside him:[3]
313.17 Mind, Thought, Insight, Counsel, and Consideration.[4]
313.18 The evil nature he calls King[5] of Darkness and he says

---

[1] In the following notes comparative references will be made to the following English, French, and German translations: Yohannan (from Williams Jackson, Researches in Manichaeism, 121–154); Schubert (from Haardt, Gnosis, 289–295); Reeves (from Jewish Lore, 185–206); Reitenztein and Schaeder (from Studien, 342–353); Pognon (from Inscriptions mandaïtes, 184–193).

[2] ܟܝܢ ܚܕ̈ܐ.

[4] While the terms for the Five Shekinahs are notoriously difficult to translate, Burkitt suggested that they should be rendered as follows: sense (as in sanity or sound mind), reason (as in reasoning faculty), thought (or mind), imagination, and intention (as in will) (Religion of the Manichees, 33). Pognon translated: l'intelligence, la science, la pensée, la réflexion, and le sentiment; Yohannan: intelligence, knowledge, reason, thought, and deliberation; Reitzenstein and Schaeder: Bewußtsein, Vernunft, Denken, Vorstellung, and Gesinnung; and Reeves: mind, knowledge, intellect, thought, and reflection.

[5] Scher's text actually has ܡܠܐܟܐ "angel" of Darkness, while other manuscripts read ܡܠܟܐ "King," which is supported by other sources such as the Acta Archelai 12.4 and Kephalaia Chapter 6 (see Reeves, Jewish Lore, 201 n. 18). As Reeves points out, the epithet "Angel of Darkness" can be found in 1QS 3:20–22 (Reeves, Jewish Lore, 201 n. 18).

313.19 that he dwelt in his Dark Land with his Five Worlds:[6]
313.20 the World of Smoke, the World of Fire, the World of Wind, the World of Water,
313.21 and the World of Darkness. And he says that when the King of Darkness sought
313.22 to ascend to the Realm of Light, these Five Shekinahs stirred
313.23 and he says that the Father of Greatness then
313.24 thought and said: "From the worlds of these Five Shekinahs
313.25 I will not send from them to do battle because for tranquility and peace
313.26 they were created by me. Rather, I myself will go and do
313.27 battle." And he says that the Father of Greatness called the Mother
313.28 of Life, and the Mother of Life called the First Man,[7] and the First

314.1 Man called his Five Sons, like a man who puts on armour
314.2 for battle. And he says that an angel went forth against him, whose name
314.3 was Nhshbt,[8] holding in his hand a crown of victory. And he says 314.4 that he spread out light before him, i.e.,[9] First Man. When 314.5 the King of Darkness saw it, he thought and said: "That 314.6 which I desired in the distance, I have found nearby." Then
314.7 First Man gave himself and his Five Sons
314.8 as food for the Five Sons of Darkness, like a man
314.9 who has an enemy mixes deadly poison into a cake[10] and gives it
314.10 to him. And he says that when they ate them, their reason
314.11 was taken from the Five Shining Gods[11] and they became like 314.12 a man bitten by a rabid dog or snake (because of) the venom

---

[6] ,ⲙⲁⲑⲗⲁⲗ ⲣⲉⲛⲧ: Pognon: cinq mondes (Inscriptions mandaïtes, 184); Yohannan: "five worlds" (Researches in Manichaeism, 224); Reitzenstein and Schaeder: fünf Äonen (342); Schubert: "five Aeons"; and Reeves: "five Aeons." The translation of ⲕⲗⲁ as "world" is, however, supported by Coptic sources, especially Kephalaia Chapter 6, which uses the Graeco-Coptic word ⲕⲟⲥⲙⲟⲥ for the five regions of darkness. The fact that matter is so closely associated with the dark realm cannot really justify the use of a term such as "aeon," which in such systems is usually reserved for entities of the higher realm.

[7] Yohannan: "Primal Man"; Schubert: "Primary Man" and "Primal Man"; Reeves: "Primal Man."

[8] Both Yohannan and Reeves leave the name unvocalized, while Schubert translates "Nachashbat." This name is not found in any other sources, although the abjuration formulae attest the term στεφανοφόρος "crown-bearer" (Reeves, 201 n. 24).

[9] The ⲛ in this construction seems to be a "pronom annonciateur" (Costaz, 507). Yohannan and Pognon attribute the spreading out of light to First Man, while Reitzenstein and Schaeder, Hespel and Draguet, and Reeves attribute the action to the angel.

[10] Schubert: "in a kitchen."

[11] According to Payne-Smith ⲙⲁⲛⲁ means "guardian" (115a), while ⲙⲁⲛⲁ is not listed with a ⲉ. Why is this? Could there also be some sort of confusion or play on words with ⲙⲁⲛⲁ "armour" (115a), since in other sources the five sons are known as First Man's "armour"?

314.13 of the Sons of Darkness. And he says that when the First Man regained
314.14 his reason and prayed to the Father of Greatness seven times
314.15 and he called the Second Calling—the Beloved of Lights,[12] and the Beloved
314.16 of Lights called the Great Builder,[13] and the Great Builder called the Living
314.17 Spirit,[14] and the Living Spirit called his[15] Five Sons: the Ornament of Splendour[16]
314.18 from his Mind, the Great King of Honour from his Thought,
314.19 the Adamos[17] of Light from his Insight, the King of Glory from 314.20 his Counsel, and the Porter[18] from his Consideration. They came 314.21 to the Land of Darkness and found First Man
314.22 swallowed by the Darkness along with his Five Sons. Then the Living
314.23 Spirit called out with his voice and the voice of the Living Spirit became like 314.24 a sharp sword and it revealed the form of the First Man,
314.25 and he said: "Greetings to you, O good one[19] in the house of evil,
314.26 O shining one[20] in the house of darkness, O god who dwells in the house of 314.27 wrathful beasts who do not know their[21] honour." Then First Man answered

[12] ܒܚܒܝܒ… Yohannan: "Friend of Light"; Schubert: "Friend of the Lights"; Reeves: "Friend of the Luminaries."

[13] Yohannan: "Great Ban"; Schubert: "Great Architect"; Reeves: "Great Ban."

[14] Payne-Smith states that ܪܘܚܐ is normally feminine "except when used of the Holy Spirit" (533b), which reflects a theologically motivated interpretation of grammar. The Manichaean Living Spirit, rooted in early Syriac images of spirit, would have originally been conceived as feminine, since she is essentially an elaboration of Mother of Life, the second member of the first divine triad. The fact that the neuter word πνεῦμα was used in Greek created a gender ambiguity and an eventual shift in Coptic, in which it is considered a masculine noun.

[15] Theodore reports that the Living Spirit called forth "his sons" ܒܢܘܗܝ. It is not inconceivable that an eight-century author such as Theodore, accustomed to the theologically masculine interpretation of "spirit" would have naturally used the masculine suffix when referring to the sons. It cannot be assumed that this wording is taken verbatim from Mani.

[16] Yohannan: "Custody of Splendor"; Schubert: "Adornment of the Light"; Reeves: "Ornament of Splendour."

[17] Yohannan: "Adamas"; Schubert: "Adamas"; Reeves: "Adamos."

[18] Yohannan: "Supporter"; Schubert: "Bearer"; Reeves: "Porter."

[20] Yohannan: "the luminous one"; Schubert: "Creature of Light"; Reeves: "O Divine One."

[21] The manuscripts read ܒܝܩܪܗܘܢ, "their glory," which was amended by Lidzbarski to ܒܝܩܪܟ "his honour" (followed by Schaeder and Reeves), presumably referring to the Father. This reading, however, is also problematic since this is a vocative address to the First Man. Thus, it could conceivable be amended to ܒܝܩܪܟ "your glory." The original manuscript reading may simply imply that the beasts are without honour.

314.28 and said: "Come, you who bear the merchandise of peace."

315.1 And he said: "How fare our fathers, the sons of 315.2 Light in their city?" And the Call said to him: "They are faring
315.3 well!" And ⟨Living Spirit⟩[22] and Call and Response[23] joined with one another
315.4 and they ascended to the Mother of Life and the Living Spirit. And Living Spirit
315.5 put on the Call and the Mother of Life put on the Response, her[24] beloved
315.6 son, and they descended to the Land of Darkness to where First 315.7 Man and his sons (were). Then the Living Spirit ordered three 315.8 of his sons,[25] that one should kill and another skin the Archons, the Sons of 315.9 Darkness, and deliver (them) to the Mother of Life. The Mother of Life
315.10 stretched out the sky from their skins and made Eleven[26] Heavens.
315.11 And they threw down their corpses to the Land of Darkness and made Eight
315.12 Earths. And the Five Sons of the Living Spirit each
315.13 completed his task. The Ornament of Splendour is the one who holds the Five 315.14 Shining Gods by their waists and below their waists the heavens were 315.15 spread out. Also, the Porter is the one who bends down on one of his knees
315.16 and carries the earths. And after the heavens and the earths were 315.17 made the Great King of Glory sat among the heavens
315.18 and kept watch over everything. Then, the Living Spirit
315.19 revealed his forms[27] to the Sons of Darkness and from the light which had been 315.20 swallowed by them from these Five Shining Gods he filtered the 315.21 light and built the Sun and the Moon.[28] And (with) light that was left over from

---

[22] There appears to have been some confusion by the copyist here (?).

[23] Yohannan: "the Appellant and the Respondent"; Schubert: "the Call and the Answer"; Reeves: "the Caller and the Respondent."

[24] Yohannan: "her"; Schubert: "its"; Reeves: "her."

[25] ⲛ̀ϩⲙⲟⲩ ⲛ̀ⲥⲁⲗⲓ is interpreted by Yohannan, Schubert, and Reeves to mean "three of his sons" since it is clear that Living Spirit has five sons.

[26] Other sources indicated that "ten heavens" should be read instead.

[27] This perhaps indicates the same gender ambiguity as with the Third Messenger who reveals male and female aspects.

[28] Yohannan: "and the light (of the Stars) more than a thousand"; Schubert: "and over a thousand stars."

315.22 (the making of) the vessels she[29] made the wheels:[30] wind and water and fire. He 315.23 descended and forged them beneath the Porter. The King of Glory called 315.24 and raised above them a bed(?) so that they might ascend over those 315.25 Archons who are subdued by the earths that they might serve the Five 315.26 Shining Gods without being burned by the venom of the Archons.
315.27 And he says that the Mother of Life, First Man, and the Living Spirit
315.28 rose in prayer and asked of the Father of Greatness

316.1 and the Father of Greatness heard them and called the Third Evocation—
316.2 the Messenger. And the Messenger called Twelve Virgins,[31]
316.3 with their garments, their crowns, and their attributes: the first is 316.4 majesty, the second wisdom, the third victory,
316.5 the fourth persuasion, the fifth chastity, the sixth truth,
316.6 the seventh faith, the eighth patience, the ninth
316.7 uprightness, the tenth grace, the eleventh justice,
316.8 (and) the twelfth light. And when the Messenger came to those 316.9 vessels, he commanded three servants to make the vessels move.
316.10 The Great Builder he commanded to build a New Earth and Three 316.11 Vessels[32] to ascend. And when the ships went and reached the middle 316.12 of heaven, then the Messenger revealed his images, male and female,
316.13 and was manifested to all the Archons, the Sons of Darkness, male
316.14 and female. At the appearance of the Messenger, who was beautiful in his forms,
316.15 all the Archons were inflamed with lust, the males
316.16 for the image of the female, and the females for the image of the male.
316.17 They began to expel through their lust the light which they had swallowed from 316.18 the Five Shining Gods. Then the sin which was in them
316.19 conspired and like a hair in dough it mixed itself
316.20 with the {light}[33] which came out of the Archons and it sought
316.21 to enter in. Then, the Messenger concealed his image and separated

---

[29] This feminine verb form supports the idea that the Living Spirit was conceived as a feminine being by early Manichaeans.

[30] Yohannan and Reeves translate "wheels"; Schaeder Sphären; Pognon vases.

[31] According to Reeves, the Twelve Virgins are identified with the twelve signs of the Zodiac (Jewish Lore, 204 n. 46), yet this needs to be reconciled with the depiction of the Zodiac found in the Kephalaia (see Chapter 3 above).

[32] Both Yohannan and Reeves have translated "wheels" for ܓܠ̈ܓ̈ "wheels" (see Payne-Smith, 3a).

[33] All manuscripts read ܢܝܗܪܐ "moon," which has been corrected to "light" ܢܝܗܝܠܐ by most commentators (Yohannan, 245; Reeves, 204 n. 48).

316.22 the light of the Five Shining Gods and the sin which (was) in them.
316.23 It (i.e., sin) then fell onto the Archons from whom it had fallen, but they did not 316.24 accept it, like a person who recoils from his vomit. It (i.e., sin) then fell down to 316.25 the earth, half on the moist (part) and half on the dry, and it became 316.26 a hateful animal in the image of the King of Darkness. The Adamos of Light
316.27 was sent against her, made war with her
316.28 and defeated her. He turned her on her back, struck her heart with a spear,[34]

317.1 and threw his shield on her mouth. He set one of his feet on 317.2 her thigh and another on her chest. That (part) which fell on dry land
317.3 sprouted itself into Five Trees. He says that these Daughters of 317.4 Darkness were pregnant from before by their natures
317.5 and because of the beauty of the Messenger's form which they saw, they 317.6 miscarried their foetuses[35] and they fell to the earth. They ate the seeds of the 317.7 trees. The abortions counselled with one another and remembered the form
317.8 of the Messenger which they had seen and said: "Where is the form that we saw?"
317.9 Then, Ashqalun, the son of the King of Darkness, said to the abortions: "Give 317.10 me your sons and your daughters and I will make you
317.11 a form like the one you saw." They brought (them) and gave (them) to him. He ate
317.12 the males and gave the females to Namrael,[36] his companion.
317.13 Namrael and Ashqalun then united with one another and she conceived
317.14 and gave birth to a son, and named him Adam. She conceived (again) and 317.15 gave birth to a daughter, and named her Eve. He says that Jesus the Splendour
317.16 came to Adam, the innocent, and awoke him from the sleep

[34] Manuscript reads ⲥⲁⲓⲁⲣⲧⲏ "aorta," corrected to ⲥⲁⲗⲓⲟⲩ "spear" by Cumont (See Scher 316 n. 8).

[35] Could there be a play on words here between ⲥⲁⲁⲩ "foetus" and ⲥⲁⲁⲩ "iniquity" (Payne-Smith, 405a)?

[36] There are a number of variants for the name of Ashqalun's consort (See Scher, 317 n. 4, Yohannan, 249 n. 118, Reeves, 204 n. 53), although Namrael has been adopted as standard.

317.17 of death, so that he might be delivered from many (evil) spirit(s).[37] Just as 317.18 a righteous person finds someone possessed by a mighty demon
317.19 and calms him with his skill, thus also was Adam
317.20 when the Beloved found him lying in a deep
317.21 sleep. He awoke him and held him and shook him and expelled from him
317.22 the deceptive demon and bound from him the great 317.23 Archonic power. Then Adam examined himself and recognized who he was.
317.24 He (i.e., Jesus) revealed to him the Fathers on high and how his soul was wholly
317.25 thrown into leopard's teeth and elephant's teeth, swallowed by swallowers
317.26 and gulped by gulpers, eaten by dogs, mixed
317.27 and imprisoned in all that was, and bound in the stench of Darkness.
317.28 He says that he (i.e., Jesus) raised him and made him taste the Tree of Life. Then,

318.1 Adam cried out and wept and raised his voice loudly, like
318.2 a lion that roars and tears. He threw (himself down) and beat (his chest) and said:
318.3 "Woe, woe to the one who formed my body and to the one who bound my soul
318.4 and to the tyrants who have enslaved me."

[37] Just what this phrase means remains unclear. According to Yohannan, ܪܘܚܐ ܒܝܫܬܐ implies a reference to the "two Archons" mentioned by al-Nadīm (Researches, 250), while Reeves suggests it refers to Ashaqlun (Jewish Lore, 205 n. 56). See Pognon, Inscriptions mandaïtes, 192 n. 2. At any rate, it seems clear that Adam is being liberated form negative forces.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Since its inception, this project (generously supported by both doctoral and postdoctoral fellowships from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada [SSHRC]) has greatly benefited from the use of both published and un-published research tools for Manichaean Studies. In particular, Gunner Mikkelsen's Bibliographica manichaica (Brepols, 1996) and the Dictionary of Manichaean Texts I: Texts from the Roman Empire (Brepols, 1998) from the Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum have been used profitably throughout the course of this study. This project, however, would not have been possible without the generous access granted to me by Dr. Wolf-Peter Funk to a wide array of unpublished concordances, lexical aids, and textual revisions. Without these invaluable research tools as a guide, I may very well have never found my way out of the labyrinthine depths of the Manichaean Kephalaia. It is also to him that I offer my sincerest thanks for initially pointing me in this direction and for patiently offering so many insightful comments and suggestions on a multitude of linguistic and methodological matters (ⲁⲕⲧⲟⲩⲛⲟⲩⲉⲓⲧ ⲁⲃⲁⲗ ⲛⲙⲡⲉⲧϩⲏⲡ ⲧⲏⲣⲟⲩ). I would also like to thank Prof. Paul-Hubert Poirier for his unflagging support and encouragement of this project, as well as for his encyclopaedic knowledge of all things early Christian. I am thankful also to Prof. Louis Painchaud for his wisdom and much-valued advice, as I am to my colleagues Tuomas Rasimus, Serge Cazelais, Jennifer Wees, and Michael Kaler for helping to create a sense of community and collegiality. More recently I offer my gratitude to Prof. Pierluigi Piovanelli for his continued interest and encouragement. Most of all, however, I would like to thank my wife, Julie, for her unconditional love and support for all my scholarly endeavours, and to my son, Alex, for the many invaluable moments of distraction and delight that his first four years have offered.

PENTADIC REDACTION IN THE MANICHAEAN KEPHALAIA

INTRODUCTION

Number and Religion in Antiquity

The role played by numbers in religion is largely unexplored territory. This is due, in part, to the fact that such patterns, if they exist, tend to become so embedded into the collective consciousness of the community that rarely is any exegetical effort expended reflecting on their origins or implications. Jews and Christians, for example, do not tend to inquire as to why there are ten commandments and not twelve, why there are twelve tribes of Israel and not twenty, or why Jesus, when he wanted to feed a crowd of his hearers, used only five loaves and two fish. Similarly, Muslims might not be inclined to question why five daily prayers are required, instead of six, or why the Qurʾān contains 114 surahs instead of 141. After all, does it really matter that Buddha only came up with four noble truths, instead of eight? In many instances, the presence of such numbers may be considered of little consequence, although in other cases they could carry a great deal of theological weight. For instance, few contemporary Christians may wonder why they are taught to conceive of God as a trinity and not a quaternity, or for that matter, a pentad. Such formulations are typically taken as "givens" that have come to form an integral part of a particular tradition's symbolic language. But this does not mean that explanations do not sometimes exist and cannot, therefore, be sought. Numerical aspects of religion just simply are not seen as generating sufficient interest to require sustained attention. Besides, it is not as though "mainstream" religious discourses are brimming over with numerological speculations. The average reader of a standard scriptural text, be it the Tanakh, the New Testament, or the Qurʾān, is not going to be struck by an over-abundance of numerical formulations. Thus, it is not surprising that such a phenomenon goes relatively unnoticed.

The apparent lack of interest among the faithful today does not mean that the use of numbers as part of religious and theological discourse was never a matter of concern or debate. For instance, the use of numbers in theological and exegetical contexts became particularly controversial for the early church during the 2nd and 3rd centuries CE. Irenaeus, in particular, criticized the practice of gematria, that is, calculations based on the numerical value of Greek or Hebrew letters, by his Valentinian opponents as arbitrary and without scriptural foundation. The bishop of Lyons also criticized what he perceived to be the arbitrary selection of biblical numbers in order to fit a particular theological system due to the fact that the scriptures contain such a wide variety of numbers and numerical patterns (Adversus haereses, 2.24.3), especially involving three, seven, twelve, and forty. Irenaeus cited, for instance, Valentinian exegesis of the thirty years before Jesus' ministry as a representation of the thirty ethereal aeons of the Pleroma (Adversus haereses, 1.1.3), while the passion of the twelfth aeon was considered to be an allusion to the betrayal of Christ by Judas (Adversus haereses, 1.3.3).

It would seem, however, that, in spite of the decidedly negative reactions of some, there was a certain ambivalence about the meaning and significance of numbers in the early Christian tradition. It is clear from the amount of attention given to the question by Irenaeus that the mixture of mathematics and numerical speculation with theology was viewed by church authorities as a significant problem. Yet while heresiological writers sought to discourage the construction of elaborate theological systems using numeric series or patterns, other more philosophically inclined authors such as Clement of Alexandria and Augustine reflected gladly on the harmony and perfection that they perceived in biblical numbers.

As we can see, while numbers may not figure prominently in "mainstream" (that is, orthodox) religious discourse, faith traditions that are typically seen as existing on the fringes of orthodoxy are far more likely to make creative, even audacious, use of numbers in their efforts to communicate and interpret sacred messages. While the early fathers of the church polemically engaged their Gnostic adversaries over this issue, a similar dynamic would be played out in Rabbinic Judaism and Islam, in their reactions to Kabbalistic and Ismaeli modes of discourse, which also displayed an equally profound interest in numbers and numeric patterns. Added to this group must be the great underdogs of religious history—the people whom we have come to label as Manichaeans.

The Manichaean Love of Numbers

The followers of the 3rd-century CE Babylonian prophet known as "Mani the Living" (from the Syriac epithet Mani hiyya) inherited a vivid story from their highly imaginative master. What is remarkable for the purposes of this study is the prominent role played by numbers and numeric patterns within the basic frame of that story. In brief, Mani proclaimed that before the creation of the cosmos, two opposing powers existed in relative equilibrium. In the heavens dwelt the Father of Greatness, lord of the eternally blessed realm of light, tranquility, and peace, while far below in the depths a fierce and sinister King of Darkness brooded in his chaos. This balance was upset when the King of Darkness caught a glimpse of the light-realm and sent out an invasion force of his demonic powers. In response, the Father sent his only son, known as First Man, into battle along with five elemental powers as his armour. Tragically, the First Man was defeated and his armour devoured by the powers of darkness. Fortunately, a rescue operation was mounted when the Father called forth his consort, the Living Spirit, who in addition to retrieving First Man, commissioned Five Sons to build the universe out of the slain bodies of the dark powers. In this way, a vast and intricate machinery was put into place to purify the light substance that had been imprisoned in the darkness during the First Man's initial fall. The Father then sent a third envoy, the Messenger, along with twelve virgins (although other accounts describe only a single virgin), to finish the counter attack and set the cosmic machinery in motion. Unfortunately, a final counter stroke was accomplished by a pair of demons, Ashaqlūn and Namrael, who fashioned the first human couple, Adam and Eve, on the basis of the Third Messenger's image, thus condemning human beings to a legacy of ignorance and death. In his wisdom, however, the Father commissioned Jesus, in celestial form, to plant the seed of gnosis in Adam and his kin. Thus begins the Manichaean version of primordial history.

This summary, based on the 9th-century Syriac account of Theodore bar Khonai, illuminates the general contours of the Manichaean creation myth, as Mani himself is likely to have conceived it. What is interesting to note are the basic numerical structures underpinning such a colourful tale. This means that the general Manichaean infatuation with numbers must have its origins in Mani's own predilection for such expressions. As can be imagined, this imaginative use of numerically coloured mythology was met with scorn and ridicule by the movement's critics, especially mainstream Christians and Muslims, who thought such mythological language violated the basic rules of philosophical dialectic. Yet, in spite of the best efforts of religious leaders and sometimes governments throughout the centuries to stamp them out, the Manichaeans continue to re-emerge from extinction in some most unexpected places.

Out of Obscurity

While European scholars and church historians long knew of the Manichaean "heresy" from anti-heretical writings and Augustine's notorious association with them, a number of things happened in the 19th and 20th centuries to bring them back to light. First, European scholars and orientalists began to notice Manichaeans cropping up in various medieval Muslim authors, such as al-Nadīm and al-Biruni, which provided important evidence as to persistent Manichaean presence in the medieval Muslim world.[1] Next, at the turn of the 20th century, European expeditions uncovered masses of textual fragments and scrolls left behind by Manichaeans at various locales in Central Asia. Most famously, the texts from Turfan (in western China) contain a huge number of mutilated Manichaean texts in a wide variety of obscure Iranian and Turkish dialects. Shortly after, yet another sensational find occurred in 1929 with the discovery of a collection of Coptic codices in Egypt, near the town of Medinet Madi, containing still more original Manichaean writings—writings much earlier than the fragments recovered from Turfan.

One of the things that enabled the identification of these texts as Manichaean was the fact that Carl Schmidt, the scholar who first inspected the codices, had just been reading the proofs of a colleague's edition of Epiphanius' Panarion, and was struck by the name of one of the codices—Kephalaia—which reminded him of a text described in the heresiologist's exposé of the Manichaeans.[2] This discovery inaugurated what appeared to be a new and promising era in Manichaean studies. After some initial progress, however, war broke out in Europe and publication stalled for several decades. This has meant that most of this material remained largely unexplored by scholars of Late Antiquity—which brings us to the current study.

The text that jogged the memory of Carl Schmidt is, now that substantial portions of it have been published, striking for another reason, namely, the extensive (some might say obsessive) use of numbers and numeric patterns as a means of expressing Manichaean theological discourse. What is more remarkable is the degree to which the number five plays a predominant role in the vast majority of these expressions. This phenomenon, most prominent in the first half of volume one, has gone unexplored[3] and unexplained. In large part, this is due to the fact that the Kephalaia presents itself as a record of Mani's discourses to his inner circle. Few have questioned the legitimacy of this presentation and this has led to the erroneous assumption that the prevalence of numbers in the text can easily be attributed to Mani's direct influence. This study aims to correct this error by demonstrating that the use of numeric patterns in the Kephalaia far outstrips what is known or can reasonably be assumed about Mani's own mode of expression. We shall see that the use of pentads and five-part numeric patterns in the Kephalaia reveals important traces of how Manichaean traditions were transmitted, received, and redacted in response to a variety of internal and external concerns of the text's creators and their community.

The Kephalaia and Its Compilers

In spite of the fact that substantial portions of the Kephalaia have been edited and published for over half a century,[4] its form and function have remained generally misunderstood. Since these initial publica-

[3] While Michel Tardieu pointed out the importance of five as a basic classification tool in Manichaeism (Le manichéisme, 107), few have followed his lead. A superficial index of five-part series from Manichaean sources was given by Ström ("Le chiffre cinq," 333–338), in comparison with other traditions, while in the same volume Couliano suggested that all pentads were based on the demonization of the planets ("The Counterfeit Spirit," 53–58). See also, Lévy ("A propos de la pentade et du dualisme manichéens," 493–500).

[4] The Manichaean Kephalaia exist in two Coptic codices discovered near the Egyptian town of Medinet Madi in 1929. The first codex (Berlin codex P. 15 996 or Berlin Kephalaia codex) is entitled "The Kephalaia of the Teacher" (abbreviated 1 Ke), while the second codex (Codex C or Dublin Kephalaia codex) is entitled "The Kephalaia of the Wisdom of My Lord Mani" (2 Ke). For a recent account of the discovery of these manuscripts see Robinson, "The Fate of the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi:

tions, even some of the most influential scholars have succumbed to the temptation to regard the Kephalaia either as a record of Mani's actual discourses[5] and teachings,[6] or as a systematic[7] (albeit secondary) presentation of the "main points" of Manichaean theology. In reality, however, the work is neither. It should not be seen as a record of the ipsissima verba of Mani himself, nor should it be viewed as a summa[8] of Manichaean theology. Instead, it can be more accurately described as representing the emergence or evolution of a scholastic, interpretive tradition, ostensibly rooted in an authoritative oral tradition analogous to those which led to the compilation of the Jewish Talmudic and Islamic Hadith traditions.

1929–1989," 19–62. Much of the Berlin Kephalaia codex was published by Polotsky and Böhlig (1940 and 1966), while the remainder is being published by Funk (1999, 2000, and forthcoming). For a recent account of the characteristics, content, and reconstruction of the Kephalaia codices, see Funk, "The Reconstruction of the Manichaean Kephalaia," 143–159. The Dublin Kephalaia codex is included in Giversen's 1987 facsimile edition, although it is not (to my knowledge) currently being edited.

[5] See Schmidt, Ein Mani-Fund, 23. Also, Lieu, for instance, talks about Kephalaia chapters as "extant discourses of Mani" (Manichaeism in the Roman Empire, 177). While the enthusiasm of scholars for finding the authentic voice of Mani in such a text is understandable, somewhat more unsettling is the way in which the Kephalaia, as a primary source for Manichaeism, is sometimes simply pillaged by scholars for prooftexts in support of particular readings and hypotheses, with little or no attention paid to the chapter context from which such references are taken.

[6] Widengren spoke about "Mani's teaching, as set down in the Kephalaia" (Mani and Manichaeism, 69), while Ort characterized the Kephalaia as "a summary of Mani's doctrines based on his own writings" (Mani, 23).

[7] Even Tardieu, in spite of the incredible balance and control of his Que sais-je volume, seems to indulge in a slight excess of rhetoric when he characterizes the Kephalaia as "une véritable summa theologica du manichéisme" based on Mani's logia (Le manichéisme, 66–67). Similarly, Koenen characterized the Kephalaia as a "dogmatic textbook" ("How Dualistic is Mani's Dualism?", 3).

[8] In its existing form, it does not appear to be structured with the same degree of deliberation as other systematic theological treatises from the period, such as Origen's De principiis.

[9] This would seem to be the best way to translate the title (Funk, personal communication), although common usage prevents us from going that far. Nevertheless, I cannot help wonder whether the intended title is Kephalaia of the Teacher or simply just The Teacher (or in the case of volume two—The Wisdom of My Lord Mani), although evidence from both the Coptic Homilies (18.6) and the Acta Archelai 62 would seem to support the traditional interpretation of the page headings. As for the identification of individual chapters in this study, I have opted for chapter instead of kephalaion, a technical term which, though correct, has no real benefit and tends to obscure the unique character of each textual unit.

to his inner circle,[10] it is essentially the product of later theological developments and elaborations that seek to respond to a wide array of specific questions, many of which appear to be rooted in ambiguities found in the canon. Typically (although not always), a chapter opens with Mani being questioned by one of his disciples about a specific point of doctrine or interpretation. This means that one of the primary aims sought by the compilers of this massive work was clarity. While Mani is famous for having recorded his teaching in a series of self-consciously canonical writings intended to definitively replace all previous revelations, the questions that are asked by the disciples give the distinct impression that Mani left many "loose ends" that needed to be resolved.[11] Thus, the Kephalaia appears to be a deliberate attempt to deal with some of these issues within an artificially constructed context of Mani's "apostolic authority,"[12] since at the close of the Kephalaia's "prologue" Mani is depicted as extolling his disciples to record the wisdom he imparted to them (1 Ke 9.5–6)—a strange command from someone who was supposed to have provided a definitive and unambiguous record of his revelation. In other words, if Mani had indeed clearly and definitively explained all the subtleties of his vision, then there should have been no need to create such an extensive corpus of secondary literature that seeks to address such a wide array of problems. We might even say that the Kephalaia constitutes a sort of addenda et corrigenda for Manichaean canonical tradition.

Still, in a more formal way, there are aspects of the Kephalaia that allow for its comparison with at least two genres of ancient literature. First, the fact that it exists as a collection of "chapters" (literally, Greek: κεφάλαια) on a variety of theological topics means that it could be compared to certain forms of ancient Capitaliteratur, which aimed at the collection of teachings from a spiritual teacher for the purposes of meditation.[13] A classical example of such literature is Epictetus' Manual (Encheiridion), which is essentially a collection of discourse on miscellaneous topics not unlike those found in the Kephalaia, such as On friendship (2.22), On those who plead sickness (3.5), or What solitude is; and what a solitary person (3.13). During the late-antique period, such literature became particularly popular among monks and ascetics,[14] so it is not inconceivable that ascetically minded Manichaeans would have been interested in producing a work of this sort. The use, however, of the Kephalaia as a source of meditative discourses would seem to have more to do with how it was read during later periods than how it was formed.

[10] Funk, "Reconstruction," 151.

[11] In fact, surviving fragments from Mani's writings do indicate that some of them, such as the Book of Mysteries, were largely incidental in nature, while others, such as the work(s) known to Titus of Bostra, Theodoret, and Severus seem to have been more generalized, with less attention paid to fixed structures and detail.

The second genre with which the Kephalaia bears a somewhat closer resemblance, and which speaks more to its compositional origins, is the erotapokrisis, or "question-and-answer" literature, that became popular among Jewish and Christian exegetes during the first centuries of the Common Era. This genre, which Claudio Zamagni has described as "un genre très élastique," was a form of secondary literature used primarily for the exegesis and elucidation of canonical texts (be they Jewish, Christian, or pagan), although such works often contained apologetic, didactic, or polemical overtones.[15] In general, the erotapokrisis takes as its most basic form a three- part structure consisting of 1) preface/prologue, 2) questions and answers, and 3) postscript/colophon.[16] According to this basic set of criteria, the Kephalaia could be classified as part of the erotapokritic genre, especially if its primary aim was the explication of ambiguities found within canonical Manichaean tradition.[17]

While such characteristics may allow us to identify the function and literary genre of the text, there are other internal indicators that enable us to situate its compilers within a general historical and geographic frame. I choose to call the creators of this text compilers, since it seems clear to me that it is the work of a variety of hands, be they authors, editors, or redactors. But some sense of who these individuals might have been can be gleaned from the sorts of things they wrote about. For instance, we find in the Kephalaia references to important figures from the Judaeo-Christian tradition, such as Adam, Enosh, Eve, Jesus, Judas, Noah, Paul, Sem, and Sethel. This is not surprising given the fact that Mani was raised in a Judaeo-Christian sect known as the Elchasaites and later styled himself, even in his letters, as an "Apostle of Jesus Christ." What is somewhat more striking, are the vague and somewhat shadowy allusions to Zarathustra and Buddha, figures little known west of Persia, but considered by Mani to be two of his key prophetic forerunners. We also find references to rival religious groups such as "Baptists" (i.e., Mandaeans), Christians, Jews, Magi, and Nazoreans, most of whom would have been found in Mesopotamia. In terms of geography, the Kephalaia makes allusion to places throughout the Ancient Near East such as Adiabene, Babylon, Ctesiphon, Mesene, Parthia, Persia, Susiana, Tigris, although India is also mentioned. In addition, various ethnic groups largely from the same region are mentioned, such as Assyrians, Axumites, Babylonians, Indians, Medes, Parthians, Persians, Romans, as well as important political figures such as Ardashir, Artabanus, Hystaspes, and Shapur. Such allusions seem to indicate a social world rooted in a (predominantly) Judaeo-Christian milieu, likely originating in Mesopotamia during the late 3rd century CE.[18] This is precisely the context that Peter Brown rightly emphasized in his important 1969 article, "The Diffusion of Manichaeism in the Roman Empire." According to Brown, the early history of Manichaeism is firmly rooted in the history of the Syriac speaking belt that crossed the frontiers of both Sassanian Iran and Rome.[19] These early Manichaeans, it seems, were caught between two "reactionary states,"[20] both of which were closing ranks and attempting to consolidate imperial cultures that had less and less room for religious innovation and variety. Thus, in both cases Manichaeans were compelled to respond to external pressures such as persecution and martyrdom as well as internal pressures of group solidarity, doctrinal cohesion, and missionary expansion. One less obvious facet of this response, I will suggest, was the extensive use of numeric patterns as evidenced by the Kephalaia.

Yet given the fact that internal evidence appears to indicate a Mesopotamian milieu, how did the Kephalaia end up in Upper Egypt and recorded in Coptic, a language far removed from the Syriac used primarily by Mani and his earliest disciples? To address this problem, we may endeavour to propose a hypothetical reconstruction of the Kephalaia's textual history and transmission. First, as we might imagine, come the oral and (especially) written teachings of Mani in Syriac. Mani is, in fact, practically unique in religious history for the care he took to record his own prophetic message in writing, something he harshly criticized his predecessors for not doing. Second, we might imagine the oral and written transmission and interpretation of Mani's teachings by disciples from his inner circle, such as Sisinnios, Kustaios, and Adda in Syriac, if we presume that they came from a similar sociocultural background, but probably to some extent this transmission happened also in Greek.[21] Next, we might suppose that some of this material was organized and composed into "proto-Kephalaia," examples of which have been recently discovered elsewhere in Egypt, at the Dakhleh Oasis (ancient Kellis). This was probably done by other disciples and missionaries moving west towards and into Egypt, using Syriac (even just liturgically), Greek,[22] and eventually Coptic as their means of communication. Finally, we might suppose the translation, redaction, and collection of what came to be an enormous amount of Kephalaia material into large volumes, such as those found at Medinet Madi,[23]

[21] Funk has asked whether it is possible that a "patristic" tradition developed at a very early stage in the western branch of the Manichaean movement; a tradition with apostolic authority independent of the Manichaean canon. See Funk, "Reconstruction," 152. A document such as the Cologne Mani Codex, with its various sections attributed to authoritative individuals such as Salmaios, Baraies (or Barhaies), Timotheos, Innaios, Kustaios, etc., certainly points in this direction, as does the Acts codex, which has a similar structure (Funk, personal communication).

[22] The issue of original source language has been described as a "vexed question for all the Manichaean texts in Coptic" (See Franzmann "Syriac-Coptic Bilinguals," 115). The debate around this issue, however, is frequently affected by the desire to see in these texts a more primitive stratum than is actually there. To be sure, there are elements from the texts that reveal at least an interest in some kind of Syriac sources, as is witnessed also by the Syriac-Coptic translation exercises recently discovered at Kellis (T. Kell. Syr. / Copt. 1; T. Kell. Syr. / Copt. 2) (Gardner, Kellis Literary Texts, 101). While these texts have raised the possibility (at least) that the translation process in Egypt could have been more direct, they are by no means the "smoking gun" that they are so often made out to be. After all, as Gardner points out, it is hard to imagine the translator not knowing any Greek, especially since Greek Manichaean texts of considerable literary sophistication have also been found at Kellis (not to mention the Cologne Mani Codex, also presumably from Egypt). But, even though it appears textually possible to demonstrate some direct influence, or at least colouring, of Syriac on Coptic Manichaean texts, the question that is never asked is whether or not it is sociologically possible for highly literate (and no doubt indigenous) Coptic speaking translators to work directly from Syriac sources without Greek playing some sort of intermediary role either orally or by means of written texts.

[23] The existing Kephalaia codices seem to represent two volumes from two different "editions" of the same work (Funk, personal communication). The first codex, titled "The Kephalaia of the Teacher," may constitute volume one of its edition, while the second codex, titled "The Kephalaia of the Wisdom of My Lord Mani" may represent volume two of its (separate) edition.

exclusively in Coptic. As such, the traditions, as well as the carriers of these traditions, which led to the composition and production of the Kephalaia, would have traversed at least two distinct (yet often overlapping) socio-cultural settings: late 3rd century CE Mesopotamia and late 3rd–4th century CE Egypt.[24] This movement would have been precipitated both by the "built-in" missionary impulse of the religion as well as the persecution of Manichaeans following the executions of Mani and his successor, Sisinnios. Although the temporal division between these two settings is ambiguous, an argument could be made that the most pertinent social setting falls somewhere between the second and third stages of evolution, as outlined above.

Canon and Tradition

Having established the apparent form and function of the text, as well as gaining a general impression of its most likely context and creators, we can now pose the main question addressed by this study: why were the Kephalaia compilers so enthusiastic in their use of five-part patterns in particular? Part of the answer lies in the recognition of the already stated contradiction between Mani's well-known insistence on the importance of his own written revelation and the very existence of a work that purports to add to this revelation. Obviously the compilers felt compelled to work something out for themselves. However, before we can get a sense of exactly what they were up to we ought to dispense with another assumption commonplace in scholarly treatments of Manichaeism, namely that Mani's own teaching was highly systematized and unambiguous. In some ways, this assumption was reinforced by the discovery of the Kephalaia, which, in combination with the other assumption that it represents Mani's actual discourses, gives the impression of a highly systematic world-view. This second assumption, founded on the first, has resulted in a serious error.

In spite of the fact that the major part of Mani writings have been either lost or, at best, shattered into fragments by the rage of heresiologists and the ravages of time, it is nevertheless possible to form a

[24] There is evidence of Manichaeans in Egypt as early as ca. 280 (Letter of Theonas of Alexandria, P. Rylands 469) and ca. 290 (Alexander of Lycopolis). See Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 112. As for what shape Manichaeism may have taken in Palestine, we have no real direct evidence like we have for Egypt.

general idea of their content and style.[25] For instance, the 10th-century Bagdad bookseller and encyclopaedist, al-Nadīm, recorded that

> Mani wrote seven books, one in Farsi (i.e., Perisan) and six in Syriac, the language of Syria. Among them are The Book of Secrets (i.e. The Book of Mysteries), which contains (a number of) chapters, (including) 'An account of the Daysaniyya (i.e., the followers of Bardaisan of Edessa)', 'The testimony of Yastasif on the Beloved', 'The testimony of … about himself given to Ya 'qub', 'The son of the widow' (who according to Mani was the anointed and crucified one, crucified by the Jews), 'The testimony of Jesus about himself as given in Judaea', 'The commencement of the testimony of al-Yamin as given after his victory', 'The seven spirits', 'The discourse on the four transient spirits', 'Laughter', 'The testimony of Adam regarding Jesus', 'The fall from religion', 'The discourse of the Daysaniyya on the soul and body', 'Refutation of the Daysanites on the soul of life', 'The three trenches', 'The preservation of the World', 'The three days', 'The prophets', (and) 'The resurrection' (trans. Laffan).[26]

Similarly, he stated that Mani wrote Epistles on a variety of topics such as "The Two Sources," "The Eminent Ones," "The Great Epistle of India," "The Epistle of Kaskar," and "The Garden."[27] In this way, we can see that canonical works such as the Book of Mysteries and the Epistles,[28] seem to have been more incidental in orientation, dealing with a seemingly miscellaneous set of doctrinal, polemical, and pastoral issues, while other works such as the Treasure of Life and the (unidentified) source(s) used by Titus of Bostra, Theodoret, and Severus of Antioch provide only generalized presentations of Manichaean theology. This is to say that several of them appear to have lacked the rigid structuring and systematization so apparent in the Kephalaia, not to mention the compilers' obsession with pentads.

Of all the fragments from canonical writings preserved in Syriac, Greek, Coptic, Latin, Middle Persian, and Arabic, only seven contain traces of Mani's own use of pentadic series. These are: 1) fragments from Shabuhragan (presumably composed mid-3rd century CE),[29] 2) pas-

Those that can be identified include:

The Five Limbs

Perhaps the most important of all Manichaean pentads, the "Five shekinahs" (ܫܟܝܢܗ) (Theodore bar Khonai 313.17 [Scher]) (that is, the "presences" or "dwellings" of God) later become known in Graeco-Coptic tradition as the "Five Limbs"[34] and constitute an ideal set of intellectual faculties possessed by a wide variety of entities, namely 1) Mind, 2) Thought, 3) Insight, 4) Counsel, and 5) Consideration.

The Five Elements

Of equal importance are what Mani termed the "Five ziwanē" (ܙܝܘܢܐ)—the "shining gods"—(Ephraim, 235 [Reeves]; Theodore bar Khonai, 7980–7984) attributed to Shabuhragan by Hutter (Manis kosmogonische Šābuhragān-Texte; trans. Klimkeit, Gnosis on the Silk Road, 225).

[31] Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 217–288. Reeves' assertion, however, that Ephraim is "the most important textual witness to the earliest forms of Manichaean discourse" (218) is somewhat misleading, especially when he characterizes what is preserved as "Mani-citations" (220). To be sure the use of the Syriac particle lam ܠܡ is a convincing indicator that some verbatim citations are preserved. In the majority of cases, however, statements are introduced by "as they say" (ܐܡܪܝܢ ܗܘ ܕܐܡܪ) and thus cannot be directly attributable to Mani. As such, while these fragments certainly do bear witness to a very early strata of Manichaean discourse, they cannot, as a whole, be said to represent "portions of Mani's Syriac corpus" (220).

[32] See Theodore bar Khonai, Liber scholiorum, 313–318. Tardieu has suggested that these citations come from Mani's Pragmateia (Le manichéisme, 93).

[33] See Fihrist, 773–805 [Dodge]. While the great value of al-Nadīm's account has been recognized since Flügel's 1862 study, De Blois has recently pointed out that significant portions of al-Nadīm's account, especially on cosmogony, are likely derived from al-Warrāq, a 9th-century, mu'tazilah theologian who took an early interest in Manichaeism ("New Light on the Sources of the Manichaean Chapter in the Fihrist,") 37–45.

[34] According to Funk, this series was rendered as "Aeons" in the unedited Synaxeis codex, which contains readings from Mani's own Living Gospel, whereas in the Epistles codex they are translated as "Limbs" (Epistles) (personal communication). Al-Nadīm, for his part, calls them both "worlds" (Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]) and "limbs" (Fihrist, 786 [Dodge]).

314.11 [Scher]) or, as they were more commonly known to Graeco-Coptic tradition, the Five "Elements" (ⲛⲥⲧⲟⲓⲭⲉⲓⲱⲛ) of 1) Living Air, 2) Light, 3) Wind, 4) Water, 5) Fire (see 1 Ke 43.2 etc.).[35] Also known as the Five "Sons of First Man" (Shabuhragan, Ephraim, 235 [Reeves], Theodore bar Khonai, 314.1 (not enumerated) [Scher]), "gods" (al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 779 [Dodge] Shabuhragan, 513–515 [Mackenzie]), and "Limbs" (al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 786 [Dodge]). They are also put in more traditionally Iranian dress as the "Five Bounteous Immortals" (panzān (a)mahrāspandān) in Shabuhragan (M 7980–7984 [Boyce y, 74])[36] as well as being described as the "Five Walls" (panz parisp) of the Light Chariot, that is, the Sun (M 98/99 [Boyce y, 61]).

The Five Sons of the Living Spirit

As already noted, the Five Sons of the Living Spirit enter the cosmogonic drama when the Father of Greatness responds to the capture of First Man by calling out a second triad made up of "Beloved of Lights," "Great Builder", and the "Living Spirit." Just as First Man (the third being of the first emanation) went into battle accompanied by "five sons," the Living Spirit calls upon his own "five sons" who aid in the slaughter of the Archons and the construction of the cosmos. These Five Sons are called "Ornament (or Keeper) of Splendour," "Great King of Honour," "Adamos (sic = Adamas) of Light," "King of Glory," and "Porter" (314.17–20 [Scher]). Shabuhragan describes these entities as the "five gods" (panz yazd) sent out by the "god Mithra" (Mihr yazd), that is, the Living Spirit (M 7980–7984 [Boyce y, 65).

The Five Virtues

Evidence from Mani's Epistles has confirmed the parallel ordering of both the Limbs and the Virtues in his own discourse. In particular, the "Seventh Letter to Ctesiphon; that of the Vigils" records Mani's evocation of the Five Limbs of 1) Love, 2) Faith, 3) Perfection, 4) Patience, and 5) Wisdom in association with a blessing provided by Jesus: "But it is he who shall bless you all, my beloved / children. May he leave his love on your head, that is, / the Light-Mind. His great faith, he [will … in] your / vigilant Thought. His perfection, he will establish [in your] / good Insight, and his long-suffering, he [will …] / in your good Counsels. His

[36] Al-Nadīm appears to make a distinction between the Five Limbs of the "Realm (Earth) of Light," which equal the Five Elements, and the Five Limbs of the "Sky of Light" (see Fihrist, 786 [Dodge]). There does not seem to have been an absolutely clear demarcation between the Limbs and the Elements, since in several instances (see below the question of the identity of the "Intellectuals") they bleed into one another.

wisdom . . . / . . . he will act as in your sharp Considerations . . ."[37] They are also mentioned by al-Nadīm (Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]).

The Five Vital Powers/Potentials

Also important to the light-realm is the series of five vital powers, known as 1) Life (zīhr), 2) Power (zōr), 3) Light (rōšnī), 4) Fragrance (xwaš̄), 5) Beauty (agrāyī) (Shabuhragan M 7983 = Boyce y 52 [75]).[38]

The Five Worlds of Darkness

As the negative image of the five shekinahs, Mani seems to have conceived of the kingdom of darkness as divided into five districts: 1) Smoke, 2) Fire, 3) Wind, 4) Water, 5) Darkness (Theodore 313.19–20 [Scher], al-Nadīm), also known as the "Five Ditches" (panz kandār) (Shabuhragan M 98/99 [Boyce y, 61]) and the "Five Hells" (panz dušox) (Shabuhragan M 7980–7984 [Boyce y, 66]). As we shall see, there was some confusion among the compilers as to which demonic power held jurisdiction over these domains.

The Five Sons of Darkness

Theodore bar Khonai makes an ambiguous reference to "five sons of darkness" (314.8, 22 [Scher]) who are said to devour the Five Sons of First Man. Presumably the demonic powers who rule the five worlds.

The Five Trees (of Darkness)

While the Book of Giants refers to the fact that the "misguided" fail to recognize the "five elements, [the five kinds of] trees, (and) the five (kinds of) animals" (146 [Henning]), Theodore states that when the Messenger had slain Sin, part of its carcass fell to the ground to produce "Five Trees" (317.3 [Scher]).

Other

Added to this list could be some miscellaneous references from Shabuhragan to the "Five Houses" (mān panz) of the Light Chariot, the "Five Angels" (prēstag panz) who collect souls, the "Five Arches" (tāg panz) built by the Living Spirit over earth (M 98/99 [Boyce y, 60–62]), as well as the "Five Constellations" (panzān axtarān): Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, and Leo (Shabuhragan M 7980–7984 [Boyce y, 66]), and the five components of human body created by demon Āz: bones, nerves, flesh, arteries, and skin (Shabuhragan M 7980–7984). None of these, however, carry the same weight in subsequent Manichaean discourse.

While the five-part structures noted above only provide an incomplete picture of what might have existed in Mani's (mostly lost) canonical writings, they are enough to show two aspects of Manichaean discourse that will be encountered repeatedly throughout the course of this study. First, that one of the basic features of Manichaean myth-making is the attribution of five qualities to both good and evil beings, as well as the organization of such beings into groups of five, a phenomenon which is evident especially in Theodore bar Khonai's and al-Nadīm's accounts and, as such, must have formed part of the way in which Mani (at least sometimes) expressed his ideas.[39] Thus, Mani can be said to have established the basic paradigm for this kind of thinking. Second is the fact that already in canonical traditions it can be observed that certain important pentads were known under a variety of aliases.[40]

It should be noted, however, that Theodore bar Khonai's account, which was paraphrased earlier, appears to place emphasis on the basic triadic structure of the mythic narrative.[41] According to Theodore, three groups of three beings are presented as a series of three evocations, or emanations, through which the drama of salvation unfolds. In this account, five-part series appear to be more attributive and functional in support of the main actors from what is essentially a three-act play. For instance, the Five Sons of First Man function as "armour" for their father, who is the real hero of the first evocation, while the Five Sons of the Living Spirit, from the second evocation, appear in support of their parent, who employs them for the creation and maintenance of the cosmos.

In contrast to the emphasis on triads that can be observed in Mani's canonical discourse, the Kephalaia attempts to bring pentads to the fore. While extensive use is made of canonical pentads from the light-realm such as the Five Limbs, the Five Elements/Sons of First Man, and the Five Sons of the Living Spirit, such series are employed by the compilers of the Kephalaia, by and large, in support of other themes such as the nature of divine being and cosmic parallelism. In addition,

[39] The alternative would be that, by Theodore's time, canonical sources (or even pseudo-canonical sources for that matter) were "retro-fitted" to conform to later scholastic developments.

[40] This may have been due, in part, to the difficulty of rendering Syriac terms like shekinah and ziwanē into Greek and Coptic. Thus, it is not necessarily Mani's doing.

they seem to have been equally interested in other non- (or at least only quasi-) canonical series, such as those that came to be known as the Five Fathers and the Five Greatnesses. These latter series, as we shall see, exemplify the attempt by the Kephalaia compilers to transform the basic mythological structure of Manichaean cosmogony from one based on triads to one based on pentads. This process, which for our purposes will be termed pentadic redaction, is a reflection of the compilers' desire to make sense of what may have been obscure or ambiguous canonical material by shaping it into what seemed to them to be a more cohesively structured whole. As for the dark-realm, we shall see that even though the compilers also made use of canonical series such as Five Worlds of Darkness and the Five Trees, these were not always as clearly defined as those belonging to the light-realm. Nevertheless, even though the compilers sought to clarify how these more ambiguous formulations ought to be understood and placed in opposition to series from the light-realm, their inherently negative associations inevitably led to their being employed for certain polemical ends largely aimed at rival religious communities. Finally, the Kephalaia also presents a number of more generalized pentadic series relating to a variety of soteriological, ethical, ecclesiological, polemical, and aetiological themes that equally speak to the compilers' desire to construct a distinctly Manichaean reality based on pentads.

As such, in order to understand how five-part patterns contribute to the function and originality of the Kephalaia, this study will examine the occurrence of both explicit and implicit five-part structures in order to discover how the compilers shaped, expanded, and redacted canonical material in an effort to communicate their own particular themes and concerns.

CHAPTER ONE

BASIC ONTOLOGICAL PATTERNING

The Two Trees and the Five Limbs

There can be no denying that the foundation of Manichaeism is to be found in the doctrine of the Two Natures, since this concept served as the basis for Manichaean ontology, cosmology, and ethics. As such, it is no surprise that, after establishing the authority of Mani as the most recent messenger of God and legitimizing the validity of the Kephalaia as a literary enterprise (1 Ke 9.6–10)[1] in both the "Prologue" and Chapter 1, the doctrine of Two Natures would be addressed by the Kephalaia compilers straightaway in Chapter 2 "The Second, on the Parable of the Tree." In this chapter, Mani is asked by his disciples to give an exegetical reading of Matthew 7:17–20/Luke 6:43–44,[2] where Jesus explains to his disciples that the quality of every tree can be derived from an evaluation of its fruit (1 Ke 17.2–20), while at the same time alluding to an alternate reading of the same text among "the Sects" (ⲛⲇⲟⲅⲙⲁ), the generic Manichaean designation for any number of rival religious communities. First, Mani is made to caution that appearances can be deceiving. In the natural world, for instance, the "date-palm" (ⲃⲛⲛⲉ), in spite of its pleasant appearance, is said to be quite useless (1 Ke 17.32 ff.). Similarly, Judas, although he seemed to be a good disciple, still betrayed his master (1 Ke 19.1–6), while Paul, though seemingly wicked and a persecutor of the church, ultimately turned out to be one if its most productive founders (1 Ke 19.7–17).

[1] One of Mani's principal critiques of previous religious traditions was the fact that the founders did not record their teaching in writing and thus it was corrupted by later disciples (1 Ke 8.8–28; see also Chapter 151 [On the Ten Advantages of the Manichaean Religion] [1 Ke 371.6–30]). Yet even though Mani seems to have gone to great lengths to record his message in his own series of self-consciously canonical writings, he is conveniently made to legitimize the Kephalaia's expansion of and commentary on this tradition by both the "Prologue" and "Epilogue" of the work (see Funk, "Reconstruction").

[2] This proof-text is cited by Ephraim against the Manichaeans (see Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 252).

Mani is then made to explain how the "Good Tree" has "Five Limbs" (1 Ke 20.12–14), which in turn are said to represent five key components of the Manichaean cosmos:

> … it (that is, the good tree) has Five Limbs / [which are: Consideration, Counsel, Insight, Thought] / Mind. Its Consideration is the Holy Church. Its Counsel / is the Column of Glory, the Perfect Man. Its Insight / is the First Man, who dwells in the Ship of the Living / Waters. Its Thought is the Third Messenger / [who dwells in] the Ship of the Living Fire, which shines in / [the world]. But, the Mind is the Father, who dwells in the Great-/ness, who exists perfectly in the Aeon of Light. / … this, that the souls who come and attain / the Holy [Church] and also the alms which the Cate-/[chumens] give, as they are purified by the Holy Church / … every deed. Consideration is that which will … / … they ascend to … … is Counsel, / [they] ascend to Insight, which is the First Man, / who dwells in the Ship of the Night. From Insight they ascend / to Thought, which is the Messenger, who dwells in / the Ship of the Day. But he, the Great Thought, who / … them to Mind, who is the Father, the God / of Truth, the great Mind of all Aeons of Glory (1 Ke 20.12–31).

Here the Five Limbs are enumerated in canonical, but ascending, order.[3] In this way, the Five Limbs are presented by the Kephalaia compilers in Chapter 2 as part of a programmatic statement whereby the essentially five-fold nature of being is reflected in the five stages of light liberation from the community and ritual context of the Holy Church, where the ritual activities occur (Consideration), to the cosmic conduit of the Column of Glory, which draws the light particles up (Counsel), through to the first (Insight) and second (Thought) light vessels, onto the divine homeland of the Father (Mind). This enumeration is then contrasted with the limbs of the Evil Tree.

The Five Limbs of the Evil Tree are (somewhat awkwardly) made to parallel those of the Good Tree:

> … … the evil [tree] has Five Limbs / [which] are: Consideration, Counsel, Insight, Thought, [Mind]. / Its [Consideration is] the Law of Death which the Sects / are taught. Its Counsel is the transmigration … / in [various] kinds. But, its Insight is the [fiery] furnaces of / … … Gehenna, which are filled with smoke. Its Thought … / … … the vessel. Its Mind is … / … … the lump, the last bond, the … / … … those who Satan has [cast] (1 Ke 21.28–36).

[3] See Chapter 25, where the Limbs are listed in descending order.

These Limbs are associated with a progressive process of damnation from the sectarian context or "Law of Death" (Consideration), through the soul's transmigration (Counsel), to Gehenna (Insight), a vessel of some kind (Thought), then finally the eschatological lump, or bolos (Mind), into which all matter will be moulded at the end of time (1Ke 21.28–36). One might have expected that the Limbs of the Evil Tree would have been identified with negatively valued qualities such as ignorance, stupidity, or apostasy, but instead, the compiler of Chapter 2 works to establish a direct parallel between the Limbs of the Tree of Light and those of the Tree of Darkness. Such a manoeuvre is in contrast to the concept of the Five Elements for which there are two different sets. This seems to indicate either that a canonical series of Dark Limbs did not exist or that the series of divine Limbs was canonically applied to the dark-realm. The latter case appears unlikely, given the great care that was generally taken in completely dissociating the Two Natures. Instead, it is more likely that the Kephalaia compiler carried over the same canonical series in order to create a symmetrical contrast of the Two Trees and to re-emphasize the chapter's cautionary message about appearances. After all, evil, although essentially different, may nevertheless appear seductive and beguiling to those not adept at separating one tree from the other. In fact, Chapter 2, although ostensibly a discussion of the Two Trees, could equally be characterized as a discourse on the "Two Paths"—the good path that leads to liberation and the luminous homeland of the Father and the evil path that traps souls within the cycle of transmigration and ultimate destruction.[4] That both "paths" are described as having five stages is a reflection of the basic five-fold structure of both good and evil entities.

Indeed, we do know that Mani himself characterized his two opposed principles as two fruit-producing trees known as the "Tree of Life" and the "Tree of Death" from Severus of Antioch (Homily 123. 104–105),[5] although in his account there is no explicit association with the New Testament parable. Moreover, the language used by Mani in these citations is more cosmological in orientation, since he places emphasis on the fact that the Tree of Life occupies the northern, eastern, and western regions of the cosmos, while the Tree of Death is confined to the south. This means that, while the Kephalaia compilers have adapted a canonical metaphor, they have given it a different colouring.

This ornamentation of the Two Natures with parallel, but ontologically opposed, five-part series, so prominently placed in Chapter 2, previews the way in which good and evil beings are generally conceived by the Kephalaia compilers and establishes a general ontological framework for the interpretation of all sorts of cosmic phenomena. As such, five-part structure was intimately associated with one of the basic, foundational, and no doubt most primitive, of Manichaean metaphors.[6] In fact, just as Manichaean theology as a whole is sometimes characterized as the doctrine of the "two principles and the three times," Chapter 2 could be stereotyped as encapsulating the Kephalaia's theology in terms of "Two Trees and Five Limbs."

[6] Lieu suggests that the motif of the Two Trees is "unrelated" to the concept of the Two Natures ("Manichaean technici termini," 251), although I do not believe that this assertion can be justified.

CHAPTER TWO

THEOLOGICAL PATTERNING I: LIGHT-REALM

The Faces of the Father

Given the fact that, as we just saw, one of the basic metaphors for Manichaean ontology attributes five qualities to each of the Two Principles, it would be expected that a similar characterization be applied to the Father of Greatness, the ruler of the light-realm and the personification of the good principle. Chapter 21 "On the Father of Greatness, how he is established and defined" (1 Ke 64.21–23) is particularly informative in this regard:

> Just as he [is found] established in his Five Light-Limbs, which are / … the storehouses which are without measure or limit / … Mind, Thought, Insight, Counsel, and [Consideration] / … his Twelve Light-Limbs, which are / his Twelve Wisdoms. Five Great Limbs / of Light are found in each one … Five Great / Fountains of Blessing gush forth … There are Five Great / [Trees(?)] … … of Light (1 Ke 64.20–28).

In this case, the Five Limbs, which we previously saw were applied to the Two Trees, represent those entities which in Theodore bar Khonai's account are known by the Syriac term shekinah (ܫܟܝܢܬܐ), although their apparent characterization as his "Storehouses" (ⲛⲧⲁⲙⲓⲟⲛ) (1 Ke 64.22) may represent an attempt to represent this term more fully.[1] These Five Storehouses, in turn, are associated with Twelve Light-Limbs, also described as Twelve Wisdoms.[2] In turn, we learn that "Five Great Fountains of Blessing" (ϯⲉ ⲛⲛⲁⲟ ⲛϩⲁⲗⲙⲉ ⲛⲧⲉ ⲡⲥⲁⲙⲉ) (1 Ke 64.26–27) surround the Father, and, in what appears to be an extension of the basic tree metaphor, "Five Great Trees(?)" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲛⲁⲟ ⲛⲱⲙ) (1 Ke 64.28). What follows is an enumeration of five characteristics of the Father which, unfortunately, the lacunose state of the text prevents us from completely identifying. All that can be determined for certain from Chapter 21 is the following list 1) light, 2) pleasant odour, 3) living voice of …, 4) …-ness, and 5) great … (1Ke 64.29–65.2). There is, however, a striking parallel between this passage and a section of the Mandaean Right-Ginza, which characterizes the "King of Light" as possessing five qualities: 1) light, 2) fragrance, 3) sweetness of voice, 4) potency of voice, and 5) beauty.[3]

[1] The Greek term tamieion, however, is usually reserved in the Kephalaia for the regions of darkness (see Kephalaia Chapter 6). See also 2 Ps. 200.1. Why the compilers opted for the term "Limbs" rather than "Aeons," as the shekinahs are known in the Synaxeis codex (Funk, personal communication), remains a mystery.

[2] This may mean that each of the Twelve Wisdoms possesses its own set of Five Limbs/Storehouses, although the lacunae in the text obscure the precise relationship.

It is unclear whether or not these five qualities are related to the Five Vital Powers found in a Middle Persian fragment attributed to the Shabuhragan by Hutter[4] and discussed by Polotsky[5] from Sogdian fragment M 14, which list 1) life, 2) power, 3) light, 4) beauty, and 5) fragrance as five qualities possessed by the soul,[6] although there is some superficial resemblance. Nevertheless, Chapter 21 does make clear that the Kephalaia compilers conceived of the Father of Greatness as a being with five characteristics, although this characterization is a formulation that appears to be at odds with other evidence indicating that the Father was known (perhaps even canonically) as the "Four-faced God."

The epithet "Four-faced" (τετραπρόσωπος) is known from Greek abjuration formulae (Seven Chapters 3.59, Long Formula 1461C.14)[7] and the Manichaean Psalm-Book (ⲛⲟⲩⲧⲉ ⲛⲇⲧⲟⲩϩⲟ) (2Ps. 191.12; 186.9–12), although Merkelbach[8] made a rather forced attempt to see the same set of four qualities expressed in Kephalaia Chapter 4 "On the Four Great Days …," Chapter 20 "The Chapter on the Name of the Fathers," and Chapter 7 "The Seventh, on the Five Fathers." At any rate, the tetrad is relatively well attested in Iranian, Turkish, and Chinese Manichaean sources from the East as representing 1) divinity, 2) light, 3) power, and 4) wisdom (see Iranian: M 176, M 31, M 324; Turkish: T II D 162; Chinese: Hymnscroll).[9][10] Frequently, however, the abjuration formulae are the only sources cited for the presence of this concept in Western Manichaean tradition.[11] Samuel Lieu, in his article on the Greek abjuration formulae, states that another potential occurrence of this tetrad is to be found in the "Prayer of the Emanations" from Kellis.[12] In this case, however, the hymnist seeks to glorify the 1) power, 2) glory, 3) light, 4) word, and 5) majesty of the Father.[13]

According to Williams Jackson, Mani viewed this four-fold nature of divinity as a "cardinal tenet"[14] of Manichaeism, citing a passage from al-Nadīm in which Mani appears to command his followers to believe in the "Four Greatnesses" of divinity, light, power, and wisdom.[15] Similar statements were made by Widengren[16] and Asmussen who characterized the notion of the "four-fold God" as "the essence and synopsis of the whole Manichaean system."[17] In addition, Williams Jackson made allusion to "a somewhat similar fourfold division" described by Theodore bar Khonai, who lists the "four elements" as ašwqr, pršwqr, zwqr, and zrwn (ܐܫܘܩܪ ܦܪܫܘܩܪ ܙܘܩܪ ܙܪܘܢ) which appear to be Syriac transcriptions of Iranian terms.[18] These were interpreted by Zaehner to represent Zurvanite ideas of cosmic conception, birth, decline, and rebirth.[19] This apparent similarity, however, became one of the key components of the thesis of Manichaeism's Iranian origins and, as such, was used by Cumont to justify the statement that "l'origine première du système doive être cherchée dans le mazdéisme zervaniste, répandu en Mésopotamie,"[20] in spite of the fact that Theodore himself makes no connection between a Zurvanite and Manichaean tetrad. Considering that Theodore seems to have been aware of the Zurvanite tetrad, this seems like a significant oversight if, as Williams Jackson suggests, the tetrad constituted a "cardinal tenet" of Manichaean doctrine and Theodore wanted to "shame" the Manichaeans through an exposé of their "perverse" doctrines. Surely such a scandalous inclusion of a Zurvanite motif would have fuelled the Syriac polemicist's contempt for Mani's followers.

In light of the fact that evidence continues to mount pointing towards the principally Judaeo-Christian origins of Manichaeism,[21] the "four-faced" God is perhaps better understood as a Zurvanite flourish or accommodation. In Mazdaean theology, the god Ohrmizd was conceived as part of a divine tetrad along with time, space, and religion, although the incorporation of this tetrad into "orthodox" Mazdaeism may have been a response to Zurvanite speculations.[22] Williams Jackson admitted, however, that he could really find only one equivalency between the Manichaean and Zurvanite tetrads,[23] and besides, Zaehner identified the Zurvanite tetrad as time, space, wisdom, and power,[24] which differs markedly from Manichaean attestations. Zaehner also suggested that Zurvanite theology in general was based on an elaborate series of tetrads.[25] Thus, it is conceivable that the particularly Manichaean emphasis on five was meant to counter this pattern. Even an Iranist such as Schaeder suggested that Iranian elements in Manichaeism were a result of Umstilisierung rather than deliberate borrowing or influence.[26] More recently P.O. Skjaervø (following Böhlig) has pointed out that, since the basic formulation of Mani's system is obviously Christian, when he wanted to "dress this myth in Zoroastrian garb" he had little choice but to represent figures such as the Father and the First Man by Zurvan and Ohrmizd.[27] Mere terminological similarities say nothing about origins and derivations, especially at a time when Zoroastrian traditions were themselves in such a state of flux. As Skjaervø succinctly states: "On no account … can it be said that the Zurvanite myth was part of Mani's system, only the name of Zurwān was."[28]

As such, Kephalaia Chapter 21 may represent an attempt by the compilers to distance their discourse from a motif that may have appeared too "Iranian," no longer fit their developing vision of how important divinities should be understood and described, or simply had lost its meaning. If Mani himself employed such an epithet for the Father of Greatness, then this would be a striking instance of the Kephalaia compilers rejecting a canonical formulation in favour of one that was seen as more compatible with their systematization efforts.[29] Ultimately, the compilers appear to have been quite determined to assert as a general principle the fact that Manichaean divinities, even the Father of Greatness, ought to be conceived as possessing five qualities.[30] As we shall see, this conception of the highest divinity, in turn, fits with their wider efforts at the pentadization of other cosmogonic, ethical, ecclesiological, and soteriological themes so evident in the first volume of Kephalaia.

The Many Sons of Man

The series of beings known to the Kephalaia primarily as the "Five Sons of First Man" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲱⲏⲣⲉ ⲙⲡⲱⲁⲣⲡ ⲛⲣⲱⲙⲉ) is somewhat problematic due, in part, to the variety of alias under which it was known. Also known as the Five "Elements" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲥⲧⲟⲓⲭⲉⲓⲱⲛ) (1 Ke 43.2), these "Five Sons" (ܒܢܝ ܐܒܗܬܐ) are characterized by Theodore bar Khonai as the "Five Shining Gods" (ܐܠܗ̈ܐ ܢܗܝܪ̈ܐ ܒܢܝ̈ܢ),[31] and though not

[29] Even Merkelbach is forced to admit that certain Kephalaia chapters seem to expand the tetrad into a pentad (Mani, 45), although he offers no explanation.

[30] Interestingly, a Coptic Manichaean text from Kellis (T. Kell. Copt. 1) describes how the "Third Messenger" reflects the "five properties (σχήματα) of the Father" (see Kellis Literary Texts I, 2).

[31] They are also called "Sons of Light" (ܒܢܝ ܢܘܗܪܐ) (Hypatius, 81.43 [Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 234]) and "Shining Sons" (ܒܢܝ ܢܗܝܪ) by Ephraim (Hypatius, 101.5–24 [Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 235]). Such an expression may lie behind the Coptic formulation "Five Splendours of the Son of Man" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲣⲙⲛⲡⲣ̈ⲓⲉ ⲛⲱⲏⲣⲉ ⲙⲡⲣⲱ[ⲙ]ⲉ) (1 Ke 89.8–9). It seemed much more likely to Burkitt that Jesus, to whom the same term "splendour" is also applied, should be styled "Jesus the Living" or "Life-giving." This, of course, is not how Manichaean translators understood the term, since it is eminently clear that the "Five Sons/Elements" of early Manichaean tradition were understood in Coptic as ⲡⲣ̈ⲓⲉ—"shining forth." While it is certainly possible that Manichaean translators misunderstood such a key technical term (see Franzmann, "Syriac-Coptic Bilinguals," 118–119), it seems unlikely. It is far more probably that the basic elements of the light-realm, not to mention Jesus (one of its key emissaries), were explicitly enumerated in his account, are known from Coptic and other sources[32] as representing 1) Living Air (ⲡⲁⲏⲣ ⲉⲧⲁⲛϩ), 2) Wind (ⲡⲧⲏⲩ), 3) Light (ⲡⲟⲩⲁ̈ⲏⲉ), 4) Water (ⲡⲙⲁⲩ), and 5) Fire (ⲧⲥⲉⲧⲉ). As the essence of soul and the antithesis of matter,[33] the Five Sons/Elements play a central role in the Manichaean conception of redemption, since they constitute the luminous essence that must be liberated through Manichaean ascetic and liturgical practice. In this way, they form the most direct link between Manichaean myth and praxis.

Outside of the Kephalaia there are surprisingly few explicit references (other than those mentioned above) to the Five Sons of First Man, the Five Elements, or the Five Intellectuals in other edited Manichaean Coptic texts—although there are a small number of implicit references (2 Ps. 12.25; 36.22), including an enumeration of each element in a "Psalm of the Wanderers" (2 Ps. 137.20–37). In itself, this is not surprising given the liturgical and hagiographical nature of edited texts such as the Psalm-Book and the Homilies. One notable exception, however, can be found in "Bema Psalm 223," where the Father's "strong son" (ⲙⲡⲉϥ[ϣⲏ]ⲣⲉ ⲛϫⲱⲣⲉ) (2 Ps. 10.7) produces "a Virgin equipped with Five Powers" (ⲛⲧⲉϥ[ⲡⲁ]ⲣⲑⲉⲛⲟⲥ ⲉⲥⲧⲏϣ ⲁϩⲣⲏⲓ̈ ⲁ̀ⲧⲉ ⲛⲟⲁⲙ) (2 Ps. 10.8) in order to fight the forces of darkness. This reference not only provides an additional synonym for the Five Sons/Elements, but somewhat surprisingly attributes them to a mysterious virgin-figure, who appears to act as a kind of consort or twin to First Man.

On the surface, it is difficult to see why these light-substances should have been described as "sons" at all, since functionally, the "Five Sons" constitute the "armour" or "garments" (1 Ke 69.18; 262.25) put on by First Man before going out to engage the powers of darkness.[34] Perhaps this was simply a result of conventions of language regularly employed described as entities which reflect their origin by emanating their essence—in other words, they shine.

[32] The canonical order of these elements seems to have been, at least for polemicists, a bit of a problem. Ephraim, for instance, makes reference to air (ܐܘܪ) (Hypatius, 31.11 [Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 260–261]), light (ܢܘܗܪܐ), wind (ܪܘܚܐ), water (ܡܝܐ), and fire (ܢܘܪܐ) (Hypatius, 101.5–24 [Reeves, "Manichaean Citations," 235]), while the Acta Archelai gives the somewhat idiosyncratic listing of "wind, light, water, fire, and matter (sic!)" (ἄνεμος, φῶς, ὕδωρ, πῦρ, ὕλη) (Beeson), although "matter" (ὕλη) is usually amended by scholars to "air" (ἀήρ) (See Acta Archelai [Vermes/Lieu], 47 n. 40; see also 2 Ps. 137.36).

[33] Polotsky, "Manichäismus," 115.

[34] Theodore bar Khonai even records a Syriac pun on the words for "shining" (ܙܗܪܐ) and "armour" (ܙܝܪܐ) (Reeves, "Citations from Ephrem," 269 n. 9).

by Manichaeans, whereby a series of secondary entities emanated by or associated with another primary being are called "sons."[35] Such a tendency is, in fact, borne out by the testimony of Ephraim, who records the way in which the expressions "sons of Light" (ܒܢܝ ܢܘܗܪܐ) and "sons of Darkness" (ܒܢܝ ܚܫܘܟܐ)[36] formed part of early Manichaean discourse.

The terminological situation becomes more complex in the Kephalaia, since the compilers made use of a number of other co-referential metaphors for the "Five Sons of First Man," namely the "Five Garments" (ϯϵ ⲛϩⲃⲥⲱ) as in Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos" (1 Ke 69.18),[37] as well as the "Five Luminous Gods" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲛⲟⲩⲧⲉ ⲉⲧⲡⲣⲓ[ⲱ]ⲩ) from Chapter 38 "On the Light-Mind, the Apostles, and the Saints" (1 Ke 95.16), and the "Five Shining Men" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲣⲙⲛⲡⲣⲏϵ) (1 Ke 85.34; 88.15; 89.8). While the concept of the Elements as "garments" is not attested in known canonical traditions, the epithets "Five Luminous Gods" and "Five Shining Men" are presumably a reflection of the "Five Shining Gods" (ܚܡܫ ܐܠܗ̈ ܙܝܘܢܝ) known from Theodore bar Khonai.

One co-referential series in particular, however, that seems to have caused a great deal of confusion for both ancient and modern commentators is the grouping known as the "Five Intellectuals" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲛⲟⲉⲣⲟⲛ). While Iain Gardner, in his Kephalaia "Indices" justifiably lists the Five Limbs under the Five Intellectuals,[38] both the Kephalaia and the Psalm-Book typically associated the Intellectuals with the Five Elements, a fact that has already been noted by Van Lindt in his study of Coptic Manichaean terminology.[39] For instance, in Chapter 2 "The Second, on the Parable of the Tree," the "intellectuals" that "clothe" the body of the Column of Glory/Perfect Man are clearly equated with the [35] This, in turn, no doubt reflects Syriac usage of the term bar (ܒܪ), which communicates not only the idea of son-ship, but also of "close relation, subjection, or similarity" (Payne-Smith, 53a). As for their original Syriac name—zīwānā (ܙܝܘܢܐ), "brilliant, or shining"—Burkitt offered the unlikely suggestion that this is actually an adaptation of the Middle-Iranian term zywyn'g, meaning "life-giver" (Religion of the Manichees, 111).

"Elements of Light" (1 Ke 20.1–3).[40] This identification can be corroborated by a "Psalm of the Wanderers" which states that the "Five Intellectuals are the Sons of First Man" (2 Ps. 161.25). Nevertheless, there appears to have been a certain degree of ambiguity as to the identity of the Intellectuals, since in Chapter 31, the Five Limbs were also associated with the preparatory activities of First Man (see below). As such, the exact equations between concepts such as the Five Elements, the Five Limbs, and the Five Intellectuals seem to have been complex and may not have been any clearer to the compilers than they are to us.

On the abstract level, however, the Sons/Elements, collectively known as the "Living Soul," are "a property shared by all objects"[41] within the cosmos and serve as an ontological link between the Father of Greatness and his children. This can be established by interpreting the testimony of Theodore bar Khonai, who records that when the Father sought to defend his kingdom from the dark invasion, he says, "I myself will go" (ܒܢܦܫܝ, literally, "by means of my own soul"). As a result, First Man, whom he calls upon, along with the Five Elements, can be interpreted as the "soul" of the Father sent into battle and eventually captured by the powers of darkness. The Manichaean, in turn, is enjoined to "remember" this imprisonment of the Elements, or Living Soul, and to work for their/its liberation.[42] Once this is recognized, the Manichaean may then become, to use BeDuhn's evocative term, "a cog" in the great cosmic machinery of light-liberation.[43] According to the Cologne Mani Codex, the notion of the suffering Living Soul was perceived by Mani at an early age when he heard the cries and lamentations of plants as they were harvested from his sectarian community's vegetable garden (CMC 6–10). This means that, according to Manichaean hagiography at least, the plight of the Living Soul constituted one of Mani's earliest insights into the true nature of the world around him.

Yet even in spite of the obvious importance of the "Five Sons of First Man" as a concept within Manichaeism generally, the Kephalaia compilers seem to have been primarily interested in using them for the formulation of other rhetorically or doctrinally significant number patterns. For instance, according to Chapter 3 "The Interpretation of Happiness, Wisdom, and Power," these three thematic qualities are said to exist at five levels of divine being, from 1) the Father, through the light-vehicles of 2) Sun and 3) Moon, to 4) the Elements and 5) the Holy Church. At the level of the Elements, "happiness" is said to be constituted by the Column of Glory/Perfect Man, the cosmic apparatus for light-liberation, while the Five Sons of the Living Spirit constitute "wisdom." At the same level, however, "power" is manifested by the Five Sons of First Man, who are "folded into the Universe" (1 Ke 24.25).

Being/Context	Happiness	Wisdom	Power
Father	Father	Great Spirit	rich gods & angels/aeon
Sun	Living Spirit	Mother of Life	rich gods & angels
Moon	Mind (of Father)	Virgin of Light	rich gods & angels
Elements	Column of Glory	5 Sons of Living Spirit	5 Sons of First Man
Church	Apostle of Light	Leaders & Teachers	Elect, Virgins, Ascetics, Catechumens

Similarly, in Chapter 4 "On the Four Great Days, which have come out from one another; along with the Four Nights," the twelve hours of the third day are calculated by adding the Five Sons of First Man and the Five Sons of the Living Spirit to Call and Response (1 Ke 25.25–30).

Four Days	Dwelling	Hours
1) Father	Aeon	12 rich gods
2) Third Messenger	Ship of Light	12 virgins
3) Column	(Cosmos)	5 Sons + 5 Sons + Call &Response
4) Jesus the Splendour	Church	12 Wisdoms

An analogous exegetical manoeuvre occurs in Chapter 10 "On the Meaning of the Fourteen [Great] Aeons about which Sethel spoke in [his] Prayer." In this context, the Five Elements/Sons are added to Call and Response to form a first set of seven, while the Five Sons of the Living Spirit are added to the Living Spirit and First Man to form a second set of seven. These, Mani is made to explain, constitute the fourteen "blessings" (ⲛⲥ[ⲙⲁⲙⲉ]) (1 Ke 43.8) or "persons" (ⲙⲡⲣⲟⲥ[ⲱⲡⲟⲛ]) (1 Ke 43.9) through which the world was established.

*5 Elements/Sons + Call &Response	*5 Sons of Living Spirit + Living Spirit & First Man
(Living Air)	(Keeper of Splendour)
(Wind)	(King of Honour)
(Light)	(King of Glory)
(Water)	(Adamas)
(Fire)	(Porter)
Call	Living Spirit
Response	First Man

*Individual elements and sons not explicitly named in chapter.

Also, the Five Sons of First Man are assigned by Chapter 16 "[On the Five] Greatnesses which have [come] out against the Darkness" to the "Second Greatness," along with Mother of Life and First Man (1 Ke 49.19–23):

	Part I	Part II (fragmentary)	Part III
First Greatness	Father	…	First Man son of king
Second Greatness	Mother of Life Fist Man 5 Sons of First Man	…	Living Spirit judge
Third Greatness	Beloved of Lights Great Builder Living Spirit 5 Sons of Living Spirit	…	Third Ambassador king
Fourth Greatness	Third Ambassador Column of Glory Powers of Light	…	Jesus the Splendour up-rooter of trees
Fifth Greatness	Jesus the Splendor All his Powers	…	Call & Response butter in milk

Finally, in Chapter 39 "On the Three Days and the Two Deaths," the "First Death" is marked by the mixture of Darkness and the Five Sons (1 Ke 102.36–103.2).

3 Days & 2 Deaths	Events
1st day	First Man—Living Spirit—Ambassador
2nd day	New Aeon
3rd day	Father reveals himself
1st death	Mixture of Darkness and 5 Sons of First Man
2nd death	Casting out of sinful blasphemers

In this way, even in spite of obvious terminological problems, the Five Sons/Elements were seen more as a convenient rhetorical tool than a concept that required extended commentary and clarification.

What was it, however, that might have led to Mani's equation of the suffering light-soul to a concept of five elements in the first place? Throughout antiquity, against the canonical Empedoclean doctrine of four elements, there was an alternate theory of five elements as the basic building-blocks of the cosmos.[44] While it is unclear who may have originated the idea (i.e., pre-Socratics such as Pherecydes of Syros, Pythagoras, or Philolaus, although Mattéi suggests that Philolaus expounded this doctrine),[45] it seems to have taken root in the early Academy and influenced Aristotle and post-Aristotelian philosophy well into Late Antiquity.[46] Eventually, the quintessence, as it were, or fifth element, came to be recognized as the ethereal substance of the soul and eventually as that of the heavenly sphere and the stars.[47] As for how such a concept might have entered Mani's immediate environment, a doctrine of five elements seems to have played an important role in the cosmogonic teaching of Syriac sage, Bardaisan of Edessa, and his school. Ephraim the Syrian (in the fourth century CE) called Bardaisan the "teacher of Mani," influencing him particularly in the realm of cosmology.[48] Burkitt accepted Ephraim's analysis that Mani derived at least some of his ideas from Bardaisan, but cautions that Mani and Bardaisan, although similar on certain points, hold very different points of view.[49] Drijvers has also emphasized the difference between the two.[50] Polotsky, in the footnotes to his edition, suggested that there is a veiled allusion to Marcion and/or Bardaisan as precursors to Mani in the Kephalaia's "Introduction" (1 Ke 13.30 ff.). But, as with so many of the most interesting thinkers from Late Antiquity, we are forced to rely largely on fragments and secondary testimony for information about Bardaisan's teaching, some of which may actually be drawn from his followers. Nevertheless, later Syriac tradition attributes to Bardaisan the doctrine that the world came to be from the mixture of five elements: fire, wind, water, light, and darkness.[51] But, as Drijvers points out, Bardaisan's cosmological ideas only came under attack in the wake of Manichaeism.[52] Thus, there may have been some desire on the part of later polemicists and heresiologists to overemphasize the role played by Bardaisanean ideas in the formation of Manichaeism. As such, while it is at least possible that Mani drew or adapted a doctrine of five elements from Bardaisan (however reluctantly), the presence of such a doctrine, and the importance of the fifth element as the substance of the soul (not found in Bardaisan), is sufficiently attested in philosophical traditions from Late Antiquity to make other derivations possible.

Cosmic Parallelism

Two chapters in particular demonstrate the Kephalaia compilers' interest in the correspondence between the macrocosm and the microcosm: Chapter 38 "On the Light-Mind, the Apostles, and the Saints," and Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos." In Chapter 38 especially, five-part patterns are omnipresent in that they provide both the literary as well as the theological framework through which this theme is presented. As such, the compilers draw on three canonical pentads, namely the "Five Sons of the Living Spirit,"[53] the "Five Limbs,"[54] and the "Five Virtues," to communicate their message.

[52] Bardaiṣan, 96.

[53] According to Theodore bar Khonai, in response to the capture of First Man, the Father of Greatness called out a second triad, made up of "Beloved of Lights" (ܚܒܝܒ ܢܗܝܪܐ), "Great Builder" (ܐܒܐ ܕ), and the "Living Spirit" (ܪܘܚܐ ܚܝܐ). Like First Man (the third being of the first emanation), Living Spirit calls upon "Five Sons" who aid in the slaughter of the Archons and the construction of the cosmos, specifically the "Ten Heavens" and the "Eight Earths." These Five Sons are called "Ornament (or Keeper) of Splendour" (ܙܝܘܐ ܢܛܪ), "Great King of Honour" (ܡܠܟܐ ܪܒܐ ܕܝܩܪܐ), "Adamos (sic = Adamas) of Light" (ܐܕܡܐ ܕܢܘܗܪܐ), "King of Glory" (ܡܠܟ ܫܒܚܐ), and "Porter" (ܦܬܚܐ). Personally, I prefer the use of English equivalents for these names, since the use of Latin terminology, such as Splenditenens, Rex honoris, etc., so frequently used in studies of Manichaean myth, creates the false impression that such terms are somehow more original or accurate when in actual fact they are relatively late.

[54] As we have seen, the most important five-part series in the whole of Manichaean discourse is what came to be known in the Graeco-Coptic tradition as the "Five Limbs" (ϯογ ⲙⲙⲉⲗⲟⲥ). They are usually enumerated as 1) Mind, 2) Thought, 3) Insight, 4) Counsel, and 5) Consideration, although how to accurately translate these terms has

On the rhetorical level, the central importance of five-part patterning to Chapter 38 is made evident by its initial literary frame, since in an effort to have Mani address the issue of theodicy, the unnamed disciple is made to pose a series of five questions:

> Again at one occasion, a disciple questioned the [Apostle], / saying to him: You have told us that the Light-Mind / is that which comes and supports the saints. [You have told] / us therefore that even though it is one of the gods … / … many gods exist in it. You have told / us also that at the time it enters into [the body] / of the flesh and binds the Old Man with his Five Counsels, / setting up its Five Counsels on him in the Five Limbs / [of his] body. Where is it [though], since the Old Man is bound in the / body? For, I (can) see that rebellions occur in its / bond from time to time. Secondly, I ask / you: If indeed it is a great god, unchanging and / immeasurable, how does it come to appear in the smallness of the / body?
> The third thing that I want you to tell / me [is this: If(?)] the Mind is holy and pure, / [how did it come to be joined to(?)] the impurity of this body? /
> Fourthly, if truly, the Light-Mind is present in [the] / saints, why does its likeness not appear to us as it / is? The fifth thing: I want / you to tell me (about) and explain your apostleship. / For, behold, it is not clear to me, since they oppress / you and persecute you in the world. / I implore you that you persuade me about these things which I have asked you (1 Ke 89.21–90.7).

Basically, what the disciple wants to know is how a great and noble divine power such as the Light-Mind can inhabit a small and defiled been the subject of perennial debate within Manichaean studies. The Syriac version of the series ܪܥܝܢܐ ܪܥܬܥܣܐ ܪܚܝܢܐ ܪܟܪܗ ܪܥܡ (Theodore bar Khonai 313.17 [Scher]) is equivalent to the Greek terms νοῦς, ἔννοια, φρόνησις, ἐνθύμησις, λογισμός, which were then rendered into Latin as mens, sensus, prudentia, intellectus, cogitatio (Acta Archelai, 10 [Beeson, 15.11/25]). In Coptic the series is ⲛⲟⲩⲥ, ⲙⲉⲩⲉ, ⲥⲃⲱ, ⲥⲁϫⲛⲉ, ⲙⲁⲕⲙⲉⲕ. Originally, these are what Theodore identifies as the Five shekinahs (ⲥⲏⲙ ⲛⲁⲥⲧⲁⲥⲉ) (Theodore bar Khonai 313.16 [Scher]). In Syriac, the word ܪܥܬܥܣ represents the "dwelling-place" or "presence" of divinity, as in a temple or shrine (Payne-Smith, 576b). In Theodore's account, the ethereal shekinahs of the Father are contrasted with the more concrete "worlds" (حلم) of the King of Darkness. Why the shekinahs were understood as "Limbs" (ⲙⲙⲉⲗⲟⲥ) by the compilers remains a bit of a puzzle, since when associated with the Father of Greatness they would be more properly understood as "aeons" (ⲛⲁⲓⲱⲛ). This is, in fact, precisely how they are characterized in the Coptic version of Mani's Living Gospel (Funk, personal communication). This rendering, however, does not seem to have greatly influenced the Kephalaia tradition, which opted for the occasional use of ⲛⲧⲁⲙⲓⲟⲛ and the more regular use of ⲙⲙⲉⲗⲟⲥ. It does seem, however, that al-Nadīm provides evidence that even in Syriac tradition they may have already been characterized as "Limbs" (Fihrist, 768 [Dodge]).

body. Moreover, if this is indeed the case why does Sin[55] (i.e., "rebellion") persist? These two basic questions, however, are extended (somewhat artificially perhaps) into a five-part schema:

> Question i) Where is the Light-Mind in the body, if there are rebellions?
> Question ii) How can this great god come into a small body?
> Question iii) How can the pure Mind occupy the defiled body?
> Question iv) If the Light-Mind exists in the saints, why don't we see his likeness?
> Question v) What is the nature of your apostolate, if you are persecuted?

In response, Mani is made to begin his discourse with an analogy[56] in five parts. The first part of the analogy suggests that the cosmos (metaphorically understood as "Error" [ⲡⲗⲁⲛⲏ]) is constructed like a human body (1 Ke 90.20–22). Its external aspects are described in descending order from head to feet (1 Ke 90.22–33), while its internal aspects are described from interior to exterior, from heart to skin (1 Ke 91.1–5), followed by several characteristics made unclear by lacunae in the text (1 Ke 91.5–13). According to the second part of the analogy, the soul of the cosmos is represented by the Five Sons of the Living Spirit (the Keeper of Splendor, the King of Honour, the Adamas of Light, the King of Glory, and the Porter), who are characterized as "Five Sleepless Watchers" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛ̀ⲥⲟⲩⲣⲓⲧ ⲛⲁⲧⲛⲕⲁⲧⲉ) (1 Ke 91.19) and are related to the Five Limbs (Mind, Thought, Insight, Counsel, Consideration) (1 Ke 91.14–33). To these two groups of five is added a sixth element in the form of a pair: "call and response" (ⲧⲱϩⲙⲉ / ⲥⲱⲧⲙⲉ) (1 Ke 92.2–3)—the dual values at the core of the Manichaean drama of salvation. Part three states that the Column of Glory represents the Light-Mind at the cosmic level (1 Ke 92.5–6), while part four recounts how the dark powers have rebelled in the watch districts of each of the Five Sons (1 Ke 92.12–93.15). Finally, the fifth part of the analogy describes how the Column of Glory (acting as a kind of Light-Mind for the cosmos) assists the Five Sons in suppressing the rebellions in their respective watch districts (93.16–94.16). By means of this analogy, Mani is made to set up the basic thesis of the discourse, namely that the Light-Mind is indeed present in the body in spite of the presence of sin, thereby answering the first of the disciple's questions.

[55] In Manichaean discourse "Sin" is often a quasi-personified concept.

[56] Nagel characterized this as the "makrokosmisch-mikrokosmisch … Lagerallegorie" ("Anatomie des Menschen in gnostischer und manichäischer Sicht," 88).

This first part of the discourse is expressed using a series of five-fold structures that progressively integrate each part of the argument while consistently enumerating the five thematic elements in canonical order. The rhetorical repetition of five is meant to express the fundamental interconnectedness of all facets of Manichaean teaching and to reflect the quasi-scientific allure of Manichaean doctrines in Late Antiquity. The Elect, to whom this discourse is addressed, would have had no difficulty in accepting the Manichaean logic of this vivid cosmological narrative.

Mani, then, is made to continue with arguments in support of his position by shifting first to the microcosmic level of the body and second to the level of the community. By way of introduction, Mani answers the second of the disciples' five questions (i.e., How can such a great god dwell in a small body?) by stating that even though the gods are great and mighty (1 Ke 95.4), they are nevertheless bound within their proper places (1 Ke 95.4–9). Following this, Mani answers the third of the five questions (i.e., How can the pure Mind occupy the defiled body?) by describing the creation of the body (what Manichaeans term the "Old Man") by the agency of Sin. According to the Apostle of Light, Sin bound the Five Limbs in the body: Mind in bone, Thought in sinew, Insight in vein, Counsel in flesh, and Consideration in skin (1 Ke 95.13–19). The Light Mind, however, acts to free the Limbs from their bonds (1 Ke 96.8–21), and reestablish them in the Five Virtues of the "New Man," or redeemed individual. As such, Mind becomes love, Thought faith, Insight perfection, Counsel patience, and Consideration wisdom (1 Ke 96.25–97.6).

Once again the number five plays a crucial role in the elaboration of this highly structured portion of the discourse. The five-fold schema of the Limbs is enumerated again in the same canonical order (Mind, Thought, Insight, Counsel and Consideration) in each of the three occurrences, which, in turn, reflect the three key points in the salvation narrative in which the Light-Mind plays a critically important role: imprisonment, liberation, and re-creation.

Sin bound LIMBS in the body,	but LIGHT-MIND frees them,	and creates the NEW MAN.
i) MIND in bone,	i) MIND from bone,	i) MIND is love
ii) THOUGHT in sinew,	ii) THOUGHT from sinew,	ii) THOUGHT is faith
iii) INSIGHT in vein,	iii) INSIGHT from vein,	iii) INSIGHT is perfection
iv) COUNSEL in flesh,	iv) COUNSEL from flesh,	iv) COUNSEL is patience
v) CONSIDERATION in skin.	v) CONSIDERATION from skin.	v) CONSIDERATION is wisdom

What follows is a discussion of the implications of Sin and adversity at the community level. Here Mani emphasizes that even though the Light-Mind is king of the New Man, Sin may still cause disruptions and lead to difficulties in the Manichaean church:[57]

> As long as the Limbs of Sin[58] are bound / in this way, Sin is contained. Even though the Light-Mind / [is] king, tribulation may still occur in the body from / time to time. Sometimes Sin rises / up in his Consideration and disturbs Counsel, and confuses / the Wisdom and the understanding of the man (1 Ke 97.23–28).

Each of the New Man's Five Limbs,[59] along with the Five Virtues attached to them, can be disturbed and disrupted by Sin, causing doubt in the believer and his or her possible departure from the church. In this case, however, the presence of the Light-Mind in the individual may be preserved by the members of the community, who attempt to "correct his wisdom" (1 Ke 97.33). Yet even the correction and rebuke of the community may not suffice to keep the Light-Mind active in the individual. Eventually, the Mind "(will) be dispersed from him and return to the Apostle who sent it" (1 Ke 99.13–14). This individual will become like "a bird plucked of its feathers" (1 Ke 99.17). Such statements are presumably meant to justify the loss of community members within the wider context of the persistent activity of sin in the cosmos.

Mani then goes on to restate the answers to the first three questions and respond to the fourth (i.e., If the Light-Mind exists in the saints, why don't we see his likeness?), by suggesting that the likeness of the Light-Mind cannot be known since it is not visible in the body (1 Ke 99.24). In addition, Mani re-enforces the macrocosmic/microcosmic parallelism at the core of his argumentation and re-assures the audience about the strong presence of the Light-Mind:

[57] There is an intriguing correlation here with the Cologne Mani Codex. The actual title of this work is Περὶ τῆς γέννης τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ, "On the Origin of His Body," i.e., of his church. Thus, there may be an implicit parallel understood here in Chapter 38 between the metaphor of the body at the cosmological, anthropological, and ecclesiological levels. See Cameron and Dewey, The Cologne Mani Codex, 2 and Henrichs and Koenen, Der Kölner Mani-Kodex.

[58] Funk, A&C.

[59] In terms of rhetorical structure, it is interesting to note that in this instance, where the Five Limbs are invoked, there is an inversion of their order. This can perhaps be explained by the fact that from a "higher" cosmological perspective the Five Limbs descend in their value, while in the "lower" community context, they ascend. Also, Consideration is presumably weaker than Mind and, as such, would be attacked by sin first.

> Behold the strength and the efficiency of the Light-/Mind: how great it is on all the watch-towers of / the body. It stands in its encampment (and) shields / every impulse of the body from the attractions of Sin. / It fixes them, scatters them, (and) sets them right / according to his will (1 Ke 100.1–100.6).

In conclusion, Mani is made to respond to the fifth and final question by invoking, again in five parts, his own superior status as a prophet. He outlines how he has come into the world as a lone individual and has conquered with the word of God regions which cannot be conquered by force of arms. Even though the powers of the world have attempted to destroy his message, they have failed. In response to such adversities, Mani has freed his children and equipped them with superior wisdom. No one has accomplished more than him, except for Jesus himself (1 Ke 100.15–102.3). In this way, Mani is made to rhetorically re-enforce the superior value of his revelation in the face of persecutions by the worldly powers and thereby validate the chapter's thematic parallelism.

As we can see, Chapter 38 uses an elaborate mixture of five-part theological and literary patterns to communicate its message of reassurance in the face of sin and evil and to emphasize the analogous relationship between the macrocosmic and microcosmic powers. In addition, it reinforces the intimate relationship between three canonical pentads: The Five Sons of the Living Spirit, the Five Limbs, and the Five Virtues. To Manichaeans accustomed to this way of thinking, Chapter 38 no doubt offered an impressive presentation of a persistent theological and community problem.

A similar, although less extensive, analogy between body and cosmos is drawn in Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos." In this chapter, we are told that "the entire cosmos, above and below, resembles the human body" (1 Ke 169.29–30), with each component of the cosmos compared to a part of the body (1 Ke 170.2–16). Here too, as in Chapter 38, the Five Sons of the Living Spirit are described as "Watchers" (ⲙⲙⲁⲛⲣⲁⲓⲥ) (1 Ke 171.28) of five regions of the cosmos (1 Ke 170.21–171.15), called "encampments" (ⲙⲡⲁⲣⲁⲙⲡⲟⲗⲏ) (1 Ke 170.21) or "watch-towers" (ⲛⲟⲩⲣⲱϥⲉ) (1 Ke 171.11), while the Light-Mind guards five "encampments" of the body:

> [Just as] these Five Watchers are found in this great / [bond of these Five] Encampments that I have proclaimed / to you, so too is it with this body, which the / Elect bear. There are Five other Encampments / in it. The Light-Mind guards them along with the / New Man who is with him (1 Ke 171.28–172.4).

Also, as in Chapter 38, "tribulation" (ⲑⲗⲓⲫⲓⲥ) (1 Ke 171.11) is said to persist under the watch of the guardians (1 Ke 171.11–172.1). Finally, each of the Five Sons of the Living Spirit is compared to an Elect who, with the aid of the Light-Mind, is able to control the various parts of the body (1 Ke 172.3–20).

5 Sons of the Living Spirit	who rule	are like Elect who
Keeper of Splendour	First Three Heavens	rules face
King of Honour	Next Seven Heavens	rules heart
Adamas	Firmament to Four Earths	rules chest
King of Glory	Three Wheels & Three Earths	rules stomach
Porter	Great Earth & Four Fixtures	rules feet

In this way it can be seen that, in two different chapters (Chapters 38 and 70), the Kephalaia compilers sought to emphasize the correspondence between the cosmos and the human form—a concept essential to the Manichaean worldview. This was done to reassure the community that parallel processes of rebellion and divine suppression are at work at both levels of being. In this way, readers could imagine their own bodies as encapsulating the cosmic struggle against the powers of darkness.

Fathers of Greatness

One favourite activity of the Kephalaia compilers that speaks to their deliberate efforts at pentadic redaction is the grouping of beings from the light-realm into series known either as the "Five Fathers" or the "Five Greatnesses." The first major discussion of this theme can be found in the work as early as Chapter 7 "The Seventh, on the Five Fathers," where the compiler took the unusual step of numerically identifying the placement of the chapter in its title.[60] In this chapter, Mani is made to explain that the Five Fathers have their origin in the Father of Greatness and that all have shared in the victory over the powers of darkness. Each of the Five Fathers is named, along with three of their emanations:

[60] This seems to occur in only one other chapter in 1 Ke—Chapter 2, and apparently not at all in 2 Ke (see Funk, "Reconstruction," 158–159).

5 Fathers	1st Emanation	2nd Emanation	3rd Emanation
1st Father of Greatness	Great Spirit/Mother	Beloved of Lights	Third Messenger[61]
2nd Third Messenger	Column of Glory	Jesus the Splendour	Virgin of Light
3rd Jesus the Splendour	Light-Mind	Great Judge	Youth
4th Light-Mind	Apostle of Light	Twin	Light-Form
5th Light-Form	Victory-Angel	Garment-Angel	Crown-Angel

Essentially, what this chapter presents is a five-part ontology of salvation. These Five Fathers represent the five ontological levels at which the work of salvation takes place: 1) the pre-cosmic context of the Light-realm (Father of Greatness), 2) the cosmic context of creation and the defeat of the Archons (Third Messenger), 3) the eschatological context of human history, judgement, and redemption (Jesus the Splendour), 4) the prophetological context of revelation and apostleship (Light Mind), and 5) the ethical and ecclesiological context of the Holy Church (Light-Form).

Whereas the canonical version of the myth, as known from Theodore bar Khonai, contains three series of emanations,[62] the compilers of Chapter 7 extend this canonical formulation to a five stage process of salvation, with three emanations occurring at each stage. Moreover, each stage moves towards a progressive focalization of the myth from the generalized, pre-cosmic context of the Father of Greatness down to the specific context of the individual Manichaean who has received the Light-Form. For example, stage one of salvation occurs at the broad, pre-cosmic level where the three "canonical" emanations occur out of the Father of Greatness.[63] This establishes the transcendent framework of salvation. Stage two brings into focus the three components of the Third Messenger, the third canonical emanation, who provides the means by which salvation can be achieved by human beings. Stage three enumerates three hypostases of Jesus the Splendour, the main intermediary from the third emanation, who acts not only as enlightener and bringer of the Light-Mind, but as eschatological judge as well. Stage four speci-

[61] The Third Messenger was prematurely identified as the "Second Father" by the redactor in the list of the Father of Greatness' three emanations (1 Ke 34.33).

[62] This, of course, cannot be verified since Theodore's account of the myth breaks off after Jesus the Splendour's encounter with Adam.

[63] It is important to keep in mind the role of synonymy in early Manichaean discourse. Even though three beings are emanated in each of the three canonical emanations, only one is named here as representative. Even though the Manichaean myth presents a multiplicity of different beings, in many instances they may be understood as diverse manifestations and hypostases of an original triad.

fies the three principal ways in which the Light-Mind, a main hypostasis of Jesus the Splendour, aids humanity. Finally, stage five enumerates the three gifts gained by the individual once he or she has received the Light-Form.

Chapter 20, again with the atypical title of "The Chapter on the Name of the Fathers," presents a similar arrangement of five mythological figures. In this chapter, Mani is made to quiz his disciples about why the Father is called "Father of Greatness" (1 Ke 63.23–24). After their stereotypical plea of ignorance, Mani reveals that the Father of Greatness is so-called because he dwells in the Great Earth, where he is surrounded by all his angels and divine companions (1 Ke 63.28–33). The discourse then turns to identifying the "greatness" of four other beings that are also called "Father." The Third Messenger's greatness is the "Ship of the Living Fire," i.e., the Sun, while Jesus the Splendour's greatness is the "Ship of the Living Water," i.e., the Moon. The Column of Glory's greatness has something to do with "Five Gods," while the greatness of the Light-Mind is identified as the Holy Church (1 Ke 63.34–64.10). This list of Five Fathers from Chapter 20, however, is different from the list found in Chapter 7:

Chapter 7: 5 Fathers	Chapter 20: 5 Fathers
Father of Greatness	Father of Greatness
Third Messenger	Third Messenger
Jesus the Splendour	Jesus the Splendour
Light-Mind	Column of Glory
Light-Form	Light-Mind

Whereas Chapter 7 enumerates a soteriological sequence in which the Light-Form is given a central role at the community level, the account from Chapter 20 inserts the Column of Glory, making no mention of the Light-Form. The aim of Chapter 20, however, although also soteriological in character, seems to be to establish the location of each of the Five Fathers at one of the five principal stopping points of the Manichaean cosmic journey of salvation: from the ritual activity of the Holy Church (Light Mind) to the "Five Gods" (?) administered by the Column of Glory, to the Moon and Sun where Jesus the Splendour and the Third Messenger dwell, on to the Great Earth, the homeland of the Father of Greatness. Whereas Chapter 7 enumerates the five ontological levels of salvation, Chapter 20 lists those five beings whose efforts facilitate the accomplishment of salvation and the liberation of light.

The situation is further complicated when we look at Chapter 25 "On the Five [Fathers: From which Limbs they have come]," where we are presented with yet another variant formulation, only this time the Father of Greatness himself is not included.

Five Fathers	from Five Limbs
Messenger	< Mind
Beloved of Lights	< Thought
Mother of Life	< Insight
Jesus the Beloved (sic)	< Counsel
Virgin of Light	< Consideration

Unfortunately, almost no context is given by this extremely abbreviated chapter, other than the statement that "one came after the other (and) appeared in his time" (1 Ke 76.25). This seems to imply that the series is meant to be understood temporally, although such an understanding seems to contradict what is known about the sequence of the Manichaean myth from other sources such as Theodore bar Khonai. According to the canonical account, a "temporal" progression of these figures would run Mother of Life—Beloved of Lights—Messenger—Jesus the Beloved—Virgin of Light.[64] Nevertheless, a clue as to how this series might be understood can be found in Chapter 7, in which the Third Messenger is called the "model of the King of Light" (1 Ke 35.8) and the "first of all counsellors" (1 Ke 34.33). This would seem to justify the Third Messenger's placement at the head of the Chapter 25 formulation. The selection and arrangement of the other figures, however, remains obscure.

Another, albeit peculiar, presentation of the Five Fathers can be found in Chapter 148 "On the Five Books, that they belong to Five Fathers." In this chapter, Mani is supposed to have associated "five" of his books with the "Fathers of Light" (1 Ke 355.6–7). While the Living Gospel is attributed to the Messenger and the Treasure of Life to the Column of Glory, the three writings, Pragmateia, Book of Mysteries, and Book of [64] This example is further complicated by the fact that some of its irregular features may indicate that the compiler may have been drawing on some very early material. For example, the brevity of the chapter indicates that it may be an early "proto-kephalaic" formulation. In addition, the fact that the first father is identified simply as the "Messenger" rather than the "Third Messenger" parallels a detail which can be found in Theodore bar Khonai's account. Similarly, the unusual formulation of "Jesus the Beloved" may be derived from some early source.

Giants are attributed to the Light-Twin, forming a kind of trilogy. The Letters, however, are said to be Mani's own gifts. Strangely, no fifth book is named or attributed to a Manichaean divinity. Nor is the seventh of Mani's canonical writings mentioned at all.[65] It appears, however, that an attempt has been made to compress this canonical heptateuch into a pentateuch more in line with the compilers' penchant for five-part structures.[66] The fact that only six books are mentioned as four gifts may be due to scribal error,[67] since the construction of such a six-four formulation runs contrary to the compilers' penchant for pentadic redaction. Nevertheless, the enumeration of the Fathers appears equally puzzling, since it too is at variance with the three previously discussed formulations.

Finally, there seems to have been an additional discussion of the Five Fathers in Chapter 191 "There are Five Properties in the Image of our Apostle symbolizing the Five Light Fathers," which unfortunately is entirely obscured by lacunae. At most, a general outline of the discourse can be reconstructed as enumerating Five "Properties" and Five other qualities:

CHAPTER 191 SCHEMA:

INTRO: Again he spoke to his disciples …

DISCOURSE: There are Five Properties in the Image …
1) First Property is humility
2) [Second Property …?]
3) Third [Property …?]
4) [Fourth Property] … my Image
5) Fifth [Property] is my light-wisdom.

[Five other things? …]
1) [First …]
2) [Second …]
3) [Third …]

[65] That the Manichaean canon contained seven writings is known from 1Ke 5.21–33, 2Ps. 46f., 139f., and Hom 25.2–5, as well as al-Nadīm and the Chinese Compendium (Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 62; Gardner and Lieu, Manichaean Texts from the Roman Empire, 153–156).

[66] That they succeeded in altering the canon is independently verified by Augustine's Contra Felicem, 1.14 (Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 63; see esp. Tardieu's table on page 64).

[67] See Funk 1Ke 335, who suggests that the Psalms and Prayers could have been named before the Letters. If, however, the title was added only later, then we need not assume that the chapter itself was intentionally structured in five-parts (Funk, personal communication).

4) [Fourth …]
5) Fifth is my light-wisdom.

CONCLUSION: I have given victory … over all Sects …

While there is no way of knowing what identity and role the Five Fathers were given in this chapter, it appears as though the emphasis was placed on the qualities attributable to Mani.

As we have seen, the Kephalaia compilers present five formulations of the Five Fathers, four of which can be read. Each of these formulations, however, presents a different sequence of Fathers:

Chapter 7	Chapter 20	Chapter 25	Chapter 148
Father of Greatness	Father of Greatness	Messenger	Messenger
Third Messenger	Third Messenger	Beloved of Lights	Column of Glory
Jesus the Splendour	Jesus the Splendour	Mother of Life	Light Twin
Light-Mind	Column of Glory	Jesus the Beloved	—?
Light-form	Light Mind	Virgin of Light	Mani

While the (Third) Messenger is the only figure found in all four formulations, there are nonetheless some similarities between Chapters 7 and 20 and Chapters 25 and 148. On the one hand, Chapters 7 and 20 appear the most similar, varying only in positions four and five, while Chapters 25 and 148 place the Messenger in the first position.

What then should we make of these variations?[68] While the compilers were obviously using and building upon some kind of earlier material, it is difficult to imagine that a truly canonical series would be subject to such a degree of malleability, given the rigidity with which other series such are the Five Sons are maintained. Nevertheless, given the fact that we find the same expression "Fathers of Light" used in the Psalm-Book (see 2 Ps. 8.8; 36.15; 73.8; 84.29; 202.12) and the Cologne Mani Codex (33.2), we may assume that it was an epithet that existed as part of a canonical Manichaean tradition and was probably used by Mani himself as a general designation for any number of divine beings.[69] That these Fathers of Light came to be thought of in terms of five-part series is likely an additional by-product of the process of pentadic redaction so evident in the Kephalaia. The fact that there are so many variant formulations, however, would seem to represent the various attempts at clarification and elaboration of this quasi-canonical trope, which appears to have been left quite ambiguous and flexible. Perhaps a concept of Five Fathers was needed to balance the recurring image of the Five Sons. Or, perhaps the Five Fathers are an attempt to re-emphasize the fact that the Father is a being endowed with five qualities or Limbs, and as such would have been compelled to send five emissaries into the drama of salvation. Or, the variant formulations might have resulted from an overabundance of hypostases and personages invoked by Mani in his writings—i.e., there were simply too many gods and hypostases to choose from. At any rate, the Kephalaia chapters dealing with the Five Fathers, although frustratingly contradictory, do provide us with an important glimpse into the ongoing and evolutionary process of clarification and systematization of Manichaean discourse undertaken by the Kephalaia compilers. This concept, in particular, appears to have caused considerable confusion and does not appear, at the stage represented by our manuscript at least, to have been resolved.

[68] Unfortunately, other Manichaean Coptic sources provide little in the way of clarification, even though the Fathers of Light are invoked several times in the Psalm-Book. "Bema Psalm 237," however, does enumerate a somewhat ambiguous series of Five Greatnesses of the Fathers involving 1) Mother of Life/First Man, 2) Beloved of Lights/Great Builder, 3) Third Messenger, 4) Column of Glory/Porters, and 5) Virgin/Judge/Light-Mind (2 Ps. 36.20–37.9).

Although only mentioned in one published Kephalaia chapter, the compilers also present a formulation known as the "Five Greatnesses" (ⲧϯⲉ ⲙⲙⲛⲧⲛⲁϭ).[70] According to Chapter 16 "[On the Five] Greatnesses which have [come] out against the Darkness," the entire series of mythical emanations are presented according to a five-stage schema. The "First Greatness" is presented as the Father of Greatness, who has a "solitary existence" (ⲧⲉϥⲟⲩⲥⲓⲁ ⲟⲩⲁⲉⲧϥ) (1 Ke 49.17) in the realm of light. The "Second Greatness" is made up of the Mother of Life, First Man, and the Five Sons of First Man (1 Ke 49.19–23). The "Third Greatness," in turn, contains the Beloved of Lights, Great Builder, and the Living Spirit, along with the Five Sons of the Living Spirit (1 Ke 49.23–25). The "Fourth Greatness" is described as the Third Messenger, the Column of Glory, and (somewhat ambiguously) "all the powers of light who are revealed from him" (ⲛϭⲁⲙ ⲧⲏⲣⲟⲩ ⲛⲟⲩⲁⲩⲓⲛⲉ ⲉⲧⲁⲩⲟⲩⲱⲛϩ [ⲁⲃⲁⲗ ⲙⲙⲁϥ]) (1 Ke 49.26–28). Finally, the "Fifth Greatness" is constituted by Jesus the Splendour and (with similar ambiguity) "all his powers" ([ⲛ]ⲉϥϭⲁⲙ ⲧⲏⲣⲟⲩ) (1 Ke 49.29–31).

[70] The Five Greatnesses are also mentioned in 2 Ps. 136.50.

This formulation varies considerably from the canonical version of the myth known from Theodore bar Khonai. As we have seen, according to his testimony, Mani conceived of his cosmogony as occurring in three emanations, or evocations, each containing three primary figures:

Theodore bar Khonai		Chapter 16
1st Emanation/ Evocation	Father of Greatness Mother of Life First Man 5 Sons of First Man	1st Greatness	Father of Greatness
2nd Emanation/ Evocation	Beloved of Lights Great Builder Living Spirit 5 Sons of Living Spirit	2nd Greatness	Mother of Life First Man 5 Sons of First Man
3rd Emanation/ Evocation	Third Messenger 12 Virgins Jesus the Splendour	3rd Greatness	Beloved of Lights Great Builder Living Spirit 5 Sons of Living Spirit
		4th Greatness	Third Messenger Column of Glory "powers of Light"
		5th Greatness	Jesus the Splendour "all his powers"

As is well known to Manichaean scholars, the third emanation is the most problematic formulation to disentangle.[71] While Theodore states that the Messenger brought forth Twelve Virgins and Jesus the Splendour (although Jesus is not explicitly "called" in Theodore's account), Chapter 7 ("The Seventh, on the Five Fathers") states that the Third Messenger emanated three powers: 1) the Column of Glory/Perfect Man, 2) Jesus the Splendour, and 3) a single Virgin of Light (1 Ke 35.7–17). As we have seen, however, Chapter 16 presents the third emanation as including the Third Messenger, the Column of Glory, and the ambiguous "powers of light" revealed by him (1 Ke 49.26–28). As a result, we are faced with three alternative formulations of the third emanation:

[71] While it is clear that the Messenger is definitely part of the third triad, the remaining two members are ambiguous, since there are essentially three possible candidate: 1) some sort of virgin figure, 2) Jesus the Splendour, and 3) the Column of Glory, also known as the Perfect Man (2 Ps. 133.24–25; 1 Ke 20.15; 24.23; 35.10; 37.3; 155.11).

Theodore bar Khonai	Kephalaia Ch. 7	Kephalaia Ch. 16.
Messenger	Third Messenger	Third Messenger
12 Virgins	Column of Glory/Perfect Man	Column of Glory
Jesus the Splendour	Jesus the Splendour	"powers of light"
	Virgin of Light

While the compilers of Chapter 7, as we saw above, were motivated by a desire to present the Manichaean soteriological narrative through a telescopic five-part frame in which every "father" emanates three other beings, here the compilers of Chapter 16 perform a similar operation by attempting to transform the canonical three-part cosmogonical schema into a five-part formulation. This meant isolating the Father of Greatness from his implicit association with the first emanation and dividing the third emanation into two parts (Greatness Four and Five). The integrity of the second emanation, however, is maintained. This, of course, is another example of the pentadic redaction imposed by the compilers. In this case, the basic frame of the canonical myth is altered from a three-stage to a five-stage formulation. In addition, conflicting accounts of the third evocation point to an inherent ambiguity within the canonical account that appears to have allowed the compilers to so fundamentally alter the basic frame of their cosmogonic discourse.

CHAPTER THREE

THEOLOGICAL PATTERNING II: DARK-REALM

As we have seen, the Kephalaia compilers present a number of five-part patterns associated with the light-realm in order to emphasize the pentadic attributes of its inhabitants as well as the typically five-stage structure of their activities. At the same time, however, they seem to have been equally interested in sorting out the five-part structures associated with the Kingdom of Darkness. Five chapters in particular offer such presentations of the dark-realm: Chapter 6 "On the Five Storehouses which are brought forth from the Land of Darkness from the Beginning; the Five Rulers, the Five Spirits, the Five Bodies, (and) the Five Tastes," Chapter 15 "[On the] … Five [Parts] … World of …," Chapter 27 "On the Five Forms which exist in the Archon(s) of Darkness," Chapter 57 "On the Generation of Adam," and Chapter 69 "On the Twelve Signs of the Zodiac and the Five Stars." As we shall see, the compilers of these chapters were interested in three primary themes—1) the genesis of the dark-realm, 2) the nature of the dark-lord and his companions, and 3) the relation of the dark powers to the zodiac and the planets—which they chose to re-enforce through the use of both theological and literary five-part patterning.

The Evolution of Evil

Unlike the monotheistic theological traditions of Late Antiquity that attempted to arrive at a philosophical solution to the problem of evil by attributing it either to human free-will or divine providence, Manichaeans offered a radically different response in the form of cosmic dualism and attempted to visualize evil by means of vivid mythological images and metaphor. As such, two of the most important presentations of the Land of Darkness from the Kephalaia can be found in Chapter 6 "On the Five Storehouses which are brought forth from the Land of Darkness from the Beginning; the Five Rulers, the Five Spirits, the Five Bodies, (and) the Five Tastes," and Chapter 15 "[On the] … Five [Parts] … World of …." These chapters, which appear to be attempts at a more or less comprehensive description of the dark-realm, contain a literary phenomenon found primarily in association with such sinister contexts that may be termed clustering. This happens when the compiler lumps together a number of associated five-part patterns into one short passage. For instance, in Chapter 6, Mani is made to begin his discourse by saying:

> Five Store-/houses have existed from the beginning in the Land of Darkness. Five / Elements have poured forth from them. Also, from the Five / Elements were fashioned Five Trees, (and) from the Five Trees / were fashioned Five Species of Creatures according to each World, / male and female. But also, the Five Worlds [have] / Five Kings, Five Spirits, [Five] Bodies, (and) Five [Tastes] / according to each world, which do not resemble [one another] (1 Ke 30.17–24).

The function of this cluster is to concisely summarize the stages by which the dark-realm evolved, while at the same time emphasizing its essentially five-part structure. This proposition is even re-enforced by the literary structuring of the introductory passage, which elaborates five basic statements about the dark-realm, with the fifth statement enumerating five items according to the following pattern.

> Statement 1: Five Storehouses exist in the Land of Darkness.
> Statement 2: Five Elements have poured forth from them.
> Statement 3: Five Trees were fashioned from the Five Elements.
> Statement 4: Five Species came from the Five Trees.
> Statement 5: The (1) Five Worlds of Darkness also have (2) Five Kings, (3) Five Spirits, (4) Five Bodies, and (5) Five Tastes.

A similar cluster occurs in Chapter 15, "[On the] … Five [Parts] … World of …":

> The fifth time it spread itself to its offspring that exist [in the Five] / Worlds that were fashioned (and) begotten from the Five / Fruits of Death, which are the Five Worlds of / Flesh, the Five Creations of Darkness which Death established in / them. He spread himself among the Ten Parts, the Five Male Parts and the / Five Female [Parts] … … … (1 Ke 48.17–22).

This passage fits into a more elaborate discourse about the Five "Parts/Times?"[1] that follows a similar structure to that found in the introduction to Chapter 6:

> Part 1: Death-desire …
> Time 2: Five Elements poured fourth …
> Part 3: [Five Trees formed?]

[1] The discourse alternates between enumerating "part" (ⲧⲁϊⲉ) and "time" (ⲥⲁⲡ) in the same five-part list.

Part 4: Five Fruits from Five Trees are Five Worlds.
Time 5: The (1) Five Worlds fashioned from (2) Five Fruits, (3) which are Five Worlds of Flesh, (4), i.e., the Five Creations, distributed in (5) Five Male/Female Parts.

As such, Chapters 6 and 15 present two similar, although variant, accounts of how the Land of Darkness came into being.

Chapter 6	Chapter 15
5 Storehouses	Desire/Death
5 Elements	5 Elements
5 Trees	[5 Trees?]
5 Species of Trees	5 Fruits
5 Worlds, 5 Kings, 5 Spirits, 5 Bodies, 5 Tastes	5 Worlds, 5 Fruits, 5 Flesh, 5 Creations, 5 Parts

Whereas Chapter 6 begins with the Five Storehouses as its point of origin, Chapter 15 begins with a more singular principle known as the "Death-desire" (ⲉⲛⲑⲩⲙⲏⲥⲓⲥ ⲛⲧⲉ ⲡⲙⲟⲩ) (1 Ke 47.34). From this principle, which is essentially a synonym for "Matter" (ϩⲩⲗⲏ) (1 Ke 129.11; 180.15–16), emerge the remaining structures of the dark-realm. In this way the origin of evil is viewed as a generative process in which the Five Dark Elements, spurred on by the evil principle (variously known as Desire, Death, or Matter), develop according to an "organic" process analogous to natural phenomena such as the growth of trees and the production of fruit.

Both Chapter 6 and Chapter 15 present conceptions of the dark-realm which may be related to different streams of Manichaean canonical tradition. For example, Chapter 15 can be compared to the close association between the terms "Matter," "Desire," and "Darkness" known to Ephraim (4th cent. CE), who records that Mani "constructed (the theory) that sometimes Matter (hylē) (ⲕⲗⲟⲙ) displayed purposive thought" (ⲕϩⲧⲥⲥⲧ) [Reeves #3]), while Titus of Bostra (4th cent. CE) (Contra manichaeos, 1.6), Theodoret (5th cent. CE), and Severus of Antioch (6th cent. CE) (likely drawing upon the same canonical source) state that "Matter" and "Darkness" were co-referential terms (89–90 [Reeves]). Theodoret also records that "Matter later divided itself into multiple worlds (αἰῶσι) and its fruits among them" (Kugener/Cumont, 152). Such presumably canonical accounts, however, can be contrasted with other statements from Theodore bar Khonai (8th cent. CE) and al-Nadīm (10th cent. CE), which both place Darkness and its Five Worlds at the beginning of their cosmogonies (Theodore bar Khonai 313.18–21 [Scher]; Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]). In this way, Chapter 15's account can be seen to resemble fragments of canonical tradition from the 4th and 5th centuries CE, while Chapter 5's account is similar to later 8th and 10th century CE accounts. This implies not only that Titus, Theodoret, and Severus drew upon a different source than Theodore and al-Nadim, but also that Chapters 6 and 15 may have drawn upon similarly distinct material.

At any rate, in spite of these differences, the fact that the evolution of the dark-realm is elaborated by the Kephalaia compilers in both chapters as occurring in five basic stages accords well with parallel structures applied to the activities of the light-realm and fits with their general project of pentadic redaction. The fact that these descriptions contain clusters of five-part series is likely meant to draw special attention to the fact that the Kingdom of Darkness is also infused with patterns parallel to those of the Land of Light.

King(s) of Darkness

Just as beings from the Land of Light are often grouped by the compilers into five-part series, the same holds true for the inhabitants of the Kingdom of Darkness. In fact, figuring out the nature of such tenebrous groupings seems to have been a theological issue of great interest to the Kephalaia compilers. One of the best examples of this preoccupation can again be found in Chapter 6, which states that it was the King of the World of Smoke as the "chief of all evil and [all] wickedness" (1 Ke 30.27–28), who "waged war with the Light" and "did battle with the exalted kingdom" (1 Ke 30.32–33). He is said to possess five sets of characteristics: 1) five zoomorphic forms (1 Ke 30.34–31.1), 2) five evil qualities of darkness, stench, ugliness, bitterness, and fire (1 Ke 31.3–6), 3) a body "harder than all iron, brass, and steel" (1 Ke 31.14), "magic arts" (1 Ke 31.17), and the ability to understand the speech and signs of all his minions (1 Ke 32.1–8), 4) he is insect-like, with a thundering voice, and short-sighted, and 5) his body is gold, his taste is salty, and his spirit rules the powers of the world.

	1) 5 Forms	2) 5 (forms)	3) Other	4) Also …	5) Signs
King of Smoke	head lion-faced	Darkness	hard body	insect like	gold body
	hands & feet demon-faced	Stench	kills w/ magic	thunder voice	salty taste

	tail fish-faced	Fire

This rather vivid description of the dark-lord, however, reveals a number of editorial seams. For instance, the compiler is not quite sure what to call the chief ruler, whom he variously names as "King of the World of Smoke" (ⲡⲣⲣⲟ ⲙⲡⲕⲟⲥⲙⲟⲥ ⲙⲡⲕⲁⲡⲛⲟⲥ [1 Ke 30.25]), "Archon of Smoke" (ⲡⲁⲣⲭⲱⲛ ⲙⲡⲕⲁ[ⲡⲛⲟⲥ] [1 Ke 31.12]), "King (of those) of Darkness" (ⲡⲣⲣⲟ ⲛⲛⲁⲡⲕⲉⲕⲉ [1 Ke 30.33; 31.2, 27–28; 32.1, 14; 33.2, 5]) or simply "King of Darkness" (ⲡⲣⲣⲟ ⲙⲡⲕⲉⲕⲉ [1 Ke 31.24]). Remarkably, in much the same way as Chapter 21's description of the ruler of the light-realm (see above), there appears to be interwoven into this depiction of the dark lord two passages with which parallels have been identified in the Mandaean Right Ginza:[2]

Passage A: Manichaean

Kephalaia, 30.34–31.1: His head [is lion-faced, his] hands and feet are demon- [and devil-]faced, [his] shoulders are eagle-faced, while his belly [is dragon-faced,] (and) his tail is fished-faced.

Mandaean

Right Ginza, 280: His head is that of a lion, his body is that of a serpent, his wings are those of an eagle, his sides are those of a tortoise, his hands and feet are those of a demon (trans. from Puech).

[2] This is an identification already made by Polotsky in the 1940 edition. See translations of this passage by Lidzbarski, Ginza, 278 and Puech, "Le prince des ténèbres," 113. Puech believed that the Mandaean passage was based on the Manichaean, due to what he called "la gaucherie" of the prior (114). Yet, the Manichaean passage is no less (if not more) "gauche" in the way in which the compiler incorporated this outside material. Rather, the Manichaean passage seems more like a development of the Mandaean. It is, however, possible that both passages drew on some unknown antecedent.

Passage B: Manichaean	Mandaean
Kephalaia, 32.15–20: When it pleases him to walk, he spreads out all his limbs, and he walks. When it comes to his mind, he draws in his limbs and takes them to himself and rolls them into one another and he falls down like a grape or a great iron ball. He is terrible in his voice, he causes fear (and) frightens his powers with his voice.	Right Ginza, 280: When it pleases him, he dilates his body; when it pleases him, he makes himself small. He draws in his members and spreads them again … his appearance is horrible, his body rank, his face distorted (trans. from Puech).

Passage A, in fact, does have a precedent in Manichaean canonical tradition, since al-Nadīm attributes the following description of Satan to Mani: "His head is the head of a lion and his body like the body of a dragon (great serpent). His wing is like the wing of a bird, his tail like the tail of a great fish, and his four feet like the feet of a beast of burden" (Fihrist, 778 [Dodge]). Moreover, an additional witness to this zoomorphic description can be found in Kephalaia Chapter 27 "On the Five Forms which exist in the Archon of Darkness" (1 Ke 77.29–78.1):

> As for the Archon, the leader of all the powers / [of Darkness], there are [Five Forms] in his body, according to / [the form] of the seal [of the Five] Creations which exist in the Five / Worlds of Darkness. His head has the face of a lion and / originated from [the] World of Fire. His wings and his / [shoulders] have the face of an eagle, according to the form of the Sons of Wind. / [His hands] and [his feet] are demons, according to the form / [of the Sons] of the World of Smoke. His belly has the face of / [a dragon, according to the form of] the World of Darkness. His tail [has] / the form of the fish, which belongs to [the World of the] Sons of Water. These / Five Forms are found in him; they [have come] from the Five [Creations] / of the Five Worlds of Darkness (1 Ke 77.26–78.3).

This means that we are faced with four variant descriptions of the dark-lord, each of which is expressed in five-parts.

Al-Nadīm	Kephalaia Ch. 6	Kephalaia Ch. 27	Right Ginza, 280
head of lion	head lion-faced	head lion-faced	head of lion
body of dragon	hands/feet demon-faced	wings eagle-faced	body of serpent
wing of bird	shoulders eagle-faced	hands/feet demons	wings of eagle
tail of fish	belly dragon-faced	belly dragon-faced	sides of tortoise
feet of beast	tail fish-faced	tail fish-faced	hands/feet of demon

There is obviously a complicated relationship between these accounts. On the one hand the descriptions from Kephalaia Chapters 6 and 27

are essentially the same, varying only slightly in the order of their terminology,[3] while on the other hand, the descriptions preserved by al-Nadīm and the Right Ginza agree in all but two of their features. Interestingly, however, a variant from the Mandaean description, i.e., the demonic hands and feet, is preserved by both Kephalaia accounts. All that we may assume is that a zoomorphic description of some sort did exist as part of Manichaean canonical tradition, although the exact composition of that description remains elusive.[4] After all, it seems difficult to privilege al-Nadīm's testimony from the 10th century, even if he claims to quote Mani directly, over 4th or 5th century descriptions from the Kephalaia.

What then, are we to make of such variations? Perhaps the compiler felt that the canonical description available to him did not achieve the desired effect, or, perhaps he was so impressed by the other account that he sought to weave it into is own literary creation—with mixed results. At any rate, the compiler seems to have been confronted by two problems: first, how to describe the chief ruler of darkness, and second, how to name him while still preserving the canonical order of dark worlds established by Mani.

Unfortunately for the compiler, Mani's description of the dark-realm, even if it did include some sort of zoomorphic description of the dark-lord, seems to have been ambiguous at best. Theodore bar Khonai, for instance, simply records that "the Evil Nature he calls 'King of Darkness' and he says that he dwelt in the Land of Darkness with his Five Worlds: the World of Smoke, the World of Fire, the World of Wind, the World of Water, and the World of Darkness" (313.18–21 [Scher]), as does al-Nadīm (Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]). A certain amount of ambiguity even seems to have surrounded the nature of the term "World" as applied to the regions of Darkness, since according to Theodore bar Khonai, Mani employed the Syriac term ܥܠܡ (ʿālam) which can mean either "world" or "age."[5] Augustine, reacting to the so-called Fundamental Epistle variously described these entities as saecula (De natura boni, 42) and naturae (Fundamental Epistle, Frag. 6b). In De moribus, however, Augustine seems to have imagined them as caves (antra) (2.19), which may dimly reflect the notion of "storehouses" (ταμιεῖα) known to the Kephalaia and Simplicius (35.65–66 [Adam]). Cumont's suggestion that the Latin term saecula was selected via the Greek αἰῶνες[6] seems to be confirmed from what is beginning to be known about the Coptic translation of Mani's Living Gospel (from the Synaxeis codex) in which the Five shekinahs of the light-realm are called ⲛⲁⲓⲱⲛ.[7] At any rate, few specific details other than their order are given about the structure, activities, or inhabitants of these dark worlds in known canonical accounts. For instance, a fragment from the Fundamental Epistle[8] preserved by Augustine, describes the five regions of the land of darkness (this time in reverse order) impressionistically as > deep and of immeasurable extent; in it reside fiery bodies, baneful breeds. Here, emanating out of the same principle came a boundless and incalculable darkness, together with its own progeny. Beyond the darkness lay filthy whirling waters with their inhabitants; further within were terrifying and violent storms with their ruler and progenitors. Next followed another fiery region, a prey to destruction, with its leaders and peoples. In the same way there lived inside it a breed filled with gloom and smoke, among whom loitered the horrible ruler and leader of all these worlds, who had congregated around himself innumerable princes, and he himself was the spirit and source of all of them (trans. Hendry).[9]

[3] Presumably "wings" and "shoulders" are meant to designate the same feature of the dark-lord.

[4] Mani does seem to have described evil entities in zoomorphic terms in his Shabuhragan, where he makes reference to "two lion-shaped archdemons" (Klimkeit, Gnosis on the Silk Road, 223).

[5] Cumont, Recherches I, 11 n. 3.

In addition, Severus of Antioch recorded a statement about how "all the members of the Tree of Darkness … rose up and ascended with numerous powers impossible to calculate."[10] Such descriptions drawn apparently from canonical writings do not achieve the clarity and specificity sought by the Kephalaia compilers. This ambiguity is (pardon the pun) in stark contrast to the light-realm, where the Father of Greatness, as we have seen, dwells with his Five Limbs, and from which emanates a well-known cast of characters including the First Man and his Five Sons, the Living Spirit and his Five Sons, as well as the Third Ambassador, the Virgin of Light, and Jesus the Splendour. It would seem then that the compiler of Chapter 6 for some reason felt compelled to clarify just what Mani meant by his seemingly abbreviated, or simply ambiguous, description of the dark-realm and to create a greater degree of parallelism with the World of Light. His efforts, however, left a number of obvious traces.

In order to frame and re-enforce this clarification, the compiler of Chapter 6 gave five-part structures a central compositional role. In the first place, the chapter title (which may in fact have been added at some later stage of the textual history) somewhat awkwardly enumerates five sets of five to be discussed in the chapter, namely, 1) the Five Storehouses, 2) the Five Rulers, 3) the Five Spirits, 4) the Five Bodies, and 5) the Five Tastes, while (as we have seen) the introductory frame re-emphasizes the thematic centrality of five by means of a cluster of five statements (see above). Then, the central discourse begins, which is itself divided into five parts dealing with the five Kings of Darkness, with (as we have also seen) the section about the King of the World of Smoke itself divided into five parts:

1) King of the World of Smoke, chief of evil (1 Ke 30.25–33)
   1) 5 Forms are in him (1 Ke 30.33–31.2)
      i) head lion-faced
      ii) hands-/ feet demon-/ devil-faced
      iii) shoulders eagle-faced
      iv) belly dragon-faced
      v) tail fish-faced
   2) Also, 5 (additional) forms in him (1 Ke 31.3–7)
      i) darkness
      ii) stench
      iii) ugliness
      iv) bitterness
      v) fire
   3) 3 other things (1 Ke 31.8–32.13)
      i) body is harder than any metal
      ii) kills with his magic arts
         (Interpolated admonition [?]: Keep away from magic!
            [1 Ke 31.24–33])
      iii) knows languages of 5 worlds
   4) Also, (1 Ke 32.14–32.30)
      i) he can spread out his limbs or draw them in like an insect.
      ii) his voice is terrible like thunder
      iii) he can't see what is far away
   5) These are his evil signs and symbols (1 Ke 32.30–33.8)
      i) his body is gold
      ii) his taste is salty
      iii) he rules over the powers and authorities of the world.

2) The King of the Worlds of Fire (1 Ke 33.9–17)
   i) lion-faced
   ii) brass body
   iii) sour taste
   iv) his spirit rules the kings of the world and the fire-worshiping sect

3) The King of the Worlds of Wind (1 Ke 33.18–24)
   i) eagle-faced
   ii) iron body
   iii) hot taste
   iv) his spirit rules idol-worshipers

4) The King of the World of Water (1 Ke 33.25–32)
   i) fish-faced
   ii) silver body
   iii) sweet taste
   iv) his spirit rules the baptists

5) The King of the World of Darkness (1 Ke 33.33–34.1)
   i) dragon-faced
   ii) tin body
   iii) bitter taste
   iv) his spirit rules oracles and soothsayers

The descriptions of the Five Kings in Chapter 6 may be summarized by the following table, which reveals that structurally the chapter as a whole enumerates five sets of five: 1) five rulers, 2) five faces, 3) five bodies, 4) five tastes, and 5) spirits or sphere of influence:

5 rulers	5 faces	5 bodies	5 tastes	5 spirits (rule)
(King of Smoke)	(all-faced)	(gold body)	(salty taste)	(powers that be)
King of Fire	lion-faced	brass body	sour taste	fire-worshipers
King of Wind	eagle-faced	iron body	hot taste	idol-worshipers
King of Water	fish-faced	silver body	sweet taste	baptists
King of Darkness	dragon-faced	tin body	bitter taste	oracles etc.

While the concept of Five Worlds of Darkness is relatively well attested in canonical sources (Theodore bar Khonai 313.19 [Scher]; implied by Fundamental Epistle, Frag. 6b; al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]),[11] in the Kephalaia they are known not only as "Five Worlds of Darkness" (1 Ke 31.2; 32.2; 48.17; 48.15; 58.9; 74.29; 77.28; 78.3; 167.23; 169.10;

[11] We cannot say, however, as Gardner and Lieu have recently suggested, that "elaborate descriptions of the kingdom of darkness, and its powers, are a feature of Manichaean … writings that must derive from canonical sources" (Manichaean Texts from the Roman Empire, 199).

169.13), but also as "Five Worlds of Flesh" (1 Ke 26.33; 48.19; 121.20; 123.3; 177.18; 266.14) and "Five Storehouses" (1 Ke 28.8; 30.13; 30.17; 155.19). The explicit idea of Five Kings or Archons is known almost exclusively from Chapter 6,[12] where they are also called the "Five Spirits" (1 Ke 30.15; 30.23; 34.9). This, in itself, may not be that surprising given the confusion that seems to have been created for the compiler of Chapter 6,[13] who (as we saw above) found it difficult to reconcile the title "King of Darkness" with the fact that "smoke" is the first of the canonical Five Dark Elements. Nevertheless, the need to dissect the chief ruler of darkness into five sub-rulers is essentially a reflection of the compiler's desire to identify and attribute a particular governing spirit or authority to what he perceived as five spheres of negative influence in the world. In the end, this association serves as the take-home message of this particular chapter.

The danger of these Five Spirits is emphasized at the end of Chapter 6, where we find a grave admonition placed in the mouth of Mani: "Therefore I tell you, my brothers and my members, perfect faithful and holy elect: Keep your hearts with you and keep yourselves from the Five Slaveries of the Five Dark Spirits. Abandon the worship of their Five Bodies. Do not interact with them, so that you might escape their bond and their punishment forever" (1 Ke 34.6–12). This passage needs to be placed in its social context if it is to become comprehensible. As such, the King of the World of Smoke, the chief, is said to rule over the "powers and authorities of the earth and the whole world … those who rule over all of creation, as they humble people in their tyranny according to their will" (1 Ke 33.6–8), a reference that could conceivably be applied to authorities in both the Persian and Rome Empires. The King of the World of Fire is said to rule the "kings of the world" as well as the "Sects who worship fire" (1 Ke 33.15–17), no doubt a more explicit reference to the Sassanian Kings and their Zoroastrian clergy. The King of the World of Wind, in turn, rules in "every temple, eidoleion, place of worship, statues and images, shrines of worldly Error" (1 Ke 33.22–24), presumably those who follow the traditional cults. The King of the World of Water is said to rule "those who baptize with water" (1 Ke 33.31), a reference to Christians, Elchasaites, or perhaps even Mandaeans, while the King of the World of Darkness can be found in the utterances of soothsayers, oracles, and seers (1 Ke 34.3–4), seemingly the more popular religious practices of the time. The compiler's effort to associate a dark ruler with each of these spheres of influences was probably driven by a desire either to draw, or more likely, to keep members of the Manichaean church away from them and in the fold. After the withdrawal of Persian imperial support, which resulted in Mani's execution in 276/277 CE, his community experienced a period of harsh repression, persecution, and no doubt apostasy. As a result there would have been a strong desire, on the part of Manichaean teachers, missionaries, and catechists, to clearly define the dangers associated with these oppressive and competing spheres of political and religious influence, and to do so in a way that contributed to and strengthened the coherence and symmetry of the Manichaean system. Therefore, as Manichaean missionaries and catechists moved from Mesopotamia into Egypt and the Kephalaia (as we know it) began to take shape, numerical patterns, especially in terms of five-part structures, played a key role in how this coherence and symmetry was achieved and communicated.

[13] This may even represent an innovation on the part of the Chapter 6 compiler.

Astrological Polemic

The third major theme addressed by the Kephalaia compilers in their descriptions of the dark-realm is the relation of the dark-powers, specifically the Five Worlds of Darkness, to the twelve signs of the Zodiac and the seven planetary powers. While there are references to the "Twelve Spirits of Error" in Chapter 15 "[On the] … Five [Parts] … World of …" (1 Ke 48.34) and anthropomorphic accounts of their cosmic distribution in Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos" (1 Ke 173.21–175.4), the most explicit description of the relationship between the dark powers and the Zodiac can be found in Chapter 69 "On the Twelve Signs of the Zodiac and the Five Stars." In this chapter the disciples question Mani about what powers rule over the Zodiac and the so-called "Five Stars." In response, Mani is made to begin his discourse with an (unsuccessful) attempt at distributing the twelve signs in pairs to the Five Worlds of Darkness, which inevitably leads to the attribution of three signs to two of the worlds.

> This, however, is how it should be understood: They / are drawn from the Five Worlds of Darkness, are bound in the / Sphere, and two zodiacal signs are taken per world. The Twin[14] / and the Archer[15] belong to the World of Smoke, which / is the Mind. Also, the Ram[16] and the Lion[17] belong to the / World of Fire. The Bull,[18] the Water-bearer,[19] and the Scales,[20] / belong to the World of Wind. The Crab[21] and the Virgin[22] / and the Fish[23] belong to the World of Water. The Goat-horn[24] / and the Scorpion[25] belong to the World of Darkness. These are / [the] twelve Archons of wickedness, those who wickedness does not / … … For they commit every evil and / … [in the] world, either in the tree or in the flesh (1 Ke 167.22–167.33).

Following this, each of the "Five Stars" (i.e., planets) is associated with a particular dark world: 1) Zeus/Jupiter to Smoke, 2) Aphrodite/Venus to Fire, 3) Ares/Mars to Wind, 4) Hermes/Mercury to Water, and 5) Kronos/Saturn to Darkness (1 Ke 167.34–168.6). Then, in the third section of the discourse, the signs are divided according to the quadrants of the sky (1 Ke 168.16–23).

What follows is a sort of astronomical revisionism, whereby the Sun and Moon, normally counted among the seven planets by ancient astronomy but cherished by Manichaeans as Light-ships, are substituted by "Two Ascendants." According to Chapter 69, Mani is made to state that "these seven, which we have named—the Five Stars and the Two Ascendants (ⲁⲛⲁⲃⲓⲃⲁⲍⲱⲛ)—they are the evil-doers who perpetuate every wickedness and evil in every single land" (1 Ke 168.11–13).

According to Roger Beck, the anabibazon is an astronomical concept that represents, along with the katabibazon, the two points (or "nodes") at which the orbits of the Sun and Moon intersect on a monthly basis.[26] According to Beck, this seemingly straightforward astronomical concept may have been interpreted in a sinister light by Manichaeans due to the fact that it is at one of these two points that eclipses of the Sun and Moon may occur.[27] In addition, the fact that these nodes appear to "move" led to their being considered as quasi-planets and to their eventual incorporation into late antique astrology as the "head and tail" of a great dragon responsible for eclipses.[28] Moreover, in Zoroastrian tradition, the nodes came to represent a "Dark Sun" and "Dark Moon" that acted as agents of Ahriman.[29] Yet according to Beck, this reference to the anabibazontes in the Kephalaia likely represents the "earliest unambiguous attested instance of the demonization of the lunar nodes."[30] This became necessary due to the fact that Manichaean theology demanded the removal of the Sun and Moon from the standard series of seven planets,[31] thereby requiring substitutes in the form of the anabibazontes. The substitution, however, remains somewhat awkward, given the fact that, while the compiler of Chapter 69 is determined to associate five of the planets with the Five Worlds of Darkness, ancient astronomy recognized seven. Without this substitution of the Sun and Moon by the nodes Manichaeans would have appeared to violate ancient astronomical koinē, thereby discrediting any claims to astronomical orthodoxy, especially in Mesopotamia where rival religious groups such as Zoroastrians and Mandaeans appears to have been steeped in astrological speculations.[32] Yet even in spite of Manichaean efforts to talk about astronomical concepts, observers such as Alexander of Lycopolis and, later, Augustine remained unconvinced.[33] That [28] Beck, "Anabibazontes," 194. Seventh century CE Syriac author Severus Sebokht explained that this dragon is known as the athalia (ܐܬܠܝܐ) (Nau, "La cosmographie," 253–254), a term attested in both the Manichaean Psalm-Book (2 Ps. 196.8: ⲁⲑⲁⲗⲓⲁ) and Syriac Manichaean fragments (Burkitt, Religion of the Manichees, 114: ܐܬܠܝܐ). According to his description of Indian astronomy, al-Biruni states that "the dragon's head" is counted among the unlucky stars by the Hindus (India, 212 [Sachau]).

[31] Mani attributed his recognition of the true nature of the Sun and Moon to Jesus in a fragment preserved by al-Biruni (India, 284 [Sachau]).

[32] Mandaeans, for instance, spoke about the "seven and the twelve" as malevolent powers (Widengren, Mani, 69).

[33] Alexander joked that Manichaeans should have "occasionally visited the astronomers" (Contra Manichaei opiniones disputatio, 22), while Augustine could not reconcile his private study of astronomy with Manichaean teachings (cited by Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 178). See also Ferrari, "Astronomy and Augustine," 263–276, who suggests that eclipses witnessed by Augustine played a role in his break with Manichaeism.

Manichaeans were "amateurs" in astrology[34] does in fact appear to be the case when we do a close reading of Kephalaia Chapter 69, which contains significant compositional or editorial flaws.[35] Similarly, the following chapter, Chapter 70 "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the Cosmos," contains two conflicting melothesiac[36] descriptions of the Zodiac:

Signs of the Zodiac	Description A: 1 Ke 174.3–10	Description B: 1 Ke 174.21–175.2
Ram / Aries	Head	Right Temple
Bull / Taurus	Neck & Shoulders	Right Shoulder
Twin / Gemini	2 Forearms	Right Forearm
Crab / Cancer	Oesophagus	Right Rib
Lion / Leo	Stomach	Right Stomach
Virgin / Virgo	Heart	Right Intestines
Scales / Libra	Spine & Intestines	Left Belly
Water-bearer / Aquarius	Shinbones	Left Shoulder
Fish / Pisces	Soles of feet	Left Temple

This chapter, which as Gardner has suggested was likely drawn from "a number of separate sources,"[37] although re-enforcing the compiler's anthropomorphic view of the cosmos, does little to establish his credentials as a serious astrologer.

What then are we to make of this lively, although somewhat incoherent, interest in astrological speculation? Stegemann suggested that the association of the signs of the Zodiac with the Five Worlds was some kind of game with the aspects intended to show the adversarial relationship of the signs to one another.[38] This explanation, however, seems too obscure and technical to have generated any real meaning, even to an educated Manichaean Elect. Instead, I would suggest that the aim of Chapter 69 might not have been astrological at all, but rather polemi-

[34] Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 179.

[35] Such as the attribution of three signs to two of the five worlds.

[36] A similar concept relating the parts of the body to the Zodiac is described by al-Biruni in his chapter on Indian astronomy (India, 218 [Sachau]). Nagel compared these arrangements to melothesiac lists from the Apocryphon of John, although these are not put in relation to the Zodiac ("Anatomie des Menschen," 91). According to Nagel, such formulations are a reflection of the tendency (or "mania" for that matter) of Manichaean discourse for typology, analogy, harmony, and symmetry ("Anatomie des Menschen," 91).

cal. As we have seen, the compilers went to great lengths in Chapter 6 to associate each of the Five Dark Worlds with particular spheres of political or religious influence. Thus, it is possible that a similar manoeuvre is at least being attempted in Chapter 69. For example, while in Chapter 6 the World of Smoke was associated with Roman and Sasanian imperial authorities, Chapter 69's attribution of the Twin (Gemini) and the Archer (Sagittarius) may involve a similar symbolic association. Similarly, the association of the Crab (Cancer), the Virgin (Virgo) and the Fish (Pisces) with the World of Water, could reflect Chapter 6's association of this world with rival Christian and "Baptist" groups. This interpretation (already implied by Khosroyev),[39] although highly speculative, seems at least plausible, given the penchant of the compilers for associating mythological formations with concrete social realities. After all, allegorical interpretations of the signs are known in Jewish,[40] Judaeo-Christian,[41] Gnostic,[42] mainstream Christian,[43] and even Mithraic[44] circles, and the planets themselves were sometimes associated by Hellenistic astrologers with particular religious groups.[45]

At any rate, regardless of whatever polemical or scientific intentions may have been behind such formulations, it is at least clear that the Kephalaia compilers, like so many other aspects of reality, viewed the astrological powers as basically pentadic in structure. This is emphasized also by a passage from Chapter 57 "On the Generation of Adam," where (also in the form of a cluster) Mani is made to describe how

In this chapter a certain Babylonian catechumen has questioned Mani about why the lifespan of Adam and his generation seemed so much longer than the people of their time. Mani is made to respond by saying that Five Authorities rule the various life-spans of beings in the world, from year to month to day to hour to minute. The fact that people's lives are becoming increasingly short means that the end is near and that their light substance is dwindling. Whereas Adam and Eve were full of light substance, their lives were longer, they were larger, and produced more offspring, contemporary people are small, ugly and evil, meaning that they are nearly void of light. While this discourse is meant to address the apparent discrepancy between the life-spans of biblical figures and later generations, the explanation is framed by a pentadic conception of both the astrological powers and their influence on history, which is itself conceived of has having five phases. This, of course, represents yet another example of the pervasive emphasis on five-part structures presented by the compilers.

This desire to present a set of astrological speculations based on pentads, although no doubt influenced by the same pentadization process observed above, was also driven in this case by a systemic contradiction generated by Manichaean veneration of the Sun and Moon and their generally negative evaluation of five of the canonical seven planets. In this way, the pentadization of the planets can be seen less as a stylistic or ideological preference and more as a response to a genuine doctrinal problem.

But why go to such great lengths to emphasize the pentadic structure of the powers of Darkness if this is already a quality possessed by the powers of Light? On the doctrinal level, the system appears to demand it, particularly when, as in the image of the Two Trees, the natures are depicted as essentially symmetrical in orientation, with parallel sets of Five Limbs attached to two coeternal sources of being. Besides, as we have seen, Mani himself appears to have described the Land of Darkness as made up of Five Elemental Worlds, although, unlike the Realm of Light, he seems to have left fewer clues as to what impact such a structure had on other aspects of evil. Thus, the Kephalaia compilers were forced to build upon and expand existing material. One particularly difficult issue for the compilers seems to have been the way in which Mani ordered the Dark Elements, with Smoke first and Darkness last. This, as we saw in Chapter 6, caused a great deal of confusion for the compiler, who found it difficult to reconcile a being called "King of Darkness" with the fact that the World of Darkness came fifth in the canonical series. Similarly, the relation of the Sun and Moon to the planets also caused a theological quandary. Such traces of conflicting and contradictory ideas indicated that even at the stage when the surviving text was being edited, the Kephalaia compilers were still engaged in sorting out some of the difficulties contained within the canonical tradition.

CHAPTER FOUR

OTHER TYPES OF PATTERNING

Aside from five-part patterns dealing with specific structural and operational aspects of either the light or dark realms, a variety of other pentadic formulations can also be found in the Kephalaia dealing with a range of 1) soteriological, 2) ethical 3) ecclesiological, 4) polemical, and 5) aetiological themes.

Soteriological Patterning

The Kephalaia compilers' efforts to present general soteriological themes in five-parts is evident in Chapter 13 "On the Five Saviours, Resurrectors of the Dead, along with the Five Resurrections," Chapter 16b (On the Five Advents), Chapter 18 "[On the Five] Wars [which the] Sons of Light waged with [the Sons] of Darkness," Chapter 19 "On the Five Releases; what they mean," Chapter 103 "On the Five Wonderworks that the Light-Mind reveals to the Elect," Chapter 112b (On the Five Things Revealed by Jesus), and Chapter 176 "On the Spiritual Transition in Five(?) Forms and that through which the Church changes."

Chapter 13 presents a series of "Five Resurrecting Saviours" (ϯογ ⲛⲥ̅ⲏ̅ⲣ ⲛⲣⲉϥⲧⲟⲩⲛⲟⲩⲥ) (1 Ke 45.17), although the fragmentation of the text allows for the identification of only the third and fourth. In this series, the Father is placed in third position, which appears strange given the importance usually accorded to him as the foundation of all subsequent being, while Light-Mind is placed in fourth position.

In Chapter 18, the confrontation with the dark-realm is presented as a series of "[Five] Wars" ([ϯογ] ⲙⲡⲟⲗⲉⲙⲟⲥ)[1] waged by the "Sons of Light" (ⲛⲱⲏⲣⲉ ⲙⲡⲟⲩⲁⲓⲛⲉ) (1 Ke 58.2–3). Here an additional series of "five sons" is created, although this time using primary actors not normally designated as "sons" such as First Man, the Living Spirit, Third Messenger, Jesus the Splendour, and Call & Response. Again, as in Chapter 16, the three-part canonical version of the myth is transformed into a series of five conflicts. Interestingly, the same five figures appear in Chapter 16b[2] as a series of five "advents" (ⲛⲟⲓⲛⲉⲓ), with the "advent" of each agent assigned to a particular metaphor. The advent of First Man, for instance, is compared to a noble son deceived by his enemies (1 Ke 50.19–20), while the advent of the Living Spirit is compared to a judge sent by a king to quell an insurrection (1 Ke 50.28 ff.). The advent of the Third Messenger, in turn, is likened to a king who comes to inspect the work of his artisans (1 Ke 52.22 ff.), while the advent of Jesus the Splendour evokes the image of a man sent to root out and burn evil trees (1 Ke 53.19–27). Finally, the advent of Call & Response is compared to the homely image of butter being melted into warm milk (1 Ke 54.26 ff.). Chapter 19 again presents the same series, only this time it is identified as the "Five Releases" (ⲧⲧⲉ ⲛⲟⲓⲛⲣⲃⲁⲗ) or "Liberations" (ⲛⲟⲓⲛⲧⲟⲩⲱ). The fragmentary state of the chapter has obscured many of the details, but in general we find here an additional formulation of Manichaean soteriology in five parts.

Also on the soteriological level, there are a small number of five-part structures relating specifically to the influence of the Light-Mind on the individual. For instance, in Chapter 103 "On the Five Wonderworks that the Light-Mind reveals to the Elect" Mani is made to describe "Five Light Signs" (ⲧⲟⲩ ⲙⲙⲉⲓⲛⲉ ⲛⲟⲩⲁⲓⲛⲉ) (1 Ke 257.13) that the Light-Mind works among the Elect, namely, 1) Wisdom, 2) Faith, 3) …, 4) Love, and 5) Severity of Judgment (1 Ke 257.13–24). It is by means of these Five Signs that the Light-Mind "purifies, refines, raises, and saves" (1 Ke 257. 29–30) the New Man. Although this series of qualities differs from that of the canonical Five Virtues discussed above, which includes 1) Love, 2) Faith, 3) Perfection, 4) Patience, and 5) Wisdom, there is an ecclesiological context to Chapter 103 that seems to justify the arrangement. Whereas Wisdom is the product of the Elect's preaching activity, Faith is the desired result among his hearers. The unknown third quality appears to promote peace in the community, while Love is engendered among the brothers and sisters. Finally, Severity of Judgement enables the Elect to purify the community of error. In this way, the "Five Light

[2] As we can see, Chapter 16 somewhat awkwardly juxtaposes two different series, one labelled as the Five Greatnesses and the other (presumably) the Five Advents. This may indicate that two separate kephalaia have been combined together to form a single chapter. After all, the benediction at the close of Chapter 16 mentions only the Five Advents, a series that is described in elaborate detail, while the Five Greatnesses are given only an abbreviated, formulaic description (see Gardner, Kephalaia of the Teacher, 54).

Signs" revealed by the Light-Mind, although soteriological in nature, are ecclesiological in orientation and can thus be seen to cross over into this category.

An additional soteriological pattern can be found in Chapter 112b (On the Five Things Revealed by Jesus).[3] According to this chapter, Jesus is said to have revealed "Five Great Things" (1 Ke 268.4) to humanity: 1) its affiliation with the race of Light, 2) the condition of the Aeon of Greatness, 3) the heroic activities of the Light, 4) the purpose of his mission, and 5) the imprisonment of the rebels (1 Ke 268.5–18). This list essentially constitutes the "gnosis" originally delivered by Jesus to Adam and Eve (1 Ke 268.2) and, later, by all the "apostles" to humanity. The motif that Jesus revealed to Adam his true nature is recorded by both Theodore bar Khonai (317.15–28 [Scher]) and al-Nadim (Fihrist, 784 [Dodge]) as attributed to Mani, although neither source records such a specific, five-part elaboration of this message. Thus, once again, the compiler seems to have shaped canonical material into a pentadic frame.

A final soteriological pattern can be found in Chapter 176 "On the Spiritual Transition in Five(?) Forms and that through which the Church changes." In this rather fragmentary chapter, several series of five "transitions" (ⲙⲙⲉⲧⲁⲃⲁⲥⲓⲥ) are described. The first series appears to describe the movement of the individual towards righteousness and entry into the Holy Church (1 Ke 453.4–455.6), while the second series describes the fate of the soul after death, as it passes through the various stations and light-vehicles to its eventual reunification with the Father (1 Ke 455.7–456.17). This second series then appears to be re-expressed, although this time with slight variations in detail and an association with the "Five Dwellings" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲙⲙⲟⲛⲏ) (1 Ke 458 ff.). While the exact details of these transition series are impossible to reconstruct, it is at least clear that the movements of the soul were seen as taking place in five-stages.

These chapters demonstrate the degree to which the Kephalaia compilers viewed their drama of salvation as a five-act play, rather than the three acts established by the founder of their religion.

[3] Here I am suggesting that 1 Ke 267.18–268.18 might have constituted a separate chapter that has been embedded within Chapter 112 "The Human Being is less than all the Things of the Cosmos, and He is more shipwrecked than them All" (1 Ke 266.3–268.27). This section even has its own Q & A frame (1 Ke 267.18–28) typical of individual chapters.

Ethical Patterning

Pentadic structures appear to play a role in Manichaean ethics as well, particularly in Chapter 91 "Also on the Catechumen, who is saved in a Single Body," Chapter 146: "The Old Man has Five Foods to live on; the New Man has Five Others," Chapter 165 "Envy exists in Five Forms" and Chapter 189 "[On the Five Temptations]."

Chapter 91 contains two discourses on Catechumenate ethics. For the first discourse, Mani is questioned by an Elect about how a Catechumen can avoid the process of reincarnation. In response, Mani is made to describe three sets of five characteristics that the Catechumen must posses. First, the Catechumen must regard 1) his wife as a stranger, 2) his house as an inn, 3) his family as fellow travellers, 4) his possessions as borrowed, and 5) his thoughts must always be on God (1 Ke 228.24–229.6). Second, the Catechumen must practice continence (enkrateia) by 1) not eating meat, 2) fasting and prayer, 3) almsgiving, 4) lack of malice, and 5) devotion to the church (1 Ke 229.20–29). Third, the good Catechumens can be known by the fact that they are 1) like the "good pearl" mentioned in Mani's Treasure of Life, 2) not bound by the enemy, 3) purified according to their deeds, 4) healed and purified, and 5) constantly at prayer (1 Ke 230.6–29). For the second part of the discourse, Mani is asked about what happens to the prior sins of those Catechumens who were idolaters, blasphemers, murderers, and magicians before entering the church (1 Ke 231.12–24). In response, Mani is made to argue that as long as such a Catechumen 1) accepts the faith, 2) separates Light from Darkness, 3) perceives the mystery of the Living Soul, 4) receives the right-hand of peace, and 5) prays to the Light-Mind for forgiveness (1 Ke 232.1–8) all prior sins will be forgiven. In addition, the Catechumen's position may be improved by 1) abstinence, 2) vigils, 3) fasting, 4) care for the Living Soul, and 5) prayer (1 Ke 233.5–14). What follows is an account of how the Catechumen's sin is divided into five-parts. While four of these parts may be forgiven by the church, the fifth requires further purification (1 Ke 233.21–234.20).

Essentially what Chapter 91 presents is four sets of five-part ethical patterns, two from the first discourse (Discourse A) and two from the second (Discourse B):

Discourse A (1)	Discourse A (2)	Discourse B (1)	Discourse B (2)
abstinence	vegetarian diet	faith	abstinence
hospitality	fasting and prayer	separation of natures	vigils
detachment from family	almsgiving	mystery of Living Soul	fasting
detachment from things	lack of malice	right-hand of peace	care for Living Soul
piety	devotion to church	prayer to Light-Mind	prayer

It is interesting, however, to compare what relation these five-part ethical patterns might have with the "Ten Commandments," which according to al-Nadīm, Mani established for the Hearers (i.e., Catechumens) (Fihrist, 789 [Dodge]), and which are known in various branches of Manichaeism,[4] against 1) idol-worship, 2) lying, 3) greed, 4) killing, 5) fornication, 6) theft, 7) pretences/false teaching, 8) sorcery, 9) doubt, and 10) sloth.[5] In fact, there is little in either of Chapter 91's lists to suggest any conformity with the canonical list from al-Nadīm, although four of the canonical commandments appear to be alluded to when Mani is asked about the prior sins of idolaters, blasphemers, murderers, and magicians just before the second discourse.

It appears as though the compiler of Chapter 91, although apparently interested in the Ten Commandments of the Catechumenate, has decided to divide two variant sets of them into two sets of five, to which he has appended in each case a five-part discussion of purity. It is difficult to imagine why this was done, except perhaps in response to a greater need for ethical flexibility depending on the type of person entering the Catechumenate. Could it be that a generally upstanding person entering the church was subject to a slightly different set of criteria than someone with a criminal past? We cannot be sure. What is clear is that the compiler of Chapter 91 has rejected a ten-part ethical framework in favour of one with five parts.

Chapter 146 presents the radical difference between what influences and sustains the individual prior to and post conversion. Whereas prior to conversion the individual is sustained by 1) physical beauty, 2) evil discourses and myths, 3) beautiful works (of some kind), 4) worldly foods, and 5) sexual desire (1 Ke 349.24–350.3), after conversion this sustenance is exchanged for 1) the spirit of the church leaders, 2) liturgical prayer, 3) joy, 4) itinerate preaching, and 5) scripture (1 Ke 349.5–18). As is so often the case in Kephalaia theology, good and evil, although radically different in their nature, are conceived of as structurally analogous. Just as the Good and Evil Trees both have Five Limbs, so too are the Old Man and New Man driven by five sources of nourishment. Again, this reinforces the fundamentally parallelism of the two opposed natures.

[4] See Sims-Williams, "The Manichaean Commandments," 577–578.
[5] Sims-Williams, "Manichaean Commandments," 578.

Unfortunately, while the lacunous state of Chapter 165 completely obscures the five forms of envy, two of the five temptations can be read from Chapter 189, namely the fourth, desire for women (1 Ke 485.23), and the fifth, apostasy during persecution (1 Ke 485.30–486.7). Somewhat clearer is the distinction made by Chapter 193 between the "Five Properties" of the Evil One and the Good One. To the "Evil One" are attributed 1) …, 2) slander, 3) murder, 4) greed, and 5) mixing of light and dark (1 Ke 490.27–29), while to the "Good One" are attributed 1) fasting, 2) grief, 3) almsgiving, 4) faith, and 5) separation of light and dark (1 Ke 491.5–6). Here, again, the qualitative rather than the structural difference between the two natures is emphasized.

It is interesting to note that in none of these ethical chapters is reference made to the canonical "Five Virtues" of 1) love, 2) faith, 3) perfection, 4) patience, and 5) wisdom known from Mani's Epistles (50.9–14) and al-Nadīm (Fihrist, 777 [Dodge]). This indicates yet another deviation from canonical traditions by the compilers.

Ecclesiological Patterning

While we could see that some of the soteriological patterns discussed above had certain ecclesiological overtones, one Kephalaia chapter in particular, Chapter 137 "On the Five Types of Brotherhood that are distinguished from one another," contains an important discussion of ecclesiological issues. In this chapter, a distinction is made between five types of individuals who form part of or are associated with the Holy Church, namely 1) brothers, 2) children, 3) disciples, 4) "day-labourers," and 5) slaves (1 Ke 338.25–27). "Brothers" are the "people of righteousness" (ⲛⲣⲱⲙⲉ ⲛⲧⲁ[ⲓⲕⲁⲓⲟⲥⲩⲛⲏ]) (1 Ke 338.29) guided by the Light-Mind, while the "children" are "considerate people" (ⲛⲣⲙⲙⲁⲕⲙⲉⲕ) (1 Ke 339.9) who always follow the ways of truth. "Disciples" are described as "splendid sheep" (ⲛⲉⲥⲁⲩ ⲙⲡⲣⲏⲉ) (1 Ke 339.17), who follow their teacher in patience, while "day-labourers" (ⲛϫⲁⲏⲃⲉⲕⲉ) are those whose commitment to the Church is not total (1 Ke 339.21–29). Finally, "slaves" (ⲛⲟⲗⲟⲩⲟⲛⲉ) are vain and disobedient people who flee at the first signs of persecution (1 Ke 340.1–12). Interestingly, while the discourse classifies Church members according to these five groups, the reader is encouraged to reject the last two as "foreign races" (ⲙⲡⲓⲅⲉⲛⲟⲥ ⲥⲛⲉⲩ ⲛⲱⲙⲙⲟ) (340.14).[6] While this five-fold division of the Church appears to have nothing to do with the formal, five-part hierarchy of 1) Teachers, 2) Bishops, 3) Presbyters/Elders, 4) Elect, and 5) Hearers known from a variety of Manichaean sources,[7] it is important to remember that what is being described by Chapter 137 are not formal, ecclesiastical classes but rather types of relationships. Whereas acceptable members of the Church behave like "brothers," "children," or "disciples," unacceptable members act with the indifference of "day-labourers" or, worst of all, the disloyalty of "slaves."[8]

An additional, albeit enigmatic, reference to five-part ecclesiological structures can be found in Chapter 3 "On the Interpretation of Happiness, Wisdom, and Power; what they mean." This chapter, after enumerating the five levels of existence at which these three concepts can be found, closes with a cluster of references to "Five Happinesses, Five Wisdoms, and Five Powers" (1 Ke 25.3–4) which are then (following a lacuna) set into some kind of relation to "Five Churches" (1 Ke 25.4). What this reference to Five Churches means, however, remains entirely mysterious.

Polemical Patterning

While we have seen that Chapter 6 and Chapter 69 used five-part patterns for polemical ends, a similar technique is used in two additional polemical[9] discussions of rival religious groups. The first instance can

[6] This represents a kind of stylistic division sometimes employed in the Kephalaia whereby a five-part series is divided into three good and two bad components. A similar effect is achieved by Chapter 39 "On the Three Days and the Two Deaths," in which the doctrine of "Three Times" is contrasted with two moments of defeat for the Darkness.

[7] Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 77–78; Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 27.

[8] There is no doubt a social dimension to this metaphoric revilement of "day-labourers" and "slaves" as "foreign races" that would be worthy of exploration.

be found in Chapter 12, where Mani is asked to explain the "Five Words which are proclaimed in the teaching of the Baptists" (1 Ke 44.25–26) and other sects. Unfortunately, the lacunous state of the text once again prevents us from reconstructing what these "Five Words" might have been, with the exception of "Third Messenger" as the second in the series (1 Ke 44.36–45.1). Similarly, in Chapter 100 "On the Dragon, the one with Fourteen Heads; what is it and …," Mani is questioned by a disciple on the existence of a fourteen-headed dragon mentioned in the "laws of the Magi" as dwelling in "Five Hallows" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛϣⲁⲣϣϥ) (1 Ke 252.1–3). In response, Mani is made to give an anthropological interpretation in which the fourteen heads of the dragon are said to represent the seven (sic!)[10] senses of the head and the seven senses of the body (1 Ke 252.19–253.2). The "Five Pits" (ϯⲟⲩ ⲛⲃⲏⲃ) in which the dragon dwells, however, are said to represent five of the internal organs (1 Ke 253.2–7).

Aetiological Patterning

Finally, a small class of what might be termed aetiological[11] patterns can be identified in chapters where Mani is made to account for the existence of certain natural or biological phenomena. For instance, in Chapter 95 Mani is made to offer an explanation of five different manifestations of cloud (1 Ke 240.19–244.13), while in Chapter 65 he is made to describe five aspects of the sun, namely its 1) light, 2) beauty, 3) peace, 4) life, and 5) force (1 Ke 162.1–13). Similarly in Chapter 68, Mani is made to describe five effects of fire, such as the fact that it 1) destroys materials, 2) separates fire, light, ash, and smoke from wood, 3) gives taste to food, 4) helps craftsmen work, and 5) helps people to see (1 Ke 166.19–30). In addition, Chapter 104 presents a particularly enigmatic discussion of five ways in which the energy provided by food is expended by human beings through 1) intellectual pleasure, 2) speech, 3) physical activity, 4) sexual intercourse, and 5) procreation (1 Ke 258.10–23). Interestingly, emphasis is placed on the well-being and needs of the fifth product, the child, as most important, while the other four are seen as unimportant and incidental. Finally, Chapter 107 offers a five-part explication of the production of speech (1 Ke 261.3–12) based on a metaphor involving the work of craftsmen.

[10] One would expect Mani to describe the five senses of the head and the body, but the fact that fourteen heads are mentioned necessitates the description of seven. Besides, if one counts two ears, two eyes, two nostrils, and one mouth, one arrives at seven. See 1 Ke 173.1–4.

[11] I use the term aetiological to mean that the author(s) are attempting to account for and explain the existence of various worldly phenomena through the lens of Manichaean ideology.

Such chapters are generally very brief and seem to have served as simple aetiological discussions about commonplace topics that were likely seen as problematic when viewed through the lens of Manichaean ideology. For instance, the status of fire as both a Light and Dark Element no doubt caused confusion as to its utility. Similarly, Manichaean condemnations of procreation likely perplexed some of the Catechumens with families. The fact that such issues could be explained in terms of five-part patterns would have been reassuring to the Kephalaia's intended audience, for whom a pentadic vision of reality was being constructed.

CONCLUSIONS & IMPLICATIONS

This study of five-part numeric patterns in the Manichaean Kephalaia has led to one primary conclusion, namely, that the text contains a considerable number of theological formulations that appear to be at variance with what we know, or can infer, about canonical Manichaean traditions. This means that the compilers of the work deemed it necessary to alter, expand, and improvise upon the teachings of their founder in order to address a variety of themes that were seen as either pressing or simply of interest. If this is the case, then why did they do it? What were some of the factors that might have stimulated this departure from teachings and traditions that Mani, we assume, had expected to be definitive? In response, three factors appear to have been at work that led to this creative use of numeric patterning: 1) scholastic redaction, 2) response to adversity, and 3) missionary expansion. Moreover, by way of conclusion, some suggestions will be offered as to why the number five was favoured in particular as well as who could have been the driving force behind this numeric interest.

Scholastic Redaction

As was stated above, from what we can piece together from the many scattered remains of Mani's own writings, it does not appear that his work was very systematic in nature. Rather, likely written over a substantial period of time in varying circumstances,[1] Mani's writings seem to have been largely incidental, dealing with a wide range of (often miscellaneous) theological, polemical, and pastoral concerns (as in the Book of Mysteries and Epistles). In some cases, he seems to have presented a more-or-less straightforward narrative of his cosmogonical, prophetological, or eschatological ideas (as in Shabuhragan, Living Gospel, and the source[s] used by Theodore bar Khonai and al-Nadīm), while in others, he appears to have been somewhat of a collector of pre-existing traditions (as in the Book of Giants). Besides, the fact that he attempted to portray his vision artistically by means of his Picture-book implies that Mani may have been more interested in the aesthetic impact of his message than its systematic presentation. More importantly, however, none of these canonical writings appear to have contained the same degree of fascination with numbers and numeric patterns as can be found so prominently expressed in the Kephalaia. This means that, at some point in the (largely obscure) literary history of the work, the compilers of the Kephalaia saw fit to introduce these patterns in order to resolve what may have been a substantial number of "loose-ends" and ambiguities in the canonical tradition. By doing so, they were attempting to construct a more cohesive and, by extension, more competitive theological vision of the cosmos. The fact that the compilers of so many chapters display a pronounced preference for five means that the editorial efforts in which they engaged can be reasonably described as an essentially scholastic process of pentadic redaction.

First, we observed that the compilers of the Kephalaia appear to have adopted as a general theological principle the idea that divine beings—both good and evil, light and dark—ought to be conceived of as having five basic properties. This was, as we saw, dramatically (and it would seem programmatically) expressed in Chapter 2 through the radical opposition between the "Two Trees," an early Manichaean metaphor for the two radically opposed principles. In this case, the two opposed natures, so fundamental to Manichaean cosmology, are conceived of as being qualitatively different, though structurally identical.

Then we directed our attention to the light-realm, where we saw that this interest in conveying the five-fold nature of divine being was extended to the most revered of such beings, the Father of Greatness, who, even though he was known in canonical (and later eastern) traditions both as the "Four-faced God" and as having "Five Limbs," was portrayed by the compiler of Chapter 21 a being characterized by five qualities.

Following this, we looked at the degree to which the Kephalaia compilers were faced with considerable conceptual and terminological challenges in their efforts to describe the constituent elements that give light-being its substance. These "Five Elements," also known as the "Five Sons of First Man," the "Five Luminous Gods," and at times even the "Five Intellectuals," are found in an often bewildering array of contexts that do not always allow for a clear differentiation of concepts. Nevertheless, in spite of this obvious terminological variability and confusion, we also noted that the compilers do not appear to have been interested in sorting them out. Rather, this series, particularly under the guise of the "Five Sons," served as a convenient literary and rhetorical tool for the construction of other more elaborate patterns and formulations involving other number patterns.

Next, we examined the degree to which five-part patterns played a pivotal role in both the theological and literary formulations of Chapter 38, a text that might be considered the centre-piece of Kephalaia volume one. In this chapter, really a treatise, Mani is made to go to great lengths to explain to a reticent disciple his assertion that the human body is really just a microcosmic representation of the macrocosm and that both domains display an equally pentadic structure in which a divine guardian watches over five districts continually disturbed by the rebellions of the dark powers.

Our final foray into the light-realm involved an examination of how the Kephalaia compilers sought to transform the basic pattern of Manichaean conceptions of divine activity from one based on three-stages (most clearly evidenced by Theodore bar Khonai's account) to one based on five. This was expressed by means of the highly variable series known as the "Five Fathers" as well as the grouping identified as the "Five Greatnesses." Each of these cases appears to have represented a deliberate attempt at the pentadic redaction of Manichaean discourse.

When it came to the dark-realm, the compilers were compelled to be more creative in their redaction efforts, since, as far as we can tell, Mani's descriptions of the land of darkness do not appear to have been all that specific. This meant that the compilers had to construct a vision of the dark-realm that was equally rooted in five-part patterns and, as such, could be symmetrically opposed to the light-realm.[2]

In the first place, we saw that the compilers attempted to account for the basic evolution of the dark-realm out of the evil principle variously known as "Matter," "Darkness," "Sin," and "Death." This meant positing five stages of development before the elaboration of the dark-realm into five separate elemental worlds. How to describe these individual jurisdictions, however, became a challenge, since the canonical ordering of dark elements, which had placed "smoke" in first position and "darkness" last, led to a terminological difficulty that the compilers were not quite able to overcome. As we saw, this problem became most evident in Chapter 6, which applies no less than four different names to the chief ruler of the "Five Worlds of Darkness," although here too, as in Chapter 38, five-part patterning was woven into the literary and rhetorical structure in order to drive home the essentially pentadic nature of evil.

[2] Given the obvious and overriding importance of luminous series such as the "Five Limbs" and the "Five Elements," especially in canonical traditions (see above), I do not accept Couliano's suggestion that the Five Planets are the basis of all Manichaean pentads and, therefore, the dark-realm must have preceded the light-realm in Manichaean ideological formulation ("The Counterfeit Spirit," 57). If anything, this study demonstrates that the opposite was the case.

Next, we saw that Manichaeans also got into trouble when they attempted to malign only five of the seven planets known to antiquity, with the exception of the Sun and Moon, which they viewed as light-ships ferrying liberated light-particles back to their homeland. This necessitated the substitution of the "Two Ascendants," an astronomical concept that they do not appear to have completely understood, since as Roger Beck has described it, the "Ascendant" (anabibazon) was meant to be complimented by a "Descendant" (katabibazon).[3] Then, the compilers' attempt to associate the twelve signs of the Zodiac with the "Five Worlds of Darkness" led to equally patchy results, although in this case, this artificial construction seems to have had a polemical motivation.

Then, in a more generalized way, we examined how the Kephalaia compilers used five-part numerical patterns in order to address a variety of soteriological, ethical, ecclesiological, polemical, and aetiological themes. Here too, we observed that, especially in soteriological, ethical, and ecclesiological contexts, the compilers presented pentadic constructions at variance with what can be known from canonical traditions.

Such an extensive, albeit often subtle, reshaping of Manichaean discourse implies that the teaching and writings that Mani left behind were not seen as sufficiently clear and, as such, required extensive commentary and retooling. After all, the mere existence of an apparently scholastic work such as the Kephalaia on such a massive scale indicates that, in fact, there were a considerable number of ambiguities in the Manichaean tradition that needed to be addressed, since we may assume that many chapters have as their kernel some sort of exegetical puzzle found within the canon. This kind of redactional work not only runs contrary to the finality and definitiveness that Mani appears to have claimed for his "gospel," but it also challenges the assumptions of many modern scholars who have allowed themselves to be influenced by such claims. In fact, there is a long tradition in Manichaean Studies of scholars asserting the general uniformity and consistency of Manichaean doctrine across its bewildering array of culturally specific milieux.[4] Even Polotsky talked about the essential unity of Manichaean traditions from North Africa to China.[5] These conventional assumptions about Manichaean discourse can be summarized as follows:

1) that Mani established a complete theological system in all of its details,[6]
2) that this system was transmitted essentially unchanged from one socio-historical context to another,[7] and
3) that this system can be reconstructed from the diverse, but essentially uniform, sources into which it was recorded.[8]

Today, however, it no longer seems appropriate to talk about a unified "Manichaean system," especially one formulated and set-in-stone by Mani himself. Rather, as this study has shown, Manichaean theology, even at a relatively early stage, seems to have existed in varying states of flux and evolution, depending on the context in which it circulated.[9]

[4] Such assumptions, for example, have even led Lieu to assert that "literalist" understandings of Mani's teaching made Manichaeism "a static religion" (Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 32). This implies, however, that basic features of the discourse did not change and made it easily exposed to philosophical attack.

[5] Polotsky, "Manichäismus," 101 [240].

[6] Recently Gardner and Lieu state that in contrast to mainstream Christianity, which worked out its doctrinal formulations over centuries, "Mani took great pains to establish a total religion based upon his own comprehensive scriptures and preaching," thus, there is "less scope in the study of Manichaeism to trace the evolution of doctrine, since all teaching was rigidly tied to the very details of the divine word in Mani's scriptures" (Manichaean Texts from the Roman Empire, 9–10).

[7] Rudolph suggested that Coptic sources come "closest to the original system" (Gnosis, 334), while Heuser, in spite of his efforts to focus on a limited socio-historical source base in his study of Manichaean myth in Coptic texts, suggests that "the Manichaean myth in toto can be deduced from" these sources ("The Manichaean Myth," 5).

[8] In his presentation of the Manichaean "system" Hans Jonas stated that he made use primarily of Theodore bar Khonai, "supplemented by whatever pieces of material from parallel texts fit into a particular passage" (The Gnostic Religion, 209). Later, Klimkeit would allude to the fact that Manichaean sources reveal "a remarkably unified system" (Gnosis on the Silk Road, 4).

[9] Recently, BeDuhn and Mirecki have cautioned against viewing the original Mesopotamian formulation of Manichaeism as "a static base" upon which later tradition rested ("Placing the Acts of Archelaus," 7). In the same vein, Sala has pointed to divergent

However, as Jason BeDuhn has pointed out, Manichaean ritual, in contrast to doctrine, seems to have been one aspect of the religion that remained particularly consistent throughout the wide array of cultural environments, and, in fact, theology may have acted more as a conceptual framework meant to support ritual.[10] Thus, it seems more appropriate to talk about phases of Manichaean theology. Just as mainstream Christian theology can rightly be identified by any number of qualifiers, such as ante-Nicene, post-Chalcedonean, etc., so too would it be desirable for scholars to develop similar nomenclature based on critical evaluation of the sources. This is partly a result of the fact that some scholars have been somewhat overenthusiastic in their desire to hear the authentic voice of Mani preserved in texts such as the Kephalaia, which presents itself (artificially I believe) as a record of his discourses. Such a desire, although not surprising, runs contrary to the function and purpose of the work as identified by this study. A methodological lesson can and should be learned from the degree to which many New Testament scholars are generally sceptical about how much material from the gospels can be directly attributed to Jesus. While Jesus of course never intended to found a religion, it is thought that canonical early Christian writings do contain at least a core of authentic material drawn more or less directly from his teaching (reflected in part by the hypothetically posited Q-document in particular). Many decades of careful study have shown the degree to which this material has been shaped by the redactional and editorial efforts of the first generations of Christians. We should assume that a similar relationship exists between a work such as the Kephalaia and the words of Mani himself,[11] although in his case he seems to have deliberately sought to found (or at least reform) his notion of the true religion. While it may be assumed that on some level a certain amount of Kephalaia material was drawn either from Mani's own writings or from oral traditions passed down by early disciples and teachers, the vast majority seems to have undergone a substantial amount of expansion and revision. It just so happens that

[10] BeDuhn, The Manichaean Body, 6–7.

[11] In fact, on a basic level, it is difficult to judge the distance of anything attributed to Manichaios from Mani himself, since the Syriac epithet, "Mani the Living" (Mani hiyya), on which this common form of his name is based seems to reveal at least some degree of hagiography.

this particular study has focused on redactional tendencies by means of numeric patterning, although there would certainly be other thematic gateways worthy of exploration.

Adversity and Persecution

The desire to clarify the teachings of the founder may not have been the only reason that so many Kephalaia chapters were shaped by such a redactional tendency, since some of those most deeply interested in five-part patterns also reveal a keen awareness of both external and internal pressures perceived by the community. External pressures, for example, are evoked most explicitly in the efforts of Chapter 6 to describe the properties of the Five Worlds of Darkness, which ultimately lead to an association of these worlds not only with rival religious communities such as Zoroastrians, Christians, and "pagans," but even, as in the case of the great World of Smoke, the "powers that be." As such, we are told most emphatically that "the spirit of the King of (those of) Darkness is the one who rules / today in the powers and authorities of the earth and the / whole world. I mean those who rule over all of creation, / humbling people in their tyranny according to their will" (1 Ke 33.5–8). This statement no doubt reflects bitter memories of persecution at the hands of Sassanian and Roman authorities.

After the deaths of King Shapur I (ca. 272 CE) and his successor Hormizd (273 CE), both of whom had been favourably disposed to Mani and his teaching, religious and political machinations began within the Sassanian administration against the new, upstart religion. In particular, Kirdir, the Zoroastrian "high-priest," sought to bring the empire's religious minorities under control,[12] as is evidenced by one of his surviving inscriptions, which states, in Middle Persian, that "the Jews, the Buddhists and the Brahmans, the Nazarenes (i.e., Aramaic-speaking Christians) and the Christians (i.e., Greek-speaking), the Baptists and the Manichaeans were struck throughout the land."[13] Eventually, this led to the imprisonment and death of Mani (ca. 276 or 277 CE) and the scattering of the Manichaeans from Mesopotamia. Within fifteen years, Mar Sīsin (i.e. Sisinnios), the successor to Mani as head of the church, or

archēgos, was also executed by Vahram II (292 CE).[14] Some Manichaeans, fleeing this persecution, took refuge at the court of King Amaro ('Amr ibn 'Adi) at Hira,[15] to the southwest of Seleucia-Ctesiphon.[16] Eventually, Amaro was even able to convince King Narses to halt the persecution of the Manichaeans, although this was done, in part, strategically, since Emperor Diocletian had recently issued an edict against the Manichaeans on his territory in 303 CE. This was seen by Narses as an opportunity to gain Manichaean support. But, soon enough after, under Hormizd II (303–309 CE), the Zoroastrian priesthood again agitated for the king to strike at the Manichaeans.[17]

Similarly, under the Roman Empire, Manichaeans were faced with periodic persecution and toleration. After making initial inroads into Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, Mani's followers were (unjustly)[18] condemned by Diocletian for purportedly propagating the "damnable customs and perverse laws of the Persians."[19] The so-called "Edict of Milan" (312 CE), however, brought some respite on a whole range of religious matters and, as a result, Manichaeans seem to have flourished in places such as the Nile Valley, where the Coptic Kephalaia were likely produced, Palestine, where a teacher such as Julia could flourish,[20] and Italy, where Augustine, on the recommendation of some rather well connected Manichaean "saints," was appointed Chair of Rhetoric in Milan.[21] This relative religious peace was short-lived, since with the accession of Theodosius anti-heretical measures were reinforced (380 CE). Ultimately, by the time of Justinian, Manichaeans were outlawed and the Elect threatened with death.[22]

While the bitter memories of these persecutions are a well-known feature of the Manichaean Homilies, especially the "Sermon on the Great War,"[23] echoes can also be heard in the Kephalaia, which may in fact draw on traditions pre-dating the Homilies.[24] For instance, in Chapter 189 "[On the Five Temptations]," the fifth temptation menacing the Elect, presumably apostasy, comes during persecution:

> [The fifth is this:] If persecution / [happens] in … through the persecutor … / … the Sects, those who stand in … / … tribulation. Or again as they … / … as they strike him with whips … / … and they come to "crucify"[25] him and he does not turn … / … from his truth and he bears every thing … / … wrath, bond, (and) crucifixion. In these Five / Temptations … … of the Elect / … he receives the … … / … increases in faith and becomes true … / his knowledge … temptation … / … and he returns immediately and reveals / the truth and … gives … (1 Ke 485.30–486.13).

Such a vivid description reveals that persecution formed part of the living memory of the Kephalaia compilers and influenced at least some of their pentadic formulations.

The adverse effects of persecution are also incorporated into Chapter 137 "On the Five Types of Brotherhood that are distinguished from one another." This chapter, which as we previously saw, enumerated five types of people found in the church, suggests that the fourth and fifth classes, the so-called "day-labourers" and, especially, the "slaves" fleed at the first sign of persecution (1 Ke 340.6–7).

While it is obvious that persecution was a subject that the compilers incorporated into some of their numeric formulations, less obvious is the possibility that such formulations acted as a fortification strategy in the face of real or potential persecutions. It seems at least plausible to suggest that the attempt to shape Manichaean discourse and ideology into such regularized and reoccurring patterns could have served as a means to strengthen the faith of adherents, especially the Elect, to whom the Kephalaia as a work appears to have been directed. The broad application of pentadic structures, which were seen as indicative of divinity itself, to such a wide range of phenomena could only serve to reinforce the Manichaean claim to truth and, thereby, support the typical Manichaean boast to have an explanation for everything. Such a vision of reality, if it could be seen to reproduce itself throughout the cosmos, may have helped to keep adherents in the fold and held them fast during times of adversity and repression.

Missionary Expansion

An additional aspect to which numeric patterning may have contributed is the missionary expansion of the movement. As is well known, Manichaeism was a self-consciously missionary religion. As Lieu has written, "misson was the driving force behind the religion from its very inception."[26] Mani's assertion that the previous revelations of Zoroaster, Buddha, and Jesus had been unjustly limited to specific socio-cultural settings meant that he actively sought to deliver his message to a wide range of audiences. As such, modelling himself on Paul, Mani undertook missionary journeys to diverse parts of the Sassanian Empire,[27] which enabled him to encounter and preach to Christians in the west, Buddhists and Brahmins in the east, and Zoroastrians in the Iranian heartland. His disciples followed suit, with Mar Adda being primarily responsible for the western mission and Mar Ammō as the chief organizer of the mission to the east.[28]

Numeric patterning may offer us a glimpse into one of the missionary techniques employed by Manichaeans, at least in the western context to which our texts testify. As Asmussen observed: "Mani and his missionaries knew the importance of repetition. When well-known material and names occurred again and again, a feeling of security and confidence was produced in the minds of the listeners."[29] As such, the repeated presentation of Manichaean doctrines in predictable and self-reinforcing patterns, such as those involving five, could have contributed to the palatability and plausibility of the missionary's teaching. In addition, the fact that the number five was used with such frequency could have also had a mnemonic value, since a series of five points could be easily recalled using five fingers.[30] After all, a number of the Kephalaia

[28] Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 90.
[29] Manichaean Literature, 113.
[30] In fact, ancient theoreticians suggested that the five fingers of the hand could chapters that elaborate five points are extremely brief—almost catechetical (see, for instance, Chapters 25, 33, 37, 68, 107, 193)—with little or no literary frame. Such chapters appear to represent "proto-kephalaia"[31] and it may well be that many more elaborate chapters have their origins in such brief, mnemonically digestible, didactic texts. This means that numeric patterning, especially those patterns involving five, could have served as a valuable pedagogical tool for the Manichaean missionary.

Why five?

But why, we may ask, was five favoured as a figure around which so much of the Manichaean world-view was organized? The fact that five played such a central role in the development of Manichaean discourse is, as we have seen, rooted in the fact that Mani and Manichaeans seem to have believed as a general principle that most beings (both Light and Dark) possess five qualities. This concept, in turn, was connected to the Manichaean conviction that the human being, with its five limbs, five senses, five fingers, and five toes (on each limb), was a microcosmic representation of both the wider macro-cosmos[32] and the divine power at its source. After all, according to Manichaean cosmology, when the demons conspired to create Adam and Eve, they used the androgynous image of the Third Messenger as a model (Theodore bar Khonai 317.7–11 [Scher]). This basic anthropological importance of five, however, was likely drawn from 2nd-century Syriac philosopher Bardaisan, who according to Ephraim taught that all entities possess five aspects corresponding to the five senses. Each must have its own colour, its own smell, its own taste, its own texture, and its own voice;[33] sentiments definitely echoed by the description of the dark ruler in Chapter 6. In addition, the fact that Mani seems to have inherited a concept of

serve as a valuable tool in the memorization of a discourse (Kennedy, A New History of Classical Rhetoric, 124).

[31] See T. Kell. Copt. 1 in Gardner, Kellis Literary Texts, 2.

[32] For example, Kephalaia Chapter 70 is called "On the Body, that it was made to resemble the cosmos." Also, the Manichaean account from the Acta Archelai states that "this body is called cosmos in relation to the great cosmos (i.e., the macrocosmos)" (τὸ γὰρ σῶμα τοῦτο κόσμος καλεῖται πρὸς τὸν μέγαν κόσμον [9.4]).

[33] See Ephraim, Prose Refutations of Mani, Marcion, and Bardaisan, 223 (Mitchell).

Five Elements, perhaps also from the school of Bardaisan, as the basic building blocks of both the soul and its material antithesis, as well as the concept of the Five Limbs, means that some of the most fundamental concepts in Manichaean theology were canonically expressed as pentads. This, in turn, provided the precedent for later teachers and theologians to use, expand, and reinvent this basic paradigm.

Who was responsible?

While we have sought to reconstruct the methods and motivations of an alleged group of anonymous compilers, a clue to who may have instigated or at least influenced this process of enumeration and systematization may be found in a Sogdian fragment from Turfan on the healing of Nafsha of Tadmor/Palmyra. In this text, Mar Adda, the primary Manichaean missionary to the west, is said to have received a vision from the master himself, in which everything, we are told, is explained "fully and completely by numbers."[34] Michel Tardieu suggested that Adda, who held the ecclesiastical rank of "teacher,"[35] may have in fact been the author of the Kephalaia.[36] We may never be able to validate such a bold suggestion, but it at least seems plausible that Adda, if not the actual "author" of the Kephalaia, may have provided the main impetus or model for the development of this interest in enumeration and systematization. This Iranian fragment would seem to provide the much needed "authorization" from Mani for Adda (and/or his associates) to do something that Mani's great religious project was supposed to have made unnecessary—that is, the interpretation, clarification, and systematization of the teaching of God's ultimate messenger. Mani's canonical writings were supposed to have been definitive, but as the "prologue" to the Kephalaia itself reveals (1 Ke 8.34–35), where

[35] Funk has raised the question as to whether or not the "teacher" referred to by the title of the first Kephalaia volume is in actual fact the author rather than Mani ("Reconstruction," 154, n. 17).

[36] Tardieu, "Principes de l'exégèse manichéenne," 134, n. 73. Cited (tentatively) by Funk, "Reconstruction," 154. Adda is known to have composed his own writings, which were sometimes mistaken for those of Mani (Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire, 91). This, in fact, may have been the result of conscious imitation or attribution of his words to the master, not unlike the situation found within the Kephalaia.

Mani is made to exhort his disciples to record what he taught them, the definitive and final pretence with which Mani packaged his writings was quickly overridden by the needs and circumstances of the communities he left behind.

Note on Translations

The following translations have been left in their codex page format in order to facilitate cross-referencing with Part I and comparison with the original edition (to which the reader is strongly encouraged to refer). Also, mythological figures and theological concepts of particular relevance to Part I have been rendered in italics purely for emphasis. In addition, I have made every effort to incorporate (as yet unpublished) Addenda et corrigenda (A&C) by W.-P. Funk into the translation of these selected chapters. The final published version of these A&C is slated to appear at the end of the Polotsky/Böhlig/Funk edition of Kephalaia volume one. As such, references to the A&C are simply meant to indicate that an improved or alternate reading exists. However, as in the case of the translations as a whole, any inaccuracies in the rendering of these valuable A&C are mine. CHAPTER 3

THE INTERPRETATION OF HAPPINESS, WISDOM, AND POWER; WHAT THEY MEAN

23.17 Again, the Enlightener spoke to his disciples, as [he(?)]
23.18 [was] sitting in the assembly of the church: What do these 23.19 [three things] mean, which are called in the cosmos "happiness," 23.20 ["wisdom,"] and "power," which people pride themselves on 23.21 … the happiness of the cosmos …
23.22 … … [wisdom(?)] in the cosmos has a …
23.23 … [power(?)] of the world will pass away.
23.24 [People] pride themselves on them (and) praise …
23.25 Now … thing is revealed in a great[17]
23.26 … … which I have said to you.
23.27 [I will][18] teach you another happiness which does not[19] [perish(?)] …
23.28 [another][20] wisdom [which does not] end, and another power which does not 23.29 [pass away(?)]. But now listen! I will reveal to you
23.30 [how] these three things are—[happiness,] 23.31 wisdom, and power.
23.32 [The first][21] glorious [happiness] is the Father, the God [of] 23.33 [Truth. He who] is established in the Great Land of [Light.]

24.1 But his glorious wisdom is his Great Spirit, who …
24.2 … … below, which is coursing through all his Aeons, 24.3 as they too are sailing through it. His great power is 24.4 all the Rich Gods and Angels who 24.5 are called forth from him, as they … …
24.6 those who are called "Aeons" … …
24.7 … … … …
24.8 … … … …

24.12 glorious happiness is the [Living] Spirit …

24.19 [Virgin] of Light. Power, also, which is in the Ship, is [all] 24.20 the Rich Gods and Angels who are found in it.
24.21 These three (things) also exist in the Elements—happiness, wisdom,
24.22 and power. Happiness is [the Column of Glory], 24.23 the Perfect Man, wisdom is the [Five Sons of the] 24.24 Living Spirit, but, the great power [is] the

25.4 … … in the Five Churches. Blessed is 25.5 everyone who will know them, for he … …

CHAPTER 4

ON THE FOUR GREAT DAYS, WHICH HAVE COME FROM ONE ANOTHER; ALONG WITH THE FOUR NIGHTS

25.11 Again the Enlightener spoke: There are Four Great Days which have come
25.12 [from one another, they] have been called forth [from] one another. The First
25.13 [Great Day] is the Father, the God of Truth, the first …
25.14 … … among the Aeons of his Greatness in his Living
25.15 [Kingdom]. The twelve hours of this Great Day
25.16 [are] the Twelve Great, Rich Gods of [Great]ness,
25.17 [those] who are the first Calls which he called (into being) according to 25.18 his Greatness. He distributed them among the Four Regions,
25.19 three to each side.
25.20 The Second Day is the Third Messenger, who 25.21 dwells in the Ship of Light. Its twelve hours are
25.22 the Twelve Virgins who he summoned in his Greatness.
25.23 [The] Third [Day] is the Column of Glory, [the great]
25.24 [Porter, who is greater than] all [the Porters], who supports …
25.25 all these … those above and those below. Its twelve hours are
25.26 the Five Sons of the First Man, the Five Sons of the Living
25.27 Spirit, those who support all burdens of the 25.28 cosmos, along with the Call and Response, which are counted among their ten
25.29 brothers. These are the twelve light-hours of the Third
25.30 Day. The Fourth Day is Jesus
25.31 the Splendour, who [dwells in] his church. Its twelve
25.32 hours are the twelve Wisdoms, which are his
25.33 [light-hours]. These are the Four Great Days which have come 25.34 [forth from one another] (and) which were called from one another. They …
25.35 … Blessed is everyone who knows them and
25.36 … of Light.

26.1 [Know also this!]: Just as Four Days [exist],
26.2 so too do Four Nights exist.
26.3 The First Night is the Land of Darkness. It has 26.4 twelve dark [shadows], which are the hours of Darkness. The twelve shadows of the first Night are the Five Elements of the Land of Darkness, [which] have poured forth in its Five Senses and …

have … in its Five Elements and its Five …
the Five [Spirits(?)] who dwell in its Elements …
These are the twelve shadows and spirits of the first Night.
    The second Night is Matter, the sculptor … …
… … … who has formed …
and every ruling power that is in the World [of Darkness, which] has fashioned it in Five Senses, Five [Male]
and Five Female, two to a world ,as well as the fire and [lust]
[which] dwell in men and women, inflaming them
for one another. These are the twelve Spirits of this second Night. But, this Matter, it is the Thought of Death, which causes the King of Darkness and his powers to prepare for war and battle against the Aeons of Greatness. But, it was caught (and) snared by the First Man (and) carried to … … by the powers … it was brought from the Land of Death (and) placed … above
and below in the [entire] cosmos, in the Five Parts
which are above in the heavens along with the Five [Parts which] are below in the lower lands, along with the heat [and the] cold, which are the father and the mother, their fire and their desire.
    This is the second Night, which is born our of the first Night. It was snared by the First Man (and) brought by the Living Spirit (and) placed in this mixed world …
above and below. The [upper part is the(?)]
senses of men; the lower part [… the senses(?)]
of women. The third [Night is the Five]
Worlds of Flesh … … [five(?)]

[male] and the five female, those who are born of the powers
… they fell upon the earth, while they are revealed in the dryness and cold, along with the fire and desire
[which] dwells in them, which impel them towards one another.
[Matter], however, is the Thought of Death, which is [Mother] of them all, as it is named among them "Night,"
the male and female [powers][22] of flesh, along with the fire and [desire] … twelve hours of … …
… Night. This, again, is the third Night, in
[the] World of Flesh, which is born out of the second
Night, which the Living Spirit crucified in the

27.13 … The fourth Night is the Law of [Sin,]
27.14 [which] is the Spirit of Darkness that speaks through the twelve
27.15 [spirits], the twelve Sects, which are the strippings,
27.16 the twelve Zodiacs of Matter, which are 27.17 its thrones. It (that is, Matter) is announced, as it is moulded and 27.18 manifest in the Old Man. But, the hours of this fourth
27.19 Night, which is the Old Man who rules among the Sects, they are the 27.20 twelve evil spirits … the Old Man, who …
27.21 … … … …
27.22 … … … …
27.23 … … … …
27.24 [Blessed is he who(?)] distinguishes the day and the night …

27.26 … … which have come forth from one another, one …
27.27 … … as the Days of Light
27.28 that they come out[24] (and) have revealed one another. So too
27.29 … [do the Nights(?)] come to be from one another.
27.30 Blessed is the one who knows and who distinguishes and 27.31 … … forever.

CHAPTER 6

ON THE FIVE STOREHOUSES WHICH HAVE POURED FORTH FROM THE LAND OF DARKNESS FROM THE BEGINNING; THE FIVE ARCHONS, THE FIVE SPIRITS, THE FIVE BODIES, (AND) THE FIVE TASTES

30.17 Again, the Enlightener spoke to his disciples: Five Store-
30.18 Houses have existed from the beginning in the Land of Darkness. Five
30.19 Elements have poured forth from them. Also, from the Five
30.20 Elements were fashioned Five Trees, (and) from the Five Trees
30.21 were fashioned Five Species of Creatures according to each World,
30.22 male and female. But also, the Five Worlds [have]
30.23 Five Kings, Five Spirits, [Five] Bodies, (and) Five [Tastes]
30.24 according to each world, which do not resemble [one another].
30.25 The King of the World of Smoke, [he] … …
30.26 He has come from the depth of [the darkness. This is he who is]
30.27 the chief of all evil and [all] wickedness. The initial
30.28 spread of the war came to be [through] him—all
30.29 battles, fights, quarrels, conflicts, destructions,
30.30 struggles, errors, contests. It is he [who first] stirred
30.31 conflict and war along with his worlds [and his] powers. Afterwards,
30.32 he waged war with the Light, doing battle with 30.33 the exalted kingdom. But,[25] as for [the King] of Darkness,
30.34 there are Five Forms in him: his head [is lion-faced, his]
30.35 hands and feet are demon- [and devil-]faced, [his]
30.36 shoulders are eagle-faced, while his belly [is dragon-faced,]

31.1 (and) his tail is fished-faced. These Five Forms, the imprints of his
31.2 [Five] Worlds, are found in the King of (those belonging to) Darkness.
31.3 There are also Five Properties in him. The first is his 31.4 darkness. The second is his stench. The third is 31.5 his ugliness. The fourth is his bitterness—his very soul.
31.6 The fifth is his fire, which burns like a
31.7 peis[26] of iron being melted by the flame.
31.8 There are also three other things about him: The first is that his [body(?)][27]

[25] A&C: ⲉⲕ[ⲓ ⲇⲉ ⲁⲡⲣⲣⲟ] (cf. 1 Ke 173.27).
[26] Meaning of ⲡⲉⲓϣ unknown, see Polotsky/Böhlig 31 n. 7.
[27] A&C: ⲥϣⲙⲁ (doubtful reading).

31.9 [is hard] (and) very strong, as if (in) its bitterness Matter
31.10 built it …, which is the Thought of Death,
31.11 that which formed it by the nature of the Land of 31.12 Darkness. Thus is the [body(?)] of the Archon of [Smoke]. It is 31.13 harder than all iron, brass, steel, and
31.14 [lead,] since there isn't any cleaver or implement to 31.15 pierce[28] or cut it. For Matter, its fashioner, built it
31.16 … strong and hard. The second (thing is) that he strikes
31.17 [and] kills by the utterance of his magic. His preaching and his 31.18 hearing, all his foolish speech,[29] make magic 31.19 and invocations for him. When it pleases him, he calls it upon 31.20 himself and hides, by his magic, from his
31.21 companions. Also, when it pleases him, he reveals himself to his powers
31.22 [and] appears to them, so that the sorcery which people
31.23 practise today … in this world are the mysteries of 31.24 the King of Darkness. Therefore, I command you
31.25 at all times: Keep yourselves away from magic and the sorcery
31.26 of Darkness, since the person who learns them and
31.27 [practises] them, and perfects them, at the end, where the King
31.28 of (those belonging to) Darkness and his powers will be bound, in that place will 31.29 also be bound the soul of the one who lives by them and
31.30 [walks] in the [magic] of Error. Whether it is a man or a
31.31 [woman], this is the judgement which has been given. They are cut 31.32 … the judgements of God, for he who will 31.33 … and their king.

32.1 The third (is) that the King of (those belonging to) Darkness knows the 32.2 speech and the language of his Five Worlds. He understands
32.3 everything that he hears from their mouths, as they speak with one
32.4 another—each according to his language. [Every] plan
32.5 which they conceive against him (and) every deceit which they discuss 32.6 with one another in order to bring it upon him—he knows them.
32.7 He also knows the gestures by which they give signs
32.8 to one another. But his powers and the archons
32.9 who are under him, they do not understand his speech. All these things
32.10 are revealed to him, although their heart is not revealed to him.
32.11 He does not know their mind and their thought, he does not consider their
32.12 beginning or their end, but he knows and perceives only
32.13 that which is before his eyes.

[28] A&C: [ⲭⲱ]ⲧⲉ.
[29] A&C: ⲥⲉⲭⲉ rather than ⲥⲉⲃⲉ.

32.14 There is also another, different thing in the King of (those belonging to)
32.15 Darkness. When it pleases him to walk, he spreads out all his limbs,
32.16 and he walks. When it comes to his mind, he draws
32.17 in his limbs, takes them to himself, rolls them into
32.18 one another, and falls down like a grape or a
32.19 great iron ball. His voice is terrible.
32.20 He causes fear (and) frightens his powers with his voice.
32.21 For, when he speaks, he is like the thunder
32.22 among the clouds and is like the … of the one who …
32.23 When he cries out and he … and he cries …
32.24 on his powers, they tremble and turn and fall at his feet
32.25 like birds, while they … bird …
32.26 and they fall down to the earth. However, there is only this one thing:
32.27 he does not know what is far from him. He does not see what 32.28 is in the distance, nor does he hear it. But that which is 32.29 before his face, this he sees, hearing it (and)
32.30 knowing it. These signs and evil symbols
32.31 are found in the chief of the demons and
32.32 devils, the King of all the mountains of darkness. [When][30]
32.33 the Land of Darkness produced him, it [begot him in its]
32.34 cruelty, in its evil, in its wrath … …

33.1 more than all his fellow-Archons, who are in all his worlds.
33.2 Gold is the body of the King of (those of) Darkness.
33.3 The bodies of all the powers who belong to the World of 33.4 Smoke are gold. But, the taste of its fruit is
33.5 salty. The spirit of the King of (those belonging to) Darkness is the one who rules
33.6 today in the powers and authorities of the earth and the 33.7 whole world. I mean those who rule over all of creation,
33.8 humbling people in their tyranny according to their will.
33.9 But, the King of the Worlds of Fire is lion-faced, the first of 33.10 all beasts. His body is brass. So too are [the bodies]
33.11 of all the Archons who belong to the fire.
33.12 Their taste is the sour taste in every form.
33.13 But, the spirit of the King of those who belong to the World of Fire is the
33.14 one who rules in the nobles and leaders who are 33.15 under the command of the powers and authorities and the kings of the 33.16 world. His spirit is also the one found in the Sects
33.17 who worship fire, as they offer their sacrifices to the fire.

[30] A&C: ⲡ[ⲥⲁ]ⲡ ⲁⲛ [ⲉⲧⲁ]-.

33.18 Also, the King of the Worlds of Wind has an eagle-face. His 33.19 body is iron. Also, the bodies of all those who belong to 33.20 the wind are iron. Their taste is the burnt taste
33.21 in every form. His spirit is that of the idol-worshippers,
33.22 the spirits of Error that are in every temple, eidoleion,
33.23 place of worship, statues and images, shrines
33.24 of worldly Error.
33.25 But, the King of the World of Water has a fish-face. His 33.26 body is silver. So too, all the Archons that belong to water, 33.27 their bodies are silver. Also, the taste of their fruit is 33.28 the sweetness of water; the sweet taste in every form.
33.29 Also, the spirit of the King of the Archons of Water is the one who 33.30 rules today in the Sects of Error. Those who
33.31 baptize in the baptism of water, (placing) their hope
33.32 [and] their trust in the baptism of water.
33.33 [The] King of the World of Darkness is a dragon. His
33.34 [body is lead] and tin. So too, all the Archons
33.35 [that belong to the World of] Darkness, their bodies are lead and

34.1 tin. But, the taste of their fruit is bitter.
34.2 Also, the spirit, who rules over them, is the spirit
34.3 who speaks even today in the soothsayers, as they give oracles,
34.4 in seers of every kind, (and) in the demented,
34.5 as well as in spirits who give oracles of any kind.
34.6 Therefore I tell you, my brothers and my
34.7 Limbs, perfect faithful and holy elect:
34.8 Keep your hearts with you and keep yourselves from the 34.9 Five Slaveries of the Five Dark Spirits.
34.10 Abandon the worship of their Five Bodies. Do not
34.11 interact with them, so that you might escape their bond
34.12 and their punishment forever.

CHAPTER 7

THE SEVENTH, ON THE FIVE FATHERS

34.16 Again, as the Enlightener, our father the true Apostle,
34.17 sat among his disciples
34.18 proclaiming to them the greatness of God, he said again to
34.19 them in this way in his revelation: There are Five Fathers,
34.20 who have been called forth one from another, and one has also come 34.21 from the other. The First Father is the Father of 34.22 Greatness, the glorious one who is praised, he whose greatness has no
34.23 measure, who is the first monogenes, the first
34.24 eternal who exists with the Five Fathers forever.
34.25 He who exists before all that has existed and 34.26 will exist. He, then, the glorious Father, he has called 34.27 three emanations from himself. The first is the Great
34.28 Spirit, the First Mother, she who has come from the Father, she was 34.29 revealed first. The second is the Beloved of 34.30 Lights, the great, glorious Beloved, who is honoured, [who]
34.31 has come from the Father and has appeared from him.
34.32 The Third {Father}[31] is the Third [Messenger,]
34.33 the first of all counsellors, [who has come from the]

35.1 First Father (and) has appeared. This is the First Father,
35.2 the First Power, he from whom the three great powers have come.
35.3 This is the First Father, the first eternal, the root
35.4 of all lights. He from whom the three emanations have come.
35.5 They have subdued the Darkness (and) destroyed it. It pleased him not (that)
35.6 they alone be given the victory, (so) the victory is also given to their Aeons.
35.7 The Second Father who has come forth from the First Father is the
35.8 Third Messenger, the replica of the King of Light.
35.9 But, he too has called (and) emanated three
35.10 powers. One is the Column of Glory, the Perfect Man,
35.11 he who supports all things, the Great Column
35.12 of Blessing, the Great Porter, who is greater than

[31] Father (ⲉⲓⲱⲧ) here is an error for "emanation" (ⲡⲣⲟⲃⲟⲗⲏ) (Funk, personal communication).

35.13 all the porters.[32] The second is Jesus the Splendour, the glorious,
35.14 the one through whom eternal life is given. The 35.15 third is the Virgin of Light, the Glorious Wisdom, she 35.16 who stole the heart(s) of the Archons and the Powers by her image,
fulfilling
35.17 the will of the Greatness.
35.18 The Third Father who has come forth from the Second Father,
35.19 he is Jesus the Splendour, the glorious. He too has summoned
35.20 three calls like the Second Father.
35.21 The first power which he called forth is the Light-Mind,
35.22 the Father of all Apostles, the first of all the churches,
35.23 he who Jesus set, after our likeness, in the Holy 35.24 Church. The second power which Jesus called
35.25 is the Great Judge, who judges all the souls
35.26 of people, his tent being set in the air [under(?)]
35.27 the wheel [of the] stars.[33] The third power is 35.28 the Youth, the great [power of][34] light in his two per-
35.29 sons in … I am talking about that one who he established 35.30 in the Call [and] Response. [He has established] himself through his father
35.31 the King of … the Saviour … see him, as he speaks
35.32 [to the Jews(?)]:[35] "What[36] I have seen by means of my Father,
35.33 [this I say to] you. You too, what you have seen
35.34 [by means of your father], that you do."

36.1 The Fourth Father is the Light-Mind, he who chooses
36.2 all the churches. He, too, has called three
36.3 powers after the likeness of Jesus. The first power is the Apostle
36.4 of Light, he who comes whenever he puts on the Church
36.5 of the flesh of humankind and becomes leader of 36.6 Righteousness. The second (power) is the Twin, who comes to the 36.7 Apostle and reveals himself to him, since he is a companion to him,
36.8 being bound to him everywhere (and) always helping him in 36.9 all the tribulations and the dangers. The third (power)
36.10 is the Light-Form, which the Elect and the
36.11 Catechumens assume when they renounce the world.
36.12 The Fifth Father is the Light-Form which 36.13 reveals itself to each one who leaves his 36.14 body in the same way as the Apostle, along with the Three
36.15 Great, Glorious Angels who come with it. While the one holds

36.16 the Victory-prize in his hand, (and) the second wears the Garment
36.17 of Light, the third is the one who holds the Diadem
36.18 and the Wreath and the Crown of Light. These are the
36.19 Three Angels of Light who come with this Light-36.20 Form and are revealed with it to the Elect and the 36.21 Catechumens. These are the Five Fathers which have come from 36.22 one another, they have revealed (and) appeared from one
36.23 another. Blessed is the one who knows and understands them,
36.24 for he will find eternal life and put on the Garments of 36.25 Light which are given to the Righteous, [the Faithful], the Peace-Giving,
36.26 and the Doers of Good.

CHAPTER 9

THE INTERPRETATION OF THE (SIGN OF) PEACE, WHAT IT MEANS, THE RIGHT HAND, THE KISS, THE ADORATION

37.31 Again, the Disciples asked the Apostle, saying
37.32 [to him]: This (Sign of) Peace and this Greeting which are found in the world, 37.33 from who [have they come]? Or, the Right Hand which exists in 37.34 [the world], since it is honoured by people, whose is it? Or, the 37.35 [Mystery of the] Kiss, with which people greet one another,
37.36 … … Or, who is it who has revealed this

38.1 Adoration, with which people honour one another? Or, the Laying on of 38.2 Hands, which the great one often lays upon the one bowed
38.3 before him, as he honours him (and) makes him great, whose 38.4 Laying on of Hands is it? Then he spoke to his Disciples:
38.5 These five matters which you have asked about, while they appear
38.6 in the world to be minor and small,
38.7 they are, in fact, great (and) glorious. I shall reveal to 38.8 you their mysteries. As for these Five Signs,
38.9 they are the mystery of the First Man, he who came with them
38.10 from the Aeon of Light. Also, after he completed
38.11 his struggle, it was with these good signs that he came up
38.12 (and) was received into the Aeon of Light.
38.13 The First (Sign of) Peace is the one that the Gods and Angels in the Land
38.14 of Light gave to the First Man when he came 38.15 out against the Enemy. The Gods and the Angels
38.16 went with him, accompanying him (and) giving him their (Sign of) Peace and 38.17 their might and their blessedness and their victory. This is the First
38.18 (Sign of) Peace which the Gods and Angels gave the First
38.19 Man as he came out from the Aeon of Light.
38.20 The First Right Hand is that which the Mother of Life gave the First
38.21 Man, when he came out to the struggle.
38.22 The First Kiss is that with which the Mother of Life greeted 38.23 the First Man, as he departed from her (and) went 38.24 down to the struggle. All the rest of the Gods and

38.25 the Angels who are in the Aeon of Light kissed him, as well as all the 38.26 … and shrines(?) of the Church and the Companions who 38.27 belong to the house of his people. They kissed him as 38.28 he was to depart from them. They escorted him, kissing
38.29 him with the kiss of love and affection.
38.30 The First Adoration is the adoration with which the First Man
38.31 adored him when he came [from the depth]
38.32 which is below. He bent his knee, [adoring]
38.33 the God of Truth and all the Aeons [of Light],

39.1 who belong to the house of his people, as he implored them for a power to 39.2 accompany him as he was leaving.
39.3 The First Laying on of Hands which the Mother of Life placed upon
39.4 the head of the First Man armed him (and) made him
39.5 strong. She laid hands on him (and) sent him into battle. He came 39.6 down (and) accomplished his struggle with the Great Powers and the 39.7 Enmity. By these Five Signs, by these Five Mysteries,
39.8 the First Man came from the Aeon of Light
39.9 against the Enemy. He humbled him (and) defeated him with them.
39.10 Also, when he came up from the war, he entered
39.11 the Kingdom of the houses of his people through these Five Mysteries.
39.12 The (Sign of) Peace with which [he came] up is the (Sign of) Peace which the
39.13 Call gave to him, when he was sent by the Father of the 39.14 Living. He gave him the (Sign of) Peace in the World of Darkness.
39.15 This same (Sign of) Peace with which he went down is 39.16 also the one with which he came up from the struggle. Thus, it is according to the
39.17 mystery of this (Sign of) Peace, which the Call gave to 39.18 the First Man, that the (Sign of) Peace is found down here, the one
39.19 which has been named and heard among the powers of the Father. The 39.20 second Right Hand, however, is the one which the Living Spirit gave the 39.21 First Man when he came up from the struggle. According to 39.22 the mystery of that Right Hand has this (other) Right Hand come into being.
39.23 It is the one which exists [among] the people, when they give it to one another,
39.24 which is honoured and [appreciated][37] among them. But, this second Kiss,
39.25 the one with which the [Father of] Life and the Mother of the

[37] See Polotsky/Böhlig note 24. Also, Funk, personal communication.

39.26 Living kissed the First Man after he came back
39.27 from the struggle, this Kiss is also found among the 39.28 people, when they kiss one another with it, or 39.29 when they depart and are far from one another, or also when 39.30 they approach one another in accordance with this mystery.
39.31 [The] second Adoration (is the one) with which the First Man adored
39.32 [before this][38] time the God of Truth and
39.33 [his twelve(?)][39] blessed Aeons and all the Aeons
39.34 [which exist in the][40] whole Great [World] of Light, when

40.1 the Father of Life and the Mother of the Living raised
40.2 the Man from the depth of the struggle. According to the mystery
40.3 of this second Adoration, has this Adoration existed. This is the one
40.4 that is found today among the people who adore
40.5 and honour one another. The second
40.6 Laying on of Hands is this, that after the Living Spirit had led the First
40.7 Man up from the war, he rescued him from all the 40.8 waves. He brought him up (and) gave him rest in the Great
40.9 Aeons of Light which belong to the house of his people.
40.10 He set him before the Father, the Lord of All.
40.11 Then, when he ascended to the great Father of 40.12 Light, a voice came to him from on high, saying:
40.13 "Set my son, my first-born, at my right, that I might 40.14 place all his enemies as a footstool under his feet."
40.15 He received this great Laying on of Hands, so that he might become leader
40.16 of his brothers in the New Aeon. Also, according to the mystery
40.17 of the second Laying on of Hands has the Laying on of Hands
40.18 existed. It is the one which is found among the people, when they lay hands on 40.19 one another, as the great give authority to the small. These Five
40.20 Mysteries, these Five Signs which existed first in the divinity,
40.21 they were proclaimed in this world through an apostle. The people
40.22 have learned them (and) set them in their midst. But[41] these mysteries have not
40.23 existed from the beginning among the 40.24 powers of Darkness. Also, the Light-Mind, which comes 40.25 into the world, it comes in these various forms. With these Five 40.26 Words, it chooses its Church. First and foremost

---

[38] A&C: [ϩ]ⲁⲧ[ⲉϩ]ⲏ ⲙⲡⲓⲛⲉⲩ.
[39] A&C: [ⲡⲉϥⲙ̄ⲛⲧⲥⲛⲁⲩⲥ].
[40] A&C: [ⲉⲧⲯⲟⲟⲡ ϩⲙ̄ ⲡⲛⲁⲟ ⲛ̄]ⲕ[ⲁ][ⲓ].
[41] A&C: ⲁⲁ]ⲁⲁ.

40.27 it chooses its Church with a (Sign of) Peace
40.28 and gives peace at first to people. If someone receives the 40.29 (Sign of) Peace and becomes a Child of Peace, afterwards, he is chosen
40.30 for the faith.[42] Thus, when he receives the (Sign of) Peace, he receives [the]
40.31 [Right] Hand and belongs to the Right Hand. Thus, when [he receives] the Right
40.32 Hand, the Light-Mind draws him to himself and makes him approach [the]
40.33 Church. With the Right Hand, he receives the [Kiss of Love]
40.34 and becomes a Child of the [Peace[43] . . .]

41.1 With the Kiss, he receives Adoration and adores the God
41.2 of Truth and adores also the Holy Church . . .
41.3 the hope of the faith of good things. When they
41.4 receive the (Sign of) Peace and the Right Hand, the Kiss and the Adoration, 41.5 at the end of these things they lay upon them the Right Hand of Mercy. They 41.6 too receive the Laying on of Hands, which will be laid upon them and
41.7 they will be set and built in the truth and made strong from it forever.
41.8 They come to the Light-Mind with these good signs
41.9 and they make people perfect and adore and
41.10 glorify the God of Truth.
41.11 Furthermore, at the time of their coming forth, when the Light-
41.12 Form goes out before them and spreads them out from the Darkness to the 41.13 Light and [is in them],[44] the Light-Form calms the 41.14 man with the Kiss and its rest from the terror of 41.15 the demons who destroy his body, by its likeness and its
41.16 image. The heart of the Elect which leaves his body
41.17 finds rest in it, and then the angel who holds the Prize
41.18 extends to him (his) Right Hand and draws him from
41.19 the depth of his body and receives him with the Kiss
41.20 and the Love. This soul adores its redeemer,
41.21 which is the Light-Form. But, at the same time
41.22 that . . . he perfects and increases according to . . .
41.23 . . . . . [and become king][45] in the House of the Living and the Gods
41.24 and Angels and all the Apostles, along with the Elect
41.25 and he takes the crown, the blessing,[46] and the glory in eternal life.
41.26 [Therefore], I say to you, my brothers and Limbs,

41.27 let there be these Five [Signs] in your hands, since they are honoured before
41.28 each one of you, which are the (Sign of) Peace, the Right Hand, the 41.29 Kiss, the Adoration, and the Laying on of Hands. This, which I have brought 41.30 to you from the House of the Living, from the Father who has
41.31 sent me. Know that a great mystery
41.32 … … him, by these Five Signs which I have brought 41.33 … … you will separate from the world, since
41.34 … … … you have known the first

42.1 (Sign of) Peace, the first Right Hand, the first Kiss,
42.2 the first Adoration and the first Laying on of Hands.
42.3 Therefore, let this Laying on of Hands be great among you who
42.4 honour and adore the Teachers, Deacons, and Presbyters.
42.5 Those who I have lain hands on, I have set upon them the great
42.6 Laying on of Hands, since they are established in a great mystery:
42.7 (that is) the Laying on of Hands of the Divinity is placed upon the 42.8 head of the Teacher. Therefore, he who rejects it and despises
42.9 it, and considers it nothing, he sins against God in a great
42.10 sin and also against me.
42.11 But, you, my beloved, be zealous in these Five

CHAPTER 10

ON THE MEANING OF THE FOURTEEN [GREAT] AEONS ABOUT WHICH SETHEL SPOKE IN [HIS] PRAYER

42.27 Again, the disciples asked the Apostle (and) said to him: We [implore]
42.28 you, our Lord, that you clarify for us this statement that is written 42.29 [in] the prayer of Sethel, the first-born son of Adam, when he says,
42.30 "You are glorious, you fourteen great Aeons of Light."
42.31 Tell us, our Lord, what do the Fourteen Great 42.32 Aeons of Light mean. Then, the Enlightener [spoke]
42.33 [to them]: Allow me to interpret for you [the fourteen] 42.34 great Aeons of Light, which he spoke about …
42.35 Know this, that … … …

43.1 … below stands in the Fourteen [Great Aeons]

43.6 [support the] entire [weight] of the world, along with the Living 43.7 [Spirit and the First] Man, their parents. These are the Fourteen 43.8 [Blessings which he has] proclaimed—the Blessing which has fourteen 43.9 [aspects(?)],[49] the one through which the world is established.

CHAPTER 12

ON THE MEANING OF THE FIVE WORDS WHICH ARE PROCLAIMED MNTPARAPEHOUT[51] IN THE COSMOS

44.23 [52]
44.24 Again the disciples [asked the Apostle, saying to]
44.25 to him: Tell us, our Lord, the Five Words which are proclaimed
44.26 in the teaching of the Baptists and [these] other words which[53] 44.27 are found in the other Sects. They speak their name, that is, those

CHAPTER 16

[ON THE FIVE] GREATNESSES WHICH HAVE [COME] OUT AGAINST THE DARKNESS

49.13 [Again, the Enlightener spoke] to his disciples: The Light[76]
49.14 … … [the] Darkness, he conquered it with Five Greatnesses.
49.15 [The first Greatness] is the Father of Greatness, he who [exists]
49.16 [in] silence and secret, established in his Land
49.17 [of Light,] in his proper place. Four Greatnesses appeared
49.18 (and) came out from him. They were arranged in ten parts and were established
49.19 as a perfect twelve. The second Great-
49.20 ness which poured forth, appeared, (and) was manifested by the first
49.21 Greatness is the Mother of Life, the Great Spirit, along with
49.22 the First Man [and his] Five Sons. [These are the second]
49.23 Great[ness]. The third [Greatness is the]
49.24 [Beloved of] Lights, the Great Builder, the Living Spirit, and the 49.25 Five Sons of the Living Spirit. These are the third Greatness.
49.26 [The fourth] Greatness is the Third Messenger and
49.27 [the] Column of Glory, and all the powers of light that are revealed
49.28 [from him. These are the] fourth Greatness.
49.29 [The] fifth Greatness which came from the Father is Jesus the 49.30 Splendour and all his powers, which he called forth, his emanations which …
49.31 [are] poured forth (and) revealed by him. As for the fact that they are set forth
49.32 … … these Five Sons of the First Man
49.33 … … the entire construction. The other five are the Five
49.34 [Sons of the Living Spirit], who are set in five places, supporting 49.35 … … … completed in

50.1 twelve parts which … … [There is] another two added
50.2 to them, namely the Call and [the Response], which 50.3 are the father and the mother who Jesus the Splendour appointed by his 50.4 advent as successors in his place … the great Land.
50.5 of Light[77] … … …
50.6 … … … in them.

---

[76] A&C: ⲁ ⲡ[ⲟ]ⲩ[ⲁ]ⲓⲛⲉ.
[77] A&C: ⲙⲡⲟⲩⲁⲓⲛ[ⲉ].

50.7 … … … …
50.8 the First Man who has come … …
50.9 … … … …
50.10 … … b donging to … …
50.11 existing in[78] their kingdom … …
50.12 rank before those who belong to his [house] … …
50.13 … … … …
50.14 … … his enemies … …
50.15 and suffering through their evil and they take from him …
50.16 and kingdom and they take [him into]
50.17 captivity and they remove (any) company from him. But, he …
50.18 in his humility, he becomes confident and restrains his enemy
50.19 … in silence. Just as this man, this noble son,
50.20 is surrounded by his enemies, so too
50.21 is the coming of the First Man
50.22 [in the midst of the Archons], the enemies of Light.
50.23 The coming of the Living Spirit, however, and the command he received
50.24 (and) with which he fell upon all the Archons, is different from that of
50.25 the First Man. His coming … the coming of the First
50.26 Man. The coming of the Living Spirit is like 50.27 this: once he was sent from the Greatness to bring
50.28 back the First Man, he is like a judge
50.29 the king might send to quell the violence of 50.30 this person, the noble son against whom his enemies
50.31 sinned. But this man … the judge[79]
50.32 strong, firm and severe … … …
50.33 and he … … in his right-[80]

51.1 eousness and his strength and he convicts 51.2 all the condemned according to their rebellious hearts and he 51.3 repays each one according to his worth. Those who are worthy of 51.4 beating, he strikes them with harsh whips. Those, however, 51.5 who are worthy of having some of their limbs cut, or indeed of 51.6 … … and he pays them their due
51.7 … … and he binds them, chains them, and hangs some
51.8 … … and he acts towards them in this way by [righteous]
51.9 judgement [and he] kills them in order to flay their skin
51.10 … … that they be killed by slaughter
51.11 … … until they die. Those, however, for whom it is suitable
51.12 … … to remove them from their homes, he will

[78] A&C: ϵqψ̣o̞o̞n̄ [ϩ]ɴ-.
[79] A&C: ⲡⲓⲣⲱⲙϵ … . ⲕ[ⲣⲓ]ⲧⲏ[ⲥ . .].
[80] A&C: [… ϩⲛ̄ ⲧϵqⲇⲓⲕⲁⲓ].

51.13 [remove them according to] righteous judgement, just like those who committed
51.14 crimes [(and) sinned against] the noble son. Also, the colleagues
51.15 [and the servants] of this judge, those who belong to 51.16 [him, in] great strength, suddenly and
51.17 quickly, they do the will of their lord.
51.18 Just as the pure judge was sent by
51.19 the king (in order to) recover this man, the
51.20 noble son, so too was the Living Spirit
51.21 sent by the King of Light
51.22 [to bring] judgment and to recover the First Man,
51.23 he against whom the King of Darkness sinned (and) committed crimes.
51.24 [He] sinned against him, along with his rebellious powers. When he[81] came,
51.25 he brought up the First Man. Also, all the Archons,
51.26 the Powers of Sin, those who committed crimes (and) sinned against the Sons
51.27 [of] the First Man, he judged them according to righteous
51.28 judgment. He bound them in the heaven and the earth. He placed each one
51.29 of them in the place suited to him. He measured each one of them
51.30 according to his cruelty and according to his humility. While some
51.31 of them he shut[82]
51.32 [in prison], others he hung upside down. Some 51.33 … … are crucified, while others (are made to)

52.1 sit down all the time. Some are fastened to 52.2 their companions, distressed by harsh bonds.
52.3 Others he has made wardens over one another,
52.4 among themselves, in order that they might do his will
52.5 to those that are under them.
52.6 Therefore, know, o my beloved,[83] that after
52.7 the Father of Life passed judgment … …
52.8 he revealed (himself) to all the powers [of Darkness (and)]
52.9 judged them like a just judge …
52.10 … … … …
52.11 [This] is the first judgment which the [Living] Spirit [passed] against the Archons
52.12 [concerning the] First Man. [To the First Man] he

52.13 awarded the victory according to his victory, while the [Archon[84] of Darkness]
52.14 he condemned according to the condemnation by which he erred …
52.15 … he sinned.[85] … Such a bond was found for him …
52.16 the earth until the end-time, when the [world] will be destroyed
52.17 and consumed by the great fire and separated. While [the]
52.18 Light (will) go to its own land, the Darkness (will) remains in 52.19 [the bond] and fetter forever.
52.20 … [As for] the advent of the Third Messenger, who came 52.21 [to inspect] those imprisoned in the Zone, he 52.22 is like a great king who comes and inspects his artisans
52.23 … … and …
52.24 … those who are good among the artisans and the builders
52.25 and the craftsmen who he assigns to each
52.26 place, seeing that they have done their work well
52.27 (and) attended to his works in their way, he rejoices
52.28 [greatly] … he thanks these craftsmen
52.29 who have fixed his things (and) [fulfilled] his orders.
52.30 Just as the great king comes and inspects
52.31 his works and his camps, so [too]
52.32 is the advent of the Third Messenger, [since]
52.33 after he comes, he too sees [his works]
52.34 fixed, accomplished, (and) … …

53.1 ranks of Archons, distributed and fixed
53.2 above and below, outside and
53.3 inside, with great skill, which his brothers had done,
53.4 who came before him to the struggle; those who fixed (and) created 53.5 the world before he had come. He saw the gods and the
53.6 angels standing firm (and) holding camp
53.7 … watching the entire Ruling Power …
53.8 … which the first powers had done,
53.9 [which are the] First Man, the [Living Spirit]
53.10 and [the] Great [Spirit, the] Mother of Life. Then, after he saw 53.11 them, that they [completed with] great wisdom all the works.
53.12 … … … they saw, he spoiled(?) …
53.13 … his [advent], by which he had come (and) [revealed]
53.14 himself. He said to the Living Spirit: The judgment you gave …
53.15 … good, what you proclaimed … …
53.16 you have [given] them accordingly because they have stirred (and) raised
53.17 those who were not worthy.
53.18 The advent of Jesus the Splendour, when he came … …

[84] A&C: ⲡⲁⲣ[ⲭⲱⲛ ⲇⲉ ⲙ̄ⲡⲕⲉⲕⲉ].
[85] A&C: … ⲁⲫ̄ⲛⲁⲃⲉ.

all, since he was like a man being [sent] to root out … … …
burn a hard reed[86] with fire. And so when he first cut the evil trees with his axe, he rooted [them] out … … …
and their bodies with his fire, so that they might not grow again
[from] now on, nor produce fruit, which the evil are to eat
… afterwards, [he] for his part planted his [good] plant, [the]
Tree of Life, which produces good fruit.
Thus, also, is it with the advent of Jesus the Splendour,
[which] happened in [this way]. For he also appointed himself
… … his power and his wisdom, in his
… … appointed(?) him king and saviour
… … in his glorious wisdom

he has destroyed them, bound them, and consumed them. Just as the fire burns and destroys trees, so too did he do
his will in the Zone
with many powers, until he reached the fleshly form
of Adam and Eve, the first human beings [and did] his will through Eve. He … [he gave] hope also to Adam and the good news …
… glorious, he went up to [the height] …
… [of] light. Then [the Call and the]
Response, the great counsel that came to the Elements, which stood in a mixture, he [combined with] them (and) established himself in silence. He takes up … [until the Last]
[Time], when he will awaken and establish himself with the Great Fire and gather to himself his own soul and mould
it into the Last Statue. You (s.) will find him too, as he sweeps away (and) throws into impurity that which is foreign to him. The Life, however, and the Light which are in all things, he collects it to himself and gathers it on his body. When this Last Statue is perfect in all its limbs, then he will depart
and ascend from this great struggle through the Living Spirit, his father, he who comes and destroys …
limb and brings it up from the gathering(?) … the dissolution
and end of all things. Now, his counsel,
the Call and Response, resembles
a stick of butter, (which) a person takes and puts it in warm milk. It melts and blends
with this warm milk. It melts again
[in] silence and stillness amid …

[86] A&C: ⲓⲁϩⲕⲉ[ⲙ].

54.30 but, by the power and the taste of this [milk] …
54.31 drawn to it and fixed and makes the [milk cold] …
54.32 in … … and … … [this milk]

55.1 it throws it and casts it out. Also, the cream and the 55.2 fat and the beauty of the milk it draws to itself.
55.3 This is also like the coming of
55.4 that enthumesis, the counsel of life, which
55.5 is the Call and Response that came to the Elements.
55.6 That is, at the end it will awaken and establish itself and gather
55.7 together with itself all life and the light which is 55.8 [left] in all things. Placing them on
55.9 its body, it will gather them to itself …
55.10 … in his image forever … …
55.11 … … from this time. Blessed is
55.12 each one who [believing] in these Five Advents and strengthening himself
55.13 [in the] knowledge of them will ascend to the height and redeem …
55.14 … … and he is not counted …
55.15 … … … …

CHAPTER 18

[ON THE FIVE] WARS [WHICH THE] SONS OF LIGHT WAGED WITH [THE SONS] OF DARKNESS

58.4 [Again][87] the Enlightener spoke: The Sons of Light have waged Five
58.5 [Wars] with the Sons of Darkness, in which the Sons of Light
58.6 [have subdued the] Sons of Darkness completely.
58.7 [The First] War is the that of the First Living Man, he who [has]
58.8 [(waged war) with the] King of Darkness and all the Archons who have come
58.9 [from the] Five Worlds of [Darkness(?)] … he caught 58.10 [them with] his net, which is the Living Soul. He …
58.11 … in the snare and … face of …
58.12 … his maiden, the Living Fire …
58.13 [They had no means] of escape from [his] net …
58.14 … he caught them like fish …
58.15 … the Five Counsels of the Five Elements …
58.16 … he cut (and) uprooted the roots of [the Five]
58.17 [Trees(?)][88] … roots of the evil trees like an axe.
58.18 As the Saviour said: Behold, the axe is at the root
58.19 [of] the evil tree, so that it might not produce evil fruit from now on.[89]
58.20 The Second War is the that of the Living Spirit …
58.21 … he established the works and the Worlds of Light.
58.22 He scattered the Archons (and) bound them in the middle …
58.23 … … the stars in the Eight[90] Earths …
58.24 in the Three Vehicles. For the Archons
58.25 rebelled (and) rose up against the Living Spirit. They wanted to 58.26 … since they knew (and) perceived that he would bind [and]
58.27 fetter them with harsh bonds. But he, the Living Spirit,
58.28 with many faces (and) a multitude of terrors, with many hands
58.29 (and) with great hardheartedness, [revealed] himself to them,
58.30 (and) imprisoned them with great skill. None among
58.31 them could be saved from his [great] bond and his fetter[91]
58.32 since he … … …
58.33 … he d ⲓvid ⲉd them … … …

ON THE FIVE RELEASES: WHAT THEY MEAN

60.16 [Again,] our Father spoke: There are Five [Releases]
60.17 by which the Light was saved from all
60.18 [the Archons and] Powers of Darkness.
60.19 [The First] liberation and rescue is the First Man's.
60.20 For, when the First Man escaped from

60.23 the First Man, much light and [much] power
60.24 was rescued from the whole Ruling Power. They ascended
60.25 with the First Man to the Aeons of Greatness. This [is the First]
60.26 Release.
60.27 The Second Rescue is the Living Spirit's, for when 60.28 the Father of Life and the Mother of the Living established the

CHAPTER 20

THE CHAPTER ON THE NAME OF THE FATHERS

63.22 Again, the Enlightener spoke to his disciples: The [Father]
63.23 [of] Greatness, who is so named, why is he called "Father"
63.24 [of] Greatness? His disciples said
63.25 to him: We implore you, our Lord, that you clarify for 63.26 us concerning this Greatness, namely, what it means that he is called
63.27 "Father" of Greatness. Then, he spoke
63.28 [to] his disciples: The Father is the first established (being),
63.29 [who is called] "Father" of Greatness,
63.30 his greatness is the Great Earth, where he dwells (and) is established
63.31 … … the essence of Light, which supports
63.32 all the Rich Ones and Angels and dwellings
63.33 … … established upon him.
63.34 [Also,] the Third Messenger is called
63.35 ["Father." His greatness] is the Light-ship of the Living Fire,

64.1 [in which he dwells] (and) is established.
64.2 [Also,] Jesus the Splendour is called "Father" too.
64.3 His greatness is the Ship of the Living Waters, in which he dwells
64.4 [(and) is established.)
64.5 The Column of Glory [is also called] "Father." His greatness

70.18 . . . . . For someone measuring 70.19 the grains of sand or boulders(?) of the mountains or 70.20 the sand of the sea or the body of the firmaments, as they crumble
70.21 . . . the body of the Four Mountains and the Three 70.22 Vehicles that surround the world. As they all crumble
70.23 . . . . . (and are reduced to[?]) fine powder(?)
70.24 Know that there is a limit to the grains of sand [found in(?)] 70.25 the whole world. It is possible to count grains of sand 70.26 yearly [and to count(?)] the grains of sand of the whole world, 70.27 but the period of time that the Great Spirit passed with the Father, 70.28 [the] first established being, cannot be counted. He initially 70.29 formed her in this way—he set her up in his inner storehouse, 70.30 in stillness and silence. When [they] needed

71.5 spent a long time hidden(?)[104] in the Mother, staying in her 71.6 inner chambers. The time-span that I have proclaimed

71.11 … … From the time that they

71.13 [the Five Shining Gods who] are his sons. They 71.14 too [also spent a long] time with the Father, that 71.15 [is, the time] that lasted from the descent of the 71.16 [First Man] to the ascent of the Last Statue. The 71.17 [Five Gods] spend a period of such length hidden in(?) the First Man.
71.18 But, [during the] time that they waited, they were called (and) came out.
71.19 Hear also this other thing that I will teach to you (about) the 71.20 time when the Mother of Life was called forth from the Father of 71.21 Greatness—Had she pushed herself and come down of her own desire,[106]
71.22 from the height of the Father to the earth, then [she would have spent]
71.23 [a thousand] years and many ten-thousands until she reached the earth.
71.24 [Though] there is no measure or limit to the height of the Father, [when(?)][107]
71.25 he called his Great Spirit, he thus set her on 71.26 the Land of Greatness through one of the three that belong to the twelve,
71.27 those who are hidden in the veil of light, who
71.28 are established in … the southern region.
71.29 [The] work of the Mother [of] Life is like this, when
71.30 [the Father] called her (and) established her in the place where he wanted
71.31 her to be established as the Thought of people, which 71.32 … … many and searched every place where

72.16 … of the son. He stripped himself from them …
72.17 … … he armed himself (and) bound himself to …
72.18 in one … of the silence on the edge of the earth …
72.19 He, too, the First Man, spent a long time
72.20 until he gave power to his Sons, until he bore
72.21 them. After his bearing of them, while standing in the
72.22 height between the border, he also spend time
72.23 in this way, like the number and quantity of rain-drops,
72.24 dew, and mist which falls in
72.25 the world. This is how he also spend time standing
72.26 between the borders until the moment when he descended to 72.27 the struggle.
72.28 When the Father of Greatness [called] the Great Spirit
72.29 and the First Man and the Glorious Gods who were destined(?)
72.30 to appear from him at this same time,[110] he 72.31 fashioned the Great Builder in the [Land of] Light [and]
72.32 the Living Spirit and the strong and efficient Gods which came [from]
72.33 him. Also at this time, he fashioned the Messenger
72.34 and Jesus the Splendour and the Virgin of Light
72.35 and the Column of Glory and the Gods who [came from them].

CHAPTER 25

ON THE FIVE[126] [FATHERS: FROM WHICH LIMBS THEY HAVE COME]

76.18 Again the Apostle spoke about [the emanation[127] of the Five Fathers]
76.19 [from] the Father, one after the other. Thus he spoke: [the Messenger]
76.20 [came] from his Mind, the Beloved of Lights
76.21 [from his Thought], the Mother of Life from his Insight, [Jesus][128]
76.22 the Beloved from his Counsel, the Virgin of Light
76.23 from his Consideration. This is the way that [these Five] Fathers
76.24 were called (into being). These Five Advents came from the Five Limbs of the 76.25 Father. One came after the other (and) appeared in his time.

CHAPTER 27

ON THE FIVE FORMS WHICH EXIST IN THE ARCHON{S} OF DARKNESS

77.25 [Again] as the Apostle sat in the assembly, he said [to]
77.26 [his] disciples: As for the Archon, the leader of all the powers
77.27 [of Darkness], there are [Five Forms] in his body, according to 77.28 [the form] of the seal [of the Five] Creations which exist in the Five
77.29 Worlds of Darkness. His head has the face of a lion and 77.30 originated from [the] World of Fire. His wings and his
77.31 [shoulders] have the face of an eagle, according to the form of the Sons of Wind.
77.32 [His hands] and [his feet] are demons, according to the form
77.33 [of the Sons] of the World of Smoke. His belly has the face of 77.34 [a dragon, according to the form of the] World of Darkness. His tail [has]

78.1 the form of the fish, which belongs to [the World of the] Sons of Water. These
78.2 Five Forms[129] are found in him; they [have come] from the Five [Creations]
78.3 of the Five Worlds of Darkness. When he wants, [he goes]
78.4 [on] his two feet and … the World of [Smoke]
78.5 Also, when he wants, he [appears] to them as four[130] …
78.6 on his hands and feet[131] like [the] Sons of Fire.
78.7 When he wants, he lifts (himself) with his wings like the Sons of 78.8 the [Wind]. Also, when he wants, he leaps(?)[132] into the waters
78.9 [like the] Sons of the Water. Also, when he wants, he creeps on 78.10 [his belly] like the Sons of Darkness. [These Five] Forms exist
78.11 in him. There are also three other in him. [The First]:
78.12 … his powers … …
78.13 The Second: … …
78.14 his magic. When he [wants, he calls upon it]
78.15 [himself] and hides from his powers. [Also, when he wants]
78.16 he shows himself to them (and) causes wounds and [carnage with his]
78.17 magic. By the word which he utters on occasion, he does [his magic]

78.18 with it. The Third: His body is strong, so that all the …,
78.19 all the teeth and the claws of his powers may not pierce [him].
78.20 No body of iron and copper will be fitting for him nor[133]
78.21 will they imprison him, since he was created and fashioned
78.22 from the bitter Consideration of Matter, the Mother of the demons [and]
78.23 evil spirits. There are also three other (forms) in him. When [he wants]
78.24 his fire blazes and his whole body becomes like a [… of]
78.25 the fire. Also, when he wants, he sends out
78.26 frost and his entire body becomes cold like …
78.27 snow. The Third: When his powers [stand]
78.28 before him, he looks at them and knows what [is]
78.29 in their heart. He knows what is in [their heart]
78.30 and their face so long as they stand before him. [When]
78.31 they retreat from him and remove themselves from him [he does not]
78.32 know what is in their heart. There is no life [in him]
78.33 at all, but his life is the gall of [anger] and [poison,[134] which are visible]
78.34 in his face. By his terror …

79.1 of imprisonment(?) which stands before him. Behold, do not deliver
79.2 yourselves, my beloved, to the forms of this Archon, the root
79.3 of all wickedness, the bosom and camp
79.4 of every ugliness. But, you, keep yourselves
79.5 from him and his evil wisdom which dwells in your
79.6 bodies, lest they mix with you and they destroy your 79.7 gentleness and change your wisdom into a lie.
79.8 But be diligent and perfect
79.9 before the Mind of Truth which has revealed itself to you, that 79.10 you may … and be drawn up …
79.11 to the height and inherit [life] from [eternity]
79.12 [to] eternity.

[134] A&C: ⲙ[ⲛ ⲡ]ⲙⲉⲧϙ[ϒ.

CHAPTER 33

ON THE FIVE THINGS THAT HE CONSTRUCTED WITH THE HARD BODIES OF THE ARCHONS

86.22 Again, the Enlightener spoke: The Living Spirit constructed [Five]
86.23 Great Things from the veins, brains, [and] hard [bodies.]
86.24 The First is the disk which sits on [the]
86.25 shoulders of the Porter. The [Second] is the arch of [the]
86.26 column which is before him. [The] Third is the [shape]
86.27 of the form of gehenna. The Fourth is the [Seven]
86.28 Columns which he set up in the Great Sea in the 86.29 Seven Parts of the world. The Fifth is the Four 86.30 Walls which surround the passage.

CHAPTER 37

ON THE THREE ZONES

89.3 Again the Enlightener spoke about the Living Spirit: When he
89.4 built (and) constructed the worlds, he suspended the zones
89.5 in their zones within their zones again. The First Zone{s}
89.6 are (those of) the Five Powers of Darkness, male and female.
89.7 This (statement) that "he suspended a zone in a zone" (means that) he suspended
89.8 the Five Powers of Darkness in the Five Splendours of the Son of
89.9 Man. For the whole enmity is fastened and bound in them.
89.10 Also, within the zone are the Five Sons of the [Living] Spirit,
89.11 for the entire construction hangs on them as he
89.12 … … heard him too. The other …
89.13 … … after them. That he suspended [the zones(?)] (means that)
89.14 [he suspended them from the] upper firmaments [to the firmaments further down]
89.15 … … which is in a zone is the Great [King of Glory],
89.16 who exists … … within the …
89.17 … the world.

CHAPTER 38

ON THE LIGHT-MIND, THE APOSTLES, AND THE SAINTS

89.21 Again at one occasion, a disciple questioned the [Apostle],
89.22 saying to him: You have told us that the Light-Mind
89.23 is that which comes and supports the saints. [You have told]
89.24 us therefore that even though it is one of the gods …
89.25 … many gods are found in it. You have told
89.26 us also that at the time it enters into [the body]
89.27 of the flesh and binds the Old Man with its Five Counsels,
89.28 setting up its Five Counsels on him in the Five Limbs
89.29 [of his] body. Where is it [though], since the Old Man is bound in the 89.30 body? For, I (can) see that rebellions occur in its
89.31 bond from time to time. Secondly, I ask
89.32 you: If indeed it is a great god, unchanging and 89.33 immeasurable, how does it come to appear in the smallness of the 89.34 body? The third thing that I want you to tell
89.35 me [is this: If(?)] the Mind is holy and pure,
89.36 [how did it come to be joined to(?)] the impurity of this body?

90.1 Fourthly, if truly, the Light-Mind is present in [the]
90.2 saints, why does its likeness not appear to us as it
90.3 is? The fifth thing: I want
90.4 you to tell me (about) and explain your apostleship.
90.5 For, behold, it is not clear to me, since they oppress
90.6 you and persecute you in the world.
90.7 I implore you that you persuade me about these things which I have asked you.
90.8 Then he spoke to this disciple: My entire revelation,
90.9 which I have revealed, I have made it known to my Church
90.10 (and) it is true before you. One and the same is it everywhere. [What, then,]
90.11 are you missing?[135] This disciple said [to the Apostle]:
90.12 While indeed you have revealed everything (and) persuaded [us][136] that they are

[135] A&C: ⲉ[ⲩ ⲡⲉⲧ] |[11]ⲕ[ⲫⲁ]ⲣⲧ ⲙ̄ⲙⲁⲩ.
[136] A&C: ⲁⲕⲡ̣ⲱⲉ̣ [ⲙ̄ⲙⲁⲛ] ⲉ̣[ⲩⲟ ⲙ̄ⲙⲏ]|ⲉ.

90.13 true before us, nevertheless I would also like to get to know[137] the Light-
90.14 Mind as it is.
90.15 Then, the Apostle spoke to him: If I go on once again
90.16 to relate[138] to you these things that you are (already) versed in, they being true
90.17 before you, (then) by means of these things which you are versed in,[139] you will
90.18 come to know [what you are missing]. I will give the perception of those who perceive for your sake. I will let 90.19 the living fountain gush forth for those who thirst, that they might drink and live.
90.20 Then the Apostle said to him: All Error, when the
90.21 Enemy of Light established it, was established after the likeness of 90.22 a human being. The head of the cosmos is the edge of the garments.
90.23 Its neck is the collar[140] of the garments. Its stomach is 90.24 [the] Five Folds which are the … of the garments.
90.25 Its ribs are [all] the firmaments. Its navel [is the]
90.26 circuit[141] of stars and the Zodiac. [The parts], however, [which] 90.27 extend from its navel {from its [navel]} to its loins is [the …]
90.28 … which extend from the circuit [to the corners] of the Four 90.29 Worlds. Its loins are the … which is below …
90.30 on the head of the Porter. Its … from the …
90.31 to the earth on which the Porter stands.
90.32 Its shinbones and its feet are … of the [Porter(?)]
90.33 and the entire Zone which belongs … …

91.26 in this mēte. He gave … because of the Desire of Matter.[145] [He has]
91.27 also placed the King of Glory, who is the Counsel …
91.28 the long-suffering upon the Three Images, that of wind, that of 91.29 fire, (and) that of water. He has given him the …

92.1 Again, the Messenger distilled from them the Five
92.2 Intellectuals of Life. Also, the Call and Response were set
92.3 in them, now making them six Sons of the Living Spirit,
92.4 along with six Sons of the First Man.
92.5 Again, the Messenger set in them the Great Mind,
92.6 which is the Column of Glory, the Perfect Man.
92.7 Again, Jesus the Youth was set among them, who is
92.8 the Image of the Living Word, of the Proclamation and the Hearing.
92.9 He strengthened these camps, above and below,
92.10 so that each one of them may secure itself in the circuit of its 92.11 watch-post, (and) so that rebellion and deceit might not occur in its watch.
92.12 Look, then, and see: The Keeper of Splendour stands in the
92.13 Great Mind, in the camp that (sits) above the prison
92.14 of those who are bound, so that he might bring to naught all the gloom of death.
92.15 But, deceit and rebellion occurred. Sin aborted,
92.16 [intertwined] with the soul, and mixed with the Light which was 92.17 freed by the image of the Messenger (and) went [up to] …
92.18 … [in the] Third Firmament, which is above the watch-tower

[144] A&C: ⲡⲫ[ⲧ]ⲁⲩ ⲛⲕⲁⲓⲙⲁ.
[145] A&C: ⲧⲉⲡⲓⲑⲩⲙⲓⲁ ⲛⲧ[ⲍ]ⲩ[ⲗⲏ ⲁⲫ].

92.19 … the Keeper of Splendour. From this place, too, it intertwined
92.20 with the Light. It came out (and) went down
92.21 to the dry and the moist. It [fashioned] the trees [in][146]
92.22 the dry, while in the sea it took form immediately
92.23 and made a great rebellion in the sea.
92.24 Behold and see that the great King of Honour, he who is
92.25 the Thought found in the Third Firmament, he is [terrible]
92.26 with wrath. But, rebellion (still) [occurred], since deceit and
92.27 hate are found in the camp, (that is,) the Watchers
92.28 of heaven who came down to the earth during his watch:
92.29 they engaged in every act of deceit. They revealed the arts
92.30 in the world (and) unveiled to human beings the mysteries [of]
92.31 heaven. There is no limit to (the) rebellion and destruction (that) occurred on the
92.32 earth. The Adamas … …
92.33 … perfection, he stands on … …

93.1 and deceit occurred in his camp: which is, when
93.2 the abortions fell down, Adam and Eve
93.3 were formed and begotten, so that by means of them they might rule the world.
93.4 They accomplished all the works of Desire on the 93.5 earth; the whole world was filled with their Desire. By 93.6 means of this mēte,[147] they also persecute the churches (and) kill
93.7 the apostles and the righteous in the watch-district of the Adamas
93.8 of Light, from time to time throughout the generations.
93.9 Also, in the watch of the great King of Glory, he who is
93.10 the great Counsel (and) who has authority over the Three
93.11 Wheels, disturbance and tribulation occurred, since they …
93.12 the earth (and) disturbed the Three Earths. When the Messenger
93.13 revealed his image, the roads closed to their [escape(?)]
93.14 … their departure was hindered [when(?)]
93.15 the wind, the water, and the fire came into them.
93.16 Also, in the watch of the Porter, he who humbled …
93.17 rebellion in the lower depths … …
93.18 bent, the lower fixtures stripped … …
93.19 in the lower foundation. … …
93.20 Because of the earthquake which occurred in the watch of the Keeper
93.21 of Splendour, the Column of Glory came forth being … … and acted as 93.22 [a(?)] helper to the Keeper of Splendour. He bore all the 93.23 weight. Also, because of the deceit and the rebellion which

[146] A&C: [ⲥ][ⲙ̄].
[147] Meaning no known, but something like "leeway"(?).

93.24 occurred during the watch of the great King of Honour, (that is,) the
93.25 Watchers who came down to the earth from the heavens,[148] because of them
93.26 the Four Angels were commanded (to) bind the Watchers
93.27 with a bond forever in the prison of those who are black.[149]
93.28 Their sons were wiped off (the face of) the earth.
93.29 Since the abortions also came down during the watch of the Adamas
93.30 (and) begot Adam and Eve, because of this great deceit
93.31 and the mystery of evil, he sent Jesus
93.32 … the prayer of the Five Sons, he bore …
93.33 … the abortions, he fastened them beneath the
93.34 … the Mind of Adam.

94.1 Also, because of the earthquake which occurred in these Three 94.2 Earths, and because the roads ended (and) the fountains of 94.3 wind, water, and fire ceased, Jesus descended (and)
94.4 bore Eve. He made straight the paths of the wind, the water, and 94.5 the fire, opened to them the fountains, (and) constructed for them the paths
94.6 of ascent. Again, since the
94.7 earth which is below the Porter (was) stripped [of the] fixtures which 94.8 … indeed, because of this, Jesus came down to bear
94.9 [Eve.] Before he reached that place, he ordered (and) strengthened
94.10 the fixtures which are below, (then) returned (and) went back up to his
94.11 resting-place. Then the Apostle said to him:
94.12 See all these watches of the Zone, in which these great gods
94.13 are lords, watching over them … …
94.14 rebellion and deceit occurred in them. The …
94.15 … in them from time to time, in great humility,
94.16 until they humble the powers of enmity.
94.17 This is also how it is with the body—a great power dwells
94.18 within it. Even though it is small in its form, Sin nevertheless
94.19 dwells within it along with the Old Man, who resides in it. It is inhabited
94.20 by a very great wisdom, until the Light-Mind
94.21 finds the way to humble this body and drive it [according]
94.22 to its will. As in the watches
94.23 of his great brothers who are lords out in the Zone—
94.24 (that is,) the great body, (where) earthquake and deceit occur
94.25 from time to time—so too in the watch-tower of the

[148] According to Henning this passages represents a fragment from Mani's Book of Giants (W.B. Henning: Selected Papers II [Leiden: Brill, 1977], 135).

[149] See Polotsky/Böhlig 93.27. This passage is a puzzling piece of Manichaean cosmology, perhaps reflecting the influence of another (Enochic?) tradition.

94.26 Mind, which is the body of the flesh, does Sin raise
94.27 from time to time its agitations in the body.
94.28 But, in this way, know that the powers of Light
94.29 are good. The beginning and the end are revealed to them.
94.30 Everything they do, they do with correct judgement.
94.31 Because of this, they allow the enmity
94.32 to initiate Error and to do its will [for]
94.33 a while. Then, they are seized …

95.1 … they have acted first in righteous judgement.
95.2 But, as for this other (question), which you posed: How does the Light-
95.3 Mind come, this great strength, and endure such a small
95.4 body of flesh? Behold, again, and see these gods that 95.5 … they [are] great and strong, yet each one of them is limited (and)
95.6 confined in [the] place where it stands, like trees
95.7 cleaving to their taproot.[150] This also is the way that each one
95.8 of them cleaves to its taproot in the world, according to
95.9 [the] size of the place where he stands, enduring until
95.10 … the end[151] … But, know also
95.11 … … the world stands, being established …
95.12 … [the] Living Spirit in all his Limbs
95.13 … … Sin took this body away from the [Land]
95.14 [of Light and(?)] established it in his Limbs. It removed his [body]
95.15 [from the Five] Bodies of Darkness (and) established the body. His
95.16 [soul], however, he took from the Five Luminous Gods
95.17 (and) bound it to the Five Limbs of the Body. It bound Mind
95.18 in bone, Thought in sinew, Insight in vein, Counsel
95.19 in flesh, Consideration in skin. It set
95.20 [it] in its Five Powers: Its Mind on the Mind of the soul,
95.21 [its] Thought on the Thought of the soul, its Insight on the Insight
95.22 [of] the soul, its Counsel on the Counsel of the soul, (and) its 95.23 Consideration on the Consideration of the soul. It set its Five
95.24 Angels and its Authorities on the Five Limbs
95.25 [of the Soul], which he took (and) bound in the flesh.
95.26 … impregnating the soul, drawing it each time to
95.27 all (sorts of) evil works, to all sins of Desire, to the
95.28 worship of idols, to the Sects of Error, to
95.29 humility in the humility of slavery, as it stands serving
95.30 the foul things which do not last, worshipping
95.31 … … idols of wood and gold and silver
95.32 … … they čajē(?),[152] serving the filthy

96.14 [releases] it from bone. It releases the Thought [of the Soul]
96.15 from sinew and binds, in turn, the Thought [of Sin in]
96.16 sinew. It releases the Insight of the Soul from vein,
96.17 and binds, in turn, the Insight of Sin in vein. It
96.18 frees the Counsel of the Soul and releases it from the flesh
96.19 and binds, in turn, the Counsel of Sin in the flesh. It
96.20 releases the Consideration of the Soul from the skin and binds
96.21 the Consideration of Sin in the skin.
96.22 This is how it releases the Limbs of the Soul
96.23 and makes them free from the Five Limbs of Sin.
96.24 These Five Limbs of Sin which are released,
96.25 it binds them. It establishes the Limbs of the Soul, builds them up,
96.26 refines them, and establishes them in the New Man, a son of 96.27 righteousness. When it fashions and establishes
96.28 and purifies the New Man, then it acquires Five
96.29 Great, Living Limbs from the Five Great Limbs
96.30 and places them in the Limbs of the New Man. It places its Mind,
96.31 which is Love, in the Mind of the New Man. Thought,
96.32 on the other hand, which is Belief, it sets [in] the Thought [of the New]
96.33 Man, who it refines. Insight, which [is Perfection, it places]

97.2 Long-suffering, it places in his Counsel. Wisdom,[156]
97.3 which is his Consideration, (it places) in the Consideration of the New 97.4 Man. It purifies the image of the word from the word of 97.5 Sin and adds it to its (own) word, so that its 97.6 … might be a nourisher and strengthener …

[156] Polotsky/Böhlig suggests that the elements "wisdom" and "consideration" should be inversed (97 n. 2).

97.16 … and his desire, his … … his
97.17 foolishness in these Five Limbs of the Body. [Just as]
97.18 the Spirit of Darkness is enclosed with them in a bond and in
97.19 a severe affliction, the New Man, on the other hand, rules
97.20 in his Love, in his Belief, in his Perfection, in his
97.21 Long-suffering, and in his Wisdom. Also, his king, who[158]
97.22 [is the Light-Mind], is king over all. It [rules over him]
97.23 [according to] its will. As long as the Limbs of Sin are bound[159]
97.24 in this way, Sin is contained. Even though the Light-Mind
97.25 [is] king, tribulation may still occur in the body from
97.26 time to time. Sometimes Sin rises
97.27 up in his Consideration and disturbs Counsel, and confuses
97.28 Wisdom and the understanding of the man and causes truth
97.29 to leave him in favour of doubt and to make statements (that) are
97.30 inane and without salt.[160] When the sign of his 97.31 foolishness comes … in the Church, the Teachers and

98.3 and the encouragement[162] of his brothers and his helpers, then 98.4 Sin rises up again from Consideration to 98.5 Counsel and takes his Long-suffering [from him] and clothes him
98.6 with cowardice and loss, and the sign[163] (of this) becomes evident

98.12 brothers gather[164] together and they become …
98.13 … him and they quiet the … …
98.14 … they put him in his place again …
98.15 one another in his struggle. If, however, …
98.16 that place, then Sin rises up again to …
98.17 … and clothes him with Desire and pretension and
98.18 pride, and he leaves his Teacher and brothers.
98.19 He always wants to go in and out alone,
98.20 he wants to eat (and) drink alone, as a solitary. He 98.21 always wants to walk alone. This, then, is the
98.22 sign that the habit of his brothers does not please him. If he
98.23 [lets] his heart [succumb(?)] to lust, Sin will again raise
98.24 the Death-desire in his Thought. He … to
98.25 vanity and he gives up his faith and his truth leaves
98.26 him. When the sign of his foolishness
98.27 appears and his notoriety spreads though the Church, the
98.28 wise ones of the Church assemble so that they might strengthen his [heart]
98.29 and build him up in the rule[165] of God. (Then), if he has accepted [the]
98.30 advice of his brothers and heard the … …
98.31 and has turned away from his anger and … …,

99.1 (then) it is possible that he (might) live and conquer Sin and all its
99.2 wars. But if he does not strengthen this watch, it (will) come back
99.3 and put on and disturb his Mind, which was originally
99.4 at rest. It (will) disturb his love for his Teacher and his
99.5 instructor. It (will) remove from his heart the love for the Church
99.6 and fill it totally with hate, and all his brothers (will) become hateful
99.7 to him. His brothers and his beloved and his companions,
99.8 who love him, they (will) be like enemies to him.
99.9 Now, if[166] this man is disturbed in this way, and he abandons his
99.10 love and his desire to change himself, (then) this
99.11 man (will) become, in turn, a lost vessel and he (will) leave the
99.12 Church and he (will) reach his end in the world.
99.13 The Mind which was in him (will) be dispersed from him and return
99.14 to the Apostle who sent it. He becomes filled with evil spirits
99.15 and they play with [him], drawing him here and there, and he, in turn,
99.16 becomes like an worldly man, changing and being like a
99.17 bird plucked of its feathers {and becomes earthly}.

99.18 Behold![167] I have shown you (s.) and clarified for you (s.) that, just as
99.19 agitation occurs in the Zone, in the camps of
99.20 these great and mighty gods. So too
99.21 disturbance happens from time to time in the jurisdiction[168] of the
99.22 Light-Mind. Just as these watchers stand
99.23 [in] the Zone (and) are not visible, so too is it with the
99.24 Light-Mind, [since] it is not visible in the body.
99.25 Also, just as these outer [watchers] are great,
99.26 but bend (and) [bow] (and) shrink according to the size of the task
99.27 assigned to each one of them, so too is it with the
99.28 Mind. It too is great and exalted, but it has bent itself
99.29 (and) shrunk according to this small, repulsive body.
99.30 Just as the gods [in the] outer Zone are excellent,
99.31 pure, (and) established [in] the mixture of the All, and yet not polluted,
99.32 [so too does the] Light-[Mind] stand in its 99.33 … … … …

100.1 Behold the strength and the efficiency of the Light-
100.2 Mind: how great it is on all the watch-towers of 100.3 the body. It stands in its encampment (and) shields
100.4 every impulse of the body from the attractions of Sin.
100.5 It fixes them, scatters them, (and) sets them right
100.6 according to its will. It also does another excellent (and)
100.7 exceptional thing—it sets a great spirit on the 100.8 Elect. Indeed, you (s.) find him established on the earth,
100.9 rising in his heart, (and) going up to the Father, the
100.10 God of Truth, he who is established above
100.11 all the works of loss. It also rushes in 100.12 his Insight and his Consideration, and goes down to 100.13 the Land of Darkness, from which the Darkness has sprung.
100.14 His heart runs and meets everything, after having … them.
100.15 Then he said to that disciple: Behold![169] I have taught you (about)
100.16 the deeds of the Light-Mind. To the one who has 100.17 open and perceptive eyes it will be visible, (but) to the one who 100.18 does not have these eyes it will not be visible.
100.19 As for my work, which is [revealed] (but) is not clear to you—
100.20 the works that I have done—I am the one who will teach
100.21 them and I will clarify for you these wonders [of] my works[170]
100.22 and my leadership.

100.25 both gold and silver, both brass … money and 100.26 numerous gifts, both armour and armaments, [the]
100.27 multitude of humanity have submitted to me—
100.28 many divinities and idols from the 100.29 furnaces. You have seen the [kingdom] of the world, how 100.30 with many graces and gifts, with
100.31 armour and war and [violence] they have hardly humbled the 100.32 cities and subdued the lands. [I, however, I have subdued]
100.33 without armour and without [armaments …][171] distant [cities]

101.1 through the word of God. In distant lands
101.2 they bless my name and it is glorified in all lands.
101.3 Know also this other thing that I will teach you: the 101.4 kings have striven with me, along with the princes and the 101.5 officials and their functionaries, so that they might destroy this truth,
101.6 (but) they have had no power over me in this regard. Now, if I am alone,
101.7 why did they have no power over me, namely, all those who strove
101.8 with me? The third thing is that [there is]
101.9 no one in the world who has given freedom to his children and 101.10 his brothers and his relatives (and) freed them
101.11 from the variability of all things just as I
101.12 have made all my sons free from every toil, and [how I have][172]
101.13 granted every freedom(?).[173] The fourth thing: I have [clothed] them
101.14 with the armour [of] wisdom, so that you (s.) will not find one single
101.15 person who will … and conquer them. Just as no
101.16 one has been able to conquer me in the entire world, so too is it
101.17 with my children. No one will be able to conquer them.
101.18 The fifth thing: I have chosen with my power this entire, great
101.19 election. I have given to my children my staffs of knowledge[174]
101.20 and the great fountains of wisdom. Because the previous[175]
101.21 apostles did not give their churches wisdom[176] as I
101.22 gave to mine,[177] I have strengthened my church (and) have left it
101.23 every good thing that is useful to it in every (sort of) work.
101.24 I have planted good and sown truth in every land, near
101.25 and far. Apostles and elders
101.26 have I sent to every land. Because the previous

101.27 apostles who went to them earlier did not accomplish what I have accomplished
101.28 [in] this past generation, save for Jesus alone, the son of 101.29 [the] Greatness who is the father of all apostles.
101.30 For all the apostles have not accomplished what 101.31 [I have] accomplished. Behold and see now how great is my 101.32 [power] and my diligence. For no one among the previous 101.33 [apostles, who appeared before me(?)][178] in the flesh was like me in 101.34 … … through me. For this great

102.1 door has been opened, which I have opened, to the gods and angels and 102.2 the people and all the spirits and living souls which are 102.3 prepared for life and eternal rest.
102.4 Then, when his disciples heard all these words which he had
102.5 proclaimed to them, they answered (and) said to him: Great 102.6 and strong are all these things which you have proclaimed to us; (things) which 102.7 you have done by your power and the power of the one who sent you. Who 102.8 could fully repay you for the grace which you have
102.9 done for us, except this one who sent you? But, this is the only 102.10 thanks available to us to repay you, (namely) that we strengthen ourselves in 102.11 your faith and keep your commandments and, moreover, that we be content
102.12 with the words you have proclaimed to us.

CHAPTER 39

ON THE THREE DAYS[179] AND THE TWO DEATHS

102.16 Again the Apostle spoke to his disciples:
102.17 Know! my beloved ones, that three great, mighty days
102.18 occur in the universe as well as two great,
102.19 bitter deaths. When his disciples heard (this)
102.20 they said to him: Tell us, our father, what are these 102.21 three great days or what are these two bitter
102.22 deaths. He said to them:
102.23 The first day is our Father, the Man—from the moment
102.24 that the First Man came down to the depth of the Darkness (and)
102.25 was submerged in it. (Then), the Living Spirit was sent(?), who went (down)
102.26 (and) brought him up. After the Man ascended, the Father of 102.27 Life and the Great Spirit set in order the affairs and the worlds
102.28 (both) above and below. Moreover, the glorious Messenger
102.29 came and boarded the Ship of the Day.
102.30 He revealed his glorious image (and) purified [the Light]
102.31 from all things. He journeyed through the heights of the 102.32 heavens, until the time when the world will be dissolved,
102.33 all things destroyed, the Great [Fire] unleashed,
102.34 and the Last Statue ascends. These three deeds
102.35 were begun on this first [day, when the First Man]
102.36 was sent along with his Five [Sons. The first death],[180]

103.1 however, is the Darkness, which mixed with the Five Sons
103.2 of the First Man. The second day
103.3 is when the Fathers of Light, who were victorious in the struggle,
103.4 will sit on their thrones in the New Age and dwell
103.5 on the New Earth. They (will) rule in the New [Age]
103.6 until the time when the Father will unveil his image
103.7 above them. It is necessary that they dwell[181] in the New Age
103.8 for the length of the first day that he spent [in affliction].
103.9 They will rule in this way and rejoice in [the New]
103.10 Age. The great third day [is when]

[179] The topic of the "three days" was, according to al-Nadīm, the subject of a chapter of Mani's work, Treasure of Life (Dodge, 798; Tardieu, Le manichéisme, 52).

[180] Something like "night" might make more sense here (Funk, personal communication).

[181] A&C: ⲧⲟⲩ(ⲟⲩ)ⲱϩ.

the Father will unveil his [image] over them …
… … and raise them up …
and take them into his hidden storehouse …
and give … to his soul. He will pour upon them …
his ambrosia and his sweet aroma, which will take away
all the tribulation that they saw with their (own) eyes, and give them[182] relief and eternal joy. When his grace satisfies them and he gives them his fruit[183] and they are renewed, he will then call them [in] peace
and silence and perfect their substance [in] the same measure as his former aeons and reveal every power in its aeon, in its dwelling place. They will dwell in the New Age with their aeons. When they dwell with their aeons,
they will become immeasurably rich
for timeless eternity. From this moment on, they will not count this time among them, nor the number of days and hours through every generation, forever and ever. The Father will not be hidden from them from this moment on. Once he has been unveiled to them, he will [stay] unveiled forever. These are the three great days
[that the Father of] Greatness has accounted for in the reckoning of
[the number] of days.[184] The two deaths, however, which I have [proclaimed to you are these:

The first death is from the moment when the Light fell into the Darkness (and) mixed together with the Archons of Darkness until the moment when the Light will be purified and separate from the Darkness through that Great Fire. The remainder, which will be left over in it, will (be) built (onto) and add(ed) to this Last Statue. The second death is the death by which the souls of sinful people die, when
[they] will be stripped of the shining Light which illumined
the world and they are, in turn, separated from the Living Air from which they received breath, and they are deprived of the Living Soul which
… in the world, and they are separated and swept away from this Last Statue …
… and they are bound in every limb
… … the woman(?)[185] will become … and …
their torture and their tribulation, because their deeds …

CHAPTER 48

ON THE CONDUITS(?)[186]

120.23 Again, the Enlightener spoke: Three conduits are found
120.24 in the entire Zone (running) from the depth to the height.
120.25 The first conduit is the root of all the higher powers:
120.26 those that are found in all the heavens; those that come down
120.27 (and) are bound to the lower earths. Since the lower earth
120.28 is the hide,[187] the garment, and the body of higher powers
120.29 in the heavens. For when the Father of Life
120.30 established the worlds of heaven, he stripped them of their bodies (and)
120.31 threw them to the lower earths. While the upper worlds
120.32 became psychic and pneumatic, the lower worlds
120.33 became somatic and carcass-like …

121.1 Because of this, he … the powers of heaven (and) sealed
121.2 it on their bodies and their carcasses that are in the earths, so that
121.3 when Life comes up from the fullness of these earths,
121.4 it may be completely drawn to the height through the roots of the heavenly, those 121.5 that are nailed in their bodies, and all Life will be distilled from these 121.6 places. The dregs, however, that is swept away from the purity
121.7 which comes up to the height, is left to fall down
121.8 into the channels(?)[188] of the conduits and flow down to …
121.9 and be thrown into the deep.[189] This is the first conduit, which 121.10 runs from the powers of heaven to their bodies and their 121.11 carcasses on the earth. (It) also (runs) from their bodies and [their]
121.12 carcasses on the earth to the powers of heaven.
121.13 The second conduit is the one that runs from the temples and the 121.14 dwellings and the cities in heaven down to

[186] The precise meaning of ⲁⲓϩⲙⲉ is uncertain.

[187] According to Theodore bar Khonai, the Living Spirit uses the flayed skins of the Archons, i.e., "their hides" (ܦܓܪܝܗܘܢ) (315.10 [Scher]) to construct the heavens and their corpses to construct the earths. This may be the idea reflected by the Coptic term ⲡⲕⲱⲕ ⲁϩⲏⲩ, which Polotsky/Böhlig translated as das Ausgezogene and Gardner as "stripping off."

[188] Even though the same word, ⲁⲓϩⲙⲉ, is used, it seems to imply another aspect of the "conduit."

[189] What is being imagined here is some kind of distillation apparatus.

the Five Kinds of Trees that grow upon the earth. Life comes up from the Trees to the temples and the cities. But, the Life and the Fire of the heavenly ones comes down to the Trees in their conduits. The third conduit, however, is all the powers and the companions who dwell in all the firmaments,
those whose roots run down from them to the Five
Worlds of Flesh that creep upon the earth, fixed to one another.
While Power and Life gather together in the Worlds
of Flesh and go out from them in various forms, the powers of heaven draw it to them upwards through the conduits.
[The] dregs, however, and the desires and the evils and the wraths, which abound in the powers [of] heaven, they are poured their various conduits. They are poured into human beings
[and] the rest of the beasts. When the heavenly cause the dregs, the stink, and the poison to flow down to the creations of flesh below, the creations abound
in desire, in wrath, (and) in evil
[through] the energy of their fathers on high.
The Apostle [spoke]:[190] As for the wheel of the stars. It does not have
[a root on this earth] but its roots are bound in the
[All.] But, [the wheel of the stars], thriving on the Power and the Life that comes up [from] the earth through the conduits

and the firmament above, draws Life from these conduits
that lead up to the firmaments and the worlds
of heaven above it, drawing Life from that place.
Then the disciples asked the Enlightener (and) said to him: If the wheel has no root on this earth, where then do the stars
and the zodiacal signs find the power to become masters over these Five Fleshes and the Five Trees, even though you tell us that the wheel has no root? For you have told us that as everything diminishes on the earth, the powers above in the heavens gather it through a conduit. Also, we see that every thing which happens to a man—whether wealth
comes to him or he is struck by poverty,
his sickness or his health—it happens to him
through the Zodiac and the stars under which he was begotten.
Then he spoke to his disciples: That which I proclaimed to you—that the wheel has no root—I proclaimed it to you correctly. It is certainly correct here, since when the [190] This may indicate an originally separate chapter.

122.19 Living Spirit, the Father of Life, established the heavens and 122.20 the firmaments above, he bound their roots together with 122.21 the earths below in their carcasses, which he had stripped from 122.22 them. But, after he established the wheel, he did not 122.23 bind its root to the earths, but rather bound the 122.24 root of the wheel to the sea-giant. Then, when the
122.25 Messenger came, he revealed his image,
122.26 purified and took [away] the light from all the heavens, then Matter,
122.27 in turn, which is found in all the Archons, leapt out
122.28 from them against the image of the Messenger (and) ascended
122.29 so that it might attain it, (but) it did not attain it. It turned and fell
122.30 down. Then, when if fell from the height,
122.31 it scattered itself into three parts. The first part
122.32 fell onto the wheel, another [part fell onto the earth, (and still) another]

123.1 one fell into the sea. [From][191] the part which fell to 123.2 the sphere, the roots were bound in the trees and (the) flesh.
123.3 Because of this, they took power and ruled in the Five
123.4 Worlds of Flesh and the Five Worlds of the Tree.
123.5 Through the nature (i.e., of Matter) that came down upon the wheel,
123.6 the root was bound in the trees. Also, through the abortions that 123.7 came down, other roots were bound in the flesh. Because of 123.8 this, too, the stars and the zodiacal signs took power over the trees
123.9 and the fleshes through the root of Sin, which fell down,
123.10 and the root of the abortions who were aborted and fell
123.11 down. But, these other conduits, which the Living Spirit
123.12 bound in the earths, those by which the soul of the Elements came 123.13 to the heavens, they are not bound to the wheel,
123.14 but are robbed from the powers in the wheel
123.15 to which they are attached. The disciples spoke to the 123.16 Enlightener: We implore you, our lord, that as you proclaimed
123.17 to us (and) gathered these words …
123.18 you have told us (about) the first kind of conduit.
123.19 The first is that which runs from the firmament to the earths and 123.20 that which runs from the wheel to the sea-giant.
123.21 This is only one, but the other root runs
123.22 from [the temples] the to the trees. The third (is) the one that is bound 123.23 by the abortions in the flesh. Also, bound in the flesh are the fathers of the 123.24 abortions, who are in heaven … and fettered with and those who 123.25 … We implore you, our lord, that you clarify
123.26 for us [which][192] conduit is it that surpasses its

[191] A&C: ⲭ]ⲛⲛ̄-.
[192] A&C: [ⲛⲟⲩ]ⲓⲉⲧⲛ̣ ⲁ̣[ⲃⲁ]ⲁ̣ [ⲭ]ⲉ̣ ⲉ[ⲱ] ⲛⲁ[ⲓ][ⲍ]ⲙⲉ.

123.27 [counterpart] … with more life and soul being drawn
123.28 [by it] than its counterpart.
123.29 The Enlightener [spoke] to his disciples: You have examined
123.30 … you have asked about this statement in greatness, great
123.31 … [the] earth, many lives come down
123.32 … … the Father of Life has drawn them

124.1 (and) fastened them from [every(?)][193] power. He bound them together with 124.2 the earths which are the roots
124.3 of every ruling power. These (are the conduits) through which the Life of the 124.4 Living Soul is drawn up, coming up from 124.5 the entire earth, from all the mountains, the fields
124.6 and the islands. Second to this first great root
124.7 comes the root of the trees, which was bound to the temples
124.8 and the buildings which are above. Then, since so much life
124.9 comes up from the tree and the whole cross,
124.10 being drawn from them to the height, (it is) like
124.11 a great host. But, the one which is reduced …
124.12 their conduits … taking up …
124.13 place (?)[194] the roots [on][195] earth. They are woven (and) knit [with] the 124.14 entire earth in all worlds. Also, those of the trees are found on 124.15 the entire earth, whether small or great. But the root
124.16 of people and that of beasts is[196] not found 124.17 on the entire earth, but only in this world of the 124.18 south. These fleshes do not yet make … in the 124.19 entire world of the south … there is a little
124.20 bunch of them in … … above
124.21 the world of the south in … …
124.22 also in their number beyond … … I have explained
124.23 to you about the roots [and those (things) that][197] are found in them. [I have]
124.24 taught you that they are bound in their [roots] …
124.25 together with one another. They move toward one another, drawing the 124.26 life from one another through the energy of the higher powers,
124.27 which move toward the nature which dwells in all of them.
124.28 But when they crush the Matter which is in [them] and 124.29 plunder it, then it too, this Matter, …

124.30 its limbs and overflow … …
124.31 one another … move … …
124.32 … … … …

CHAPTER 57

ON THE GENERATION OF ADAM

144.15 Again, a Babylonian catechumen questioned the 144.16 Enlightener, saying to him: Speak to me, my lord, and 144.17 clarify for me about Adam, the first man. When 144.18 was he created, in what way was he formed,
144.19 or in what way was he begotten? Does[198] his generation
144.20 resemble the generation which is begotten today among 144.21 humankind, or else is there a distinction to be found between his birth
144.22 and what happens today? For, behold,
144.23 Adam was strong in his substance, great was his 144.24 size, (and) long were his years. He passed many years
144.25 in the world. But he is not the only one that we 144.26 have found to be strong, but also all the others who were 144.27 begotten in his generation. Long were their years also. These 144.28 people, however, who are begotten today, their substance
144.29 diminishes (while) their power and the remainder of their years wane. Why,
144.30 then, is the birth of those begotten today
144.31 different than that of the first … …

145.1 in his very place. Behold also the stars and the zodiacal signs, they remain
145.2 in their places. Why then has the life-span and 145.3 the years of these latter ones diminished and gotten shorter than 145.4 these ancients who are counted among this first generation?
145.5 But he, our Enlightener, in his deep wisdom
145.6 and his great understanding said to this catechumen
145.7 who had asked him: They increased and again diminished
145.8 because there are Five Types of Authority and 145.9 Guide set in the sphere of the Zodiac and the 145.10 heavens which are above it. They have ⟨Five⟩[199] Names, by which 145.11 they are called. The first name is the "year", the 145.12 second is the "month", the third is the "day", the 145.13 [fourth] is the "hour", (and) the fifth is the "minute." These Five
145.14 Places and these Five Dwellings are found in the sphere and 145.15 the heavens. These regions have Five Powers ruling over

---

198 A&C: [ⲁ]ⲣⲁ ⲟⲩⲛ.
199 See Polotsky/Böhlig, 145.10 note.

145.16 them. The ruler of the year is found there, (as is) the ruler of the month,
145.17 the ruler of the day, the ruler of the hour,
145.18 (and) the ruler of the minute; (each) one above his 145.19 companion. The one who is above in each case is lord over the one who is below
145.20 him. As to humanity, which is being begotten along with 145.21 the animals, it is by these powers that it is begotten; but they, these powers, 145.22 have authority from the beginning of creation to the end of the 145.23 world. At the beginning of the generations, it was the powers that rule
145.24 over the years that ruled. Because of this, the offspring
145.25 begotten in their generation and their era found their 145.26 years long, passing many life-spans in the generation of Adam and 145.27 that of Sethel, his son, as well as (the generation) of those who came after him.
145.28 After they ceased to rule, that is, the powers that ruled over the 145.29 years, the powers that rule over the months ruled in turn. Just as the 145.30 months are shorter than the years, so also 145.31 the life-span of the offspring begotten by them is shorter
145.32 [than the life-span of those begotten] in the generation of the powers who ruled

146.1 the years. When the authority of the powers who ruled the months
146.2 was finished, the powers of the days took power after 146.3 them. Therefore, since the days are shorter than the months,
146.4 so too was the life-span of the offspring begotten by them
146.5 shorter than the life-span of those begotten by the powers who ruled 146.6 over the months. Also, in the same way, the offspring who were begotten by the 146.7 hours as well as that of the minute, their lihme[200] are shorter than that of 146.8 the months and that of the days. The Enlightener spoke to this
146.9 Babylonian catechumen: Behold how the end
146.10 of the world is nigh! The life-span of 146.11 people is down to nothing. Their days lessen (and) their years
146.12 wane because the Life and the Light [which]
146.13 was in the world in these previous generations was greater than that of 146.14 today. Because of this, they are shrinking in their substance (and) their life-span
146.15 has become shorter. Again, this Babylonian
146.16 catechumen spoke to the Enlightener: I implore
146.17 you, my lord! Just as you clarified for me and persuaded

[200] Perhaps this means that the "conduits" through which life flows into every being are getting shorter or more restricted (Funk, personal communication).

me regarding the years—why the years of these ancients increased and why, in turn,
these latter ones decrease; you told me, also, that they have lessened
in their substance (and) you said that all these ones lessen because of the Life and the Light which they received in the world—proclaim to us this other thing, by what sort of birth was all this offspring of humankind made by one man and one woman, Adam and Eve? The Enlightener spoke to this catechumen: You rightly ask about this matter, so know and understand it. For, just as these first generations were greater in their Light, purer in their substance, and also greater are their years, so too were their offspring more numerous than the offspring of this time.
They passed a longer time being … in [the] belly of their mother. Afterwards … …

conceived a multitude in a single womb. Sometimes they would beget five in a single womb. Sometimes they would beget six in a single belly—sometimes less, sometimes more. Because of this, the offspring of Eve and that of her children were more numerous and the earth was filled with them alone.
Since the offspring of the generation of the ancient people who were begotten in the world was much different than that of today, their conception and their birth does not resemble that of those born later, who are born today in the womb of a woman.
For those who are begotten today in these latter generations, standing small, they are crippled and, it is even as single ones that they are begotten in a single belly, barely two, more or less,
being ugly in their appearance, reduced in their size, and weak in their limbs. Their teachings and [their] thoughts are filled with evil. They are evil-doers. They are drowned.
They consume their life-span with suffering (until) death takes them quickly. After this catechumen
heard these words, he adored and gave glory, saying to the Enlighterner:
I thank you, my lord, for you have satisfied my heart (and) persuaded me by making progress about these things that I asked you about.

CHAPTER 65B

(ON THE FIVE QUALITIES OF THE SUN)

161.31 Again, he added and said to his disciples:
161.32 [There are] Five Qualities in the Sun which it manifests
161.33 [every time][201] it comes into the world.

162.1 The first is its light, for it illuminates, by means of its light,
162.2 the world and all the creatures found in it.
162.3 The second is its beauty, because when it shines it
162.4 floods beauty and splendour on all creatures
162.5 and all things.
162.6 The third is its peace, because when the Sun
162.7 lights up the world, all people are greeted
162.8 by it and they offer peace to one another.
162.9 The fourth is the Life of the Living Soul, that it releases
162.10 from all bonds and fetters of heaven and earth.
162.11 The fifth: it empowers the Elements, and also gives
162.12 scent and taste to the entire Cross of Light. Just as you
162.13 can see that its light illuminates
162.14 more than all lights found in the world, so too is 162.15 its beauty more beautiful than the beauty of all people. Its peace,
162.16 too, surpasses all the powers and watchers that are found
162.17 in the world. Its liberation, with which it liberates
162.18 the Living Soul, is a full day more than 162.19 all the liberations. The power that is in its Limbs
162.20 is a great power and is stronger than all powers.

[201] A&C: [ⲛ̄ⲥⲁⲓ ⲛⲓⲙ].

CHAPTER 68

ON FIRE

166.19 Again he spoke: This fire that burns (and) is revealed to 166.20 today's world does Five Things.
166.21 The first thing that it does is this: It destroys
166.22 (and) burns wood and everything that is placed on it.
166.23 Second: It separates four properties from wood. These 166.24 are fire and light, ash and
166.25 smoke. Third: It gives taste and aroma to 166.26 what(ever) is cooked by it. It also gives warmth and 166.27 joy to who(ever) is brought near to it. The fourth thing that 166.28 it does: All craftsmen mould
166.29 the implements with which they fashion. Fifth:
166.30 It reveals light and people can see with its help.

CHAPTER 69

ON THE TWELVE SIGNS OF THE ZODIAC AND THE FIVE STARS

166.34 Again, one time as the Apostle [sat]

167.1 in the assembly, a disciple stood before him (and) asked
167.2 him, saying: We implore you, our lord, that you proclaim
167.3 to us and clarify about the twelve signs of the Zodiac
167.4 which are set in the Sphere. How are they ordered, or to which place do
167.5 they belong according to their nature? Or for that matter these Five Stars
167.6 that surround them, where do they come from, or why did the craftsman appoint
167.7 them as authorities and guides? He who is the Great 167.8 Builder, who established the whole of creation, he bound them (and)
167.9 closed them in the Sphere. We implore you, our 167.10 lord, that you satisfy us regarding these things which are hidden from everybody.
167.11 Then, he spoke to this disciple who had asked him: Both 167.12 these twelve zodiacal signs that he put in the sphere and these 167.13 Five Stars that turn above them, they are present in all the Archons
167.14 according to their nature. They are all enemies and adversaries to 167.15 one another.[202] They plunder one another through the activity of the Great
167.16 Builder who fashioned all the worlds. He set
167.17 [them] (and) bound them in the Sphere above, which always turns.
167.18 When it turns and moves them, they do everything
167.19 that pleases them above and below according to their will.
167.20 But, there is a governor above them, a debt-collector
167.21 causing them to act, coercing them, (and) taking from them what 167.22 is theirs. This, however, is how it should be understood: They 167.23 are drawn from the Five Worlds of Darkness, are bound in the 167.24 Sphere, and two zodiacal signs are taken per world. The Twin[203]
167.25 and the Archer[204] belong to the World of Smoke, which

---

[202] Written above line 15: "one is pressing the other; they are hung from one another" (Polotsky/Böhlig).
[203] Gemini.
[204] Sagittarius.

is the Mind. Also, the Ram[205] and the Lion[206] belong to the World of Fire. The Bull,[207] the Water-bearer,[208] and the Scales,[209] belong to the World of Wind. The Crab[210] and the Virgin[211] and the Fish[212] belong to the World of Water. The Goat-horn[213]
and the Scorpion[214] belong to the World of Darkness. These are [the] twelve Archons of wickedness, those who wickedness does not
… … For it is they commit every evil and
… [in the] world, either in the tree or in the flesh.

Know, also about these Five Stars,[215] the wanderers(?),[216] how they are put in place. The star of Zeus is generated by the World of Smoke, which is the Mind. Aphrodite,
in turn, came to be from the World of Fire.
Ares, however, belongs to the World of Wind. Hermes belongs to the World of Water, while Kronos belongs to the World of Darkness. The Two Ascendants,[217] however, belong to fire and lust, which are dryness and moisture, they are the father and mother of all these things. But, the Sun and the Moon, who are counted along with them,
{in the …}
[they are counted] among their race, but they are counted among them[218]
artificially, so that they might be ruled over. You will find them tormenting them
at every moment. These seven, which we have named—the Five Stars
and
the Two Ascendants—they are the evil-doers who perpetrate
every wickedness and evil in every single land, above
and below, in every creation, in dryness
and moisture, in tree and flesh.
Again, I am revealing to you about these zodiacal signs: They are [205] Aries.

[206] Leo.
[207] Taurus.
[208] Aquarius.
[209] Libra.
[210] Cancer.
[211] Virgo.
[212] Pisces.
[213] Capricorn.
[214] Scorpio.
[215] Zeus = Jupiter; Aphrodite = Venus; Ares = Mars; Hermes = Mercury; Kronos = Saturn.
[216] That is, the planets.
[217] The anabibazontes, see discussion above.
[218] Inserted between lines 10 and 11 (Polotsky/Böhlig 168). A homoioleteuton seems to have occurred due to the double occurrence of ⲁϩⲟⲩⲛ ⲛⲉⲙⲉⲩ. See A&C.

168.18 distributed and ordered to four sides, three at each corner in 168.19 these four places. They are fastened to the Sphere that turns. The Ram,
168.20 the Lion, and the Archer, these three belong to one side.
168.21 The Bull, however, the Goat-horn, and the Virgin,
168.22 these three belong to the other side. But, the Twin,
168.23 the Scales, and the Water-bearer belong to another side. The Scorpion, 168.24 the Fish, and the Crab belong to another corner. They are 168.25 set in this way. They are fixed to these four sides (and) distributed
168.26 in the Sphere. When the side of the Ram,
168.27 the Lion, and the Archer is plundered by the governor
168.28 who is above it, who coerces it along with the guiding (stars) who 168.29 go above it, tribulation
168.30 overtakes every four-footed beast below this place.
168.31 But, when the [side] of the Bull,
168.32 the Virgin, and the Goat-horn is plundered, [tribulation]

169.1 at once comes to be in the herbs and the vegetables and 169.2 all the fruits of the trees. But, when 169.3 the side of the Scorpion, the Fish, and the Crab, is plundered
169.4 there will be a lack of water on the earth
169.5 and famine will occur everywhere. However, when 169.6 the side of the Twin, the Scales, and the Water-bearer
169.7 is plundered, deficiency and diminishment in the category
169.8 of humanity will occur everywhere.
169.9 Behold, I have clarified for you about these twelve
169.10 zodiacal signs, that they have been formed from the Five 169.11 Worlds of Darkness and bound in the Sphere. I have 169.12 also taught you about the Five Stars, that they too have come to be 169.13 from the Five Worlds of Darkness. I have proclaimed
169.14 to you, also, about the Two Ascendants, that they stand (according) to 169.15 the mystery of fire and lust, which is 169.16 dryness and moisture, the father and mother.
169.17 I have also revealed to you about the Sun and the Moon, that they are 169.18 foreign to them. But because of the (irresistible) force of the planned arrangement
169.19 according to which one thing takes on the other, and they are being plundered
169.20 them, that is why they were counted among them according to the numerical
169.21 value, although the Sun and Moon come from the Greatness,
169.22 (and) do not belong to the stars and the zodiacal signs.

CHAPTER 70

ON THE BODY, THAT IT WAS MADE TO RESEMBLE THE COSMOS

169.27 [Again], at a time when the Apostle was sitting in 169.28 the assembly amidst the congregation, he spoke to his 169.29 disciples: While the entire cosmos, above and 169.30 below, resembles the human body,
169.31 [the] makeup of this body of flesh (also)

170.1 resembles the cosmos. Its head resembles
170.2 by way of example the Five Garments. But, from its neck
170.3 down to the site of its heart, it resembles
170.4 the Ten Firmaments. The heart is there
170.5 in resemblance of the wheel of the Sphere that turns. From its heart
170.6 down to its mid-section, it resembles that air
170.7 which flows from the Sphere down to the earth. The male (part)
170.8 of the body resembles the Great Earth. From its 170.9 intestines down to its loins it resembles
170.10 the Three Earths. But, the shinbones of its foot
170.11 resemble the space where the Porter stands.
170.12 The soles of its feet resemble the Great Earth on which the 170.13 Porter stands and the Four Fixtures which are under his 170.14 feet. Its liver resembles the Vehicle of Fire.
170.15 Its flesh resembles the Vehicle of Darkness. Its 170.16 blood resembles the Vehicle of Water. In this way,
170.17 the small body resembles the great
170.18 cosmos in its firmaments, in its rank, in its 170.19 mountains, its walls, and its vehicles, as I have 170.20 revealed to you. Again, I am revealing to you
170.21 that there are Five Great Camps in this
170.22 great outer zone, over which the Five Sons of the Living
170.23 Spirit rule. In the first upper watch-tower,
170.24 the one in which the Keeper of Splendour rules,
170.25 the pinnacle of all things, his authority is placed 170.26 over the Three Heavens. Those that are under him are,
170.27 nevertheless, above the great King of Honour.
170.28 As for the second watch-tower, the one in which the great King of Honour
170.29 rules, his authority (is) placed over the Seven 170.30 Firmaments below him. As for the third

watch-tower, the one over which the Adamas [has authority,][219]

ruling from the firmament down to the [earth],
it commands[220] according to his authority the Sphere and the worlds of air, along with the other four worlds, which are fixed on this earth. The fourth watch-tower, which the King of Glory possesses is the Three Wheels. But, his authority lays over the Three Earths which are over the Porter. The fifth watch-tower is the watchtower over which the Porter has authority, since he also rules, according to his authority, over this Great Earth, which is established on it, along with the Four Fixtures which are his feet. Tribulation has occurred in the Five Watch-Towers from time to time. In the watch-tower of the Keeper of Splendour, Sin wanted to gush forth against the image of the Messenger, but it was hindered at that place. He made it turn in shame.
Also, an earthquake and deceit occurred in the watch-tower of the great
King of Honour, that is, the watchers, who existed
when they … … they came down, namely, those who had been sent, until they were humbled. Also, in the watch-tower of the Adamas, the abortions came down (and) fashioned the
there was movement in these Three Earths, which are above
the Porter. The route and the ascent
of these Three Wheels—(the wheel) of wind, of water, and of fire—were blocked. Also, in the watch-tower of the Porter, the lower fixtures were stripped off (and) their bonds levelled. A great earthquake occurred in that place.
[Just as] these Five Watchers are found in this great
[bond of these Five] Encampments that I have proclaimed

to you, so too is it with this body, which the Elect bear. There are Five other Encampments
in it. The Light-Mind guards them along with the New Man who is with him. The elect person who dominates and humbles the countenance of his face, which is above his body, and guides it to the good, he symbolizes the mystery of the Keeper of Splendour who has power over the watch-tower above the Zone. He who rules

[219] A&C: [ⲟ ⲛ̄ⲉⲍⲟⲩⲥⲓⲁ ⲁⲭⲱⲥ ⲉⲕ].
[220] A&C: ⲉ[ⲕ]ϫⲓⲟⲩⲱ.

[over] his heart and humbles it symbolizes the great King of Honour who humbles the Seven Heavens. He who rules his chest and humbles his desire becomes like the mystery of the Adamas of Light, he who humbles Matter. He who humbles the stomach and rules the fire found in it, but also the purity of the food that enters it, he symbolizes
the King of Glory, he who turns the wheels (and) sends life upward. He who rules over the rank of the archons beneath his feet and binds it with the bond of peace symbolizes the Porter, he who humbles
with his feet the lower abyss. Also, the teaching of wisdom, which circulates through this body,
symbolizes the Virgin of Light, who goes up
(and) comes down in the Zone that is above and below. Also, the Love and the Joy, the Faith and the Truth by which a person lives symbolizes
these Two Light Ships. For, it is through them that the Living Soul ascends, is liberated,
leaves the lower abyss, and attains
the upper height. Again, know this other thing, that there are Four Worlds in this Body of Flesh (and) there are Seven Archons in every one [of these Four] Worlds. The first [world is from its]

neck upwards, but the Seven Archons that are found in this upper world, they are the two eyes
and the two ears and the two nostrils.
The other is the mouth, which is the taste organ.
[The] second world is from its neck down to its entire stomach, but the Seven Archons which are found in this second world, they are its two arms—
those that symbolize its two ears
found in its first world above—and its two breasts, which symbolize its nostrils,
and the two eyes of its heart and the depth of the stomach
between the two breasts, which are in the chest
symbolize the mouth. Again, there are Seven Archons in the third world of the body,
which are the fat, the lung(s), the spleen, the liver, the gall,
and its two kidneys. Also, in the fourth world below, there are seven others in the same pattern—its two buttocks, its two testicles, its two loins,
and the member from which the seed comes, which begets
all the forms.
Again, the Enlightener said to those who were listening to him:

The

173.22 Ram, the Bull, the Twin, the Crab, the Lion, 173.23 the Virgin, the Scale, the Scorpion, the Archer, the 173.24 Goat-horn, the Water-bearer, and the Fish, these are the twelve 173.25 zodiacal signs that are found in the world of heaven, that are in the 173.26 Sphere, fastened and bound to this turning wheel, the one by which 173.27 they are forced, nailed, and planted. But, behold all these twelve
173.28 zodiacal signs, this is how they are ordered and made head
173.29 [and] … in the Sphere above heaven, which is the wheel of the 173.30 [stars]. This, then, is how they are ordered. They are ordered so that you might 173.31 find the head … and find the tail between one another.[221]
173.32 … … they also exist in this way, namely

174.1 those which we have proclaimed one after the other in this body. They 174.2 are counted among them in their sum and number from the head to the
174.3 feet. Its head is the Ram, its neck and its shoulders
174.4 the Bull, its two forearms the Twin,
174.5 its oesophagus(?)[222] the Crab, its stomach
174.6 [the] Lion, its heart the Virgin, the backbone of the
174.7 statue and its diaphragm the Scales, its chest
174.8 [the] Scorpion, its loins the Archer, its feet
174.9 the Goat-horn, its shinbones the Water-bearer, (and)
174.10 the soles of its feet the Fish. Behold (how) these too
174.11 are distributed among them. They are found in this body,
174.12 turned aside (and) bent like these twelve zodiacal signs.
174.13 They are ordered and spread among one another, the head
174.14 to the tail, just as they are in the wheel
174.15 … which is turned to heaven.[223] They, too, are counted among 174.16 the sum and number of the body and all its limbs.
174.17 But, what we have proclaimed—that they are turned to the side, bent, (and)
174.18 spread out—this is so, because from its head down to its
174.19 loins, they are counted six on its left, (and) six others on its right.
174.20 The six that are on its lower right are those which I
174.21 will proclaim. The right temple is the Ram, its right shoulder
174.22 the Bull, its right forearm
174.23 the Twin, its right rib the Crab,
174.24 its stomach the Lion, (and) the right side of its intestines
174.25 the Virgin. The other six which we have spoken
174.26 about, they are found on the left side, going

[223] A&C: ⲉⲧⲥ[ⲓⲧⲉ].

174.27 from its loins to its head. Its left …
174.28 is the Scales, its left rib the Scorpion,
174.29 its left breast and its left kidney [the]
174.30 Archer, its left elbow the Goat-horn,

175.1 its left shoulder the Water-bearer, (and)
175.2 its left temple the Fish. This is the way that the 175.3 craftsman of the body ordered (and)
175.4 arranged (and) made them level to one another, head to [tail].
175.5 Again, he spoke: Hear this other word which I will proclaim
175.6 to you. Know that there are many powers found
175.7 in this body—these are the companions who are its leaders.
175.8 There are eight-hundred and forty myriads of Archons
175.9 ruling over the human body. They are distributed 175.10 (and) established four to a dwelling. The sum and 175.11 the number of their dwellings is two-hundred and ten myriads.
175.12 When all these Archons come, creeping (and) wandering
175.13 within the body, and they meet one another, they 175.14 break against one another and destroy one another and …
175.15 in them there. When powers … …
175.16 together(?) they leap out of the body in which a person is going to 175.17 dies, and they cause evil tumours and blows and burning wounds
175.18 on the body. Either they make him sick inside [or][224]
175.19 else they would come out upon him externally. These wounds
175.20 contract at first and pour forth their liquid.
175.21 They release their ooze until they contract …
175.22 … and the core is dug out of the wound. Afterwards,
175.23 their wounds are carved out and healed and relieved
175.24 at the site where they came out.

CHAPTER 91

ON THE CATECHUMEN, WHO IS SAVED IN A SINGLE BODY

228.8 Again, this Elect spoke to the Apostle:[225] I have
228.9 heard you, my lord, say that there is a Catechumen
228.10 who does not enter a body other than this one alone. Rather 228.11 when he leaves his body, his soul
228.12 … in the firmament above and he journeys to the place
228.13 of [rest]. Now, I implore you, my lord, that you
228.14 open my eyes to the deeds of this Catechumen
228.15 who does not enter into another body—What kind are they or what is 228.16 his form or what is his sign so that I might 228.17 know it and tell the rest of my brothers, that they might proclaim
228.18 it to the Catechumens, so that they might be exalted by 228.19 this and ascend in peace to the Good?
228.20 Then, the Apostle said to him: I will open your
228.21 eyes to the deeds of these Catechumens
228.22 of faith, who do not enter into (another) body. The sign of 228.23 this perfect Catechumen is this—You find his[226]
228.24 wife in the house with him, dealing with him as if they are strangers.
228.25 Also, his house he treats like an inn.
228.26 He says, "I dwell in a house rented by days
228.27 and months." His brothers and his relations
228.28 are considered by him to be strangers attached to him,
228.29 journeying with him on the road, knowing that …
228.30 they will be separated from him and each one returns to [their own place].[227]
228.31 Gold, silver, and vessels of … …

229.1 house, they are considered by him (to be) like vessels on loan. [He]
229.2 takes them, and they serve him, (but) afterwards he gives them [to]
229.3 their owner. He does not place his trust in them or his wealth.
229.4 He removes his Thought from the world, and places his 229.5 heart in the Holy Church. At all times, his Thought
229.6 is set upon God. But, what's more than all that—229.7 solicitude, respect, and love for the saints who 229.8 are with him—he cares for the Church like [his] house,

---

[225] A&C: ⲁⲡⲁⲡⲟⲥⲧⲟⲗⲟⲥ.
[226] A&C: ⲧⲉ[ⲫ]-.
[227] A&C: ⲟⲩ[ⲉ ⲯ]ⲉ ⲛⲉⲫ ⲁⲡ[ⲉⲫⲙⲁ].

229.9 in fact more than his house. He entrusts all his wealth to the 229.10 Elect men and women. For this is what [the] Saviour
229.11 preached through the mouth of his Apostle:[228] From today
229.12 onwards those who have wives, let them become like those who do not.
229.13 Those who buy like those not buying, those who rejoice like those not rejoicing,
229.14 those who weep like those not weeping, those who profit from this world
229.15 like those not in wantonness. Those who … those which …
229.16 proclaimed, were proclaimed about these perfect Catechumens,
229.17 who depart from this body alone and return to 229.18 the height. They are like the Elect in their behaviour.
229.19 This is the sign of these Catechumens who 229.20 do not enter a body. There are others too who possess
229.21 self-control, [keeping] the flesh of every beast from 229.22 their mouths, being eager for fasting and daily prayer,
229.23 helping the Church according to their means
229.24 through almsgiving. Malice is dead in them.
229.25 The motions of their feet made it towards the Church more than towards 229.26 their home. Their hearts are upon it at all times. Their posture and 229.27 their comportment is like that of the Elect. They have stripped all the 229.28 affairs of the world from their hearts. But, this person,
229.29 with the mind set upon the Holy Church
229.30 … at every moment and his gifts and
229.31 … and his honour and his grace which benefits

230.1 his life, as he journeys with them to the Holy Church
230.2 along with those who come to the Church, whether 230.3 they are his children or his wife or one of his relations.
230.4 He rejoices greatly over them and he loves
230.5 them, sharing all his wealth with them.
230.6 Behold! This is the sign and the model of these Catechumens
230.7 who do not (re)enter a body. Like the "good pearl,"
230.8 which I described for you in the Treasure of Life—
230.9 it is priceless.[229]
230.10 So too is it for these Catechumens
230.11 who do not (re)enter a body. But, when they do leave
230.12 their bodies, they journey in their way and pass
230.13 on to a higher place and enter into life.
230.14 They are not, however, condemned and bound by the chains of the enemy, but[230]
230.15 they are purified in the heavens and plucked like a fruit

[228] See 1 Cor 7:29–31.

[229] A&C pace Böhlig: "die keinen Wert hat."

[230] A&C: Line 14 of manuscript was missed in original edition. Read and renumber accordingly: ⲙⲁⲩ[ⲧ]ⲁϧⲁⲩ ⲛ̄ⲧⲁⲩ ⲛ̄ⲥⲉⲙⲁⲣⲟⲩ ϩⲛ̄ ⲧⲙ̄ⲣⲣⲉ ⲙ̄ⲡⲭⲁϧⲉ ⲁⲗⲗⲁ.

230.16 that will ripened and be plucked from the tree. This is also how the
230.17 almsgiving that is passed on to the Elect resembles it
230.18 in many forms, purifies it, and enters into 230.19 the Land of the Living. This is also how the souls
230.20 of these Catechumens resemble it, those who do not (re)enter
230.21 a body. But, as for the matter of the Catechumens,
230.22 I have written it down in the Treasure of Life.
230.23 Just as they are freed and are purified one by one
230.24 according to their deeds, according to their approach to the Church,
230.25 this is also the way that their ascent comes closer to them,
230.26 their healing and their purity.
230.27 Therefore, it is also fitting for the Catechumen that he pray at 230.28 all times for repentance and forgiveness of sins from God
230.29 and the Holy Church. Because of his prior
230.30 and present sins, his deeds will be gathered together,
230.31 the earlier and the later ones, and allotted to him.

231.1 Then, after his disciples heard these words from him,
231.2 they blessed him and glorified him with great praise. They 231.3 said: You are praised, our father, (and) you are glorious. Blessed is 231.4 the hope that endures in us because of you. For great is the [wisdom]
231.5 that you bring to souls. For (to) the Elect you have revealed
231.6 the works and the commandments of the election
231.7 in which they will live. And even regarding the Catechumens, 231.8 have you not neglected them, but you have taught them in various 231.9 degrees,[231] stages, and steps so that they might rise
231.10 from them to the Good, each one according to (his) [ability], and 231.11 attain the Land of the Living.
231.12 But now we implore you, our lord, that you proceed and 231.13 preach to us about this matter that we have asked you about[232] and open 231.14 our eyes as to the people who become disciples[233] (and) …
231.15 and enter into the Church, [either] Elect or[234]
231.16 Catechumens. The former sins that they committed [in] the 231.17 world before they became disciples, where do they go? Since
231.18 there are some among them (who) formerly adored idols, worshipping
231.19 (and) revering the gods. Others also among them were firmly established 231.20 in the teaching of the Sects, blaspheming God.

[231] See W.-P. Funk, "Prolégomènes," 11.
[232] A&C: ⲉⲧⲁⲛϣⲛ[ⲧⲕ ⲁ]ⲣⲁⲩ.
[233] A&C: ⲉⲧⲉϣⲁⲩⲙⲁⲑⲏⲧⲉⲩⲉ.
[234] A&C: ⲉⲓ[ⲧⲉ ⲍ]ⲛ̄ⲉⲕⲗⲉⲕⲧⲟⲥ [ⲛⲉ] ⲏ ⲍⲛ̄.

They have also blasphemed other enlighteners, who are in the heavens.
Some among them also committed other sins: whether it be theft[235]
or murder or adultery or …
the sin of magic or error of false witness
or other … These are evident in the wicked works of the world in which people first [walked]. Then, when they[236]
hear the word of God, will they put aside
(their) prior sins or will they not?
[We implore] you, then, our lord, that you open our eyes
[as to this question] which we have asked[237] you and give rest to our hearts.

Then the Apostle spoke to them: Very great is this question
[that] you have asked me. I will reveal (the answer) to you.
[Know],[238] therefore, that every person who accepts the hope
[and the faith] has separated the Light from the Darkness, he has perceived
[the] mysteries of the Living Soul, he has received the right hand of Peace brought (by) the Light-Mind, who dwells in the Holy
Church, and he has prayed for forgiveness of sins from the Light-
Mind. Know, therefore, that all his prior sins which he committed from the day he was born until the day that he accepts the hope of God (and) has removed his heart from all the Sects and the idols of Error, they are all forgiven him. He will not be asked about them from now on,
nor will he receive retribution for them—if it is the case that he remains in his faith and [live] without committing henceforth these prior sins, which he committed. Afterwards, he has borne …
… … they have been forgiven him, they will not protect[239] him henceforth from all his prior sins.
Should he return again to his prior actions
and re-offend, then they will be counted against him along with all his sins, the former and the latter. He will receive retribution for all of them, since God granted him repentance
and forgiveness from his folly, but he still did not persevere in the repentance that God
granted to him. But, had he persevered in the catechumenate
(and) in his faith and left all his prior deeds

[235] A&C: ⲏ [ⲟ]ⲩ[ⲭ]ⲓ[ⲟ]ⲩⲉ |[23][ⲡⲉ ⲏ ⲟ]ⲩⲫⲟⲛⲟⲥ.
[236] A&C: ⲉⲧⲉ[ⲟⲩ]ⲉ.
[237] A&C: ⲉ]ⲧⲁⲛ[ⲭ][ⲛ]ⲟⲩⲕ.
[238] A&C: [ⲙⲙⲉ].
[239] A&C: ⲛ[ⲱ][ⲗ]ⲧ.

232.26 behind him, then all his sins would be left
232.27 to him, whether he is an Elect in his election,
232.28 [or] a Catechumen in his catechumenate.
232.29 The one, then, who is a Catechumen, he will [stand firm]
232.30 in his catechumenate. The latter[240] sins [which]
232.31 he commits, they will be forgiven him en masse,
232.32 because of his fasting, and [his prayer and his]

233.1 almsgiving. Hear, now, how I (will) reveal to you
233.2 the works of the faithful Catechumens. The truly
233.3 faithful Catechumen performs his Fifty Fasts,
233.4 fasting on the Fifty Lord's Days of the [year].
233.5 He also retains their purity, restraining himself [from]
233.6 the desire for his wife. He purifies his bed by 233.7 abstaining on all of these Lord's Days. He (restrains himself[?])
233.8 in his eating, and does not defile his food with the …
233.9 of fish or all the pollution of flesh and blood. Also, he [does not]
233.10 eat anything polluted on these Lord's Days. [He] also keeps
233.11 his hands from wounding or inflicting pain on the Living
233.12 [Soul]. Their prayers[241] are observed by him; he observes
233.13 them (and) comes to prayer daily—every hour (of) every 233.14 day. All these hours of prayer will be added[242]
233.15 to his fasting and his almsgiving, which he offers 233.16 every day of the year. Also every act of charity is added to 233.17 his goods: the fasting, which he performed, the clothing which he has given
233.18 to the Saints. They share a daily communion
233.19 with them in their fasting and their good(ness).
233.20 These are counted along with the others and one half of his works
233.21 are performed for good, the other half for sin. Truly, the sins
233.22 which he commits half of the year are 233.23 divided into Five Parts. Four of them are forgiven him by 233.24 the patronage of the Holy Church through the faith
233.25 [and the] love of the Elect. On the one hand because of this, but on 233.26 the other, because he is aware of the knowledge (gnosis)—he has separated the 233.27 [Light] from the Darkness (and) offered hymns and prayers
233.28 [to the] Enlightener from heaven. Also, the rest that he has 233.29 [taken] … this … Because of these good (deeds) that 233.30 [he performs], four parts are permitted him, four 233.31 … … sins that he has committed

---

240 A&C: ⲛ[ϩ]ⲁⲉⲉⲩⲉ.
241 That is, the prayers of the Lord's Day.
242 A&C: ⲥⲉⲛⲁⲁ[ⲡ]ⲟⲩ ⲁ |[15][ⲭ]ⲛ̄ ⲧⲉⲕ-.

234.1 from the day that he became a Catechumen. As for the rest,
234.2 he will be questioned about a single part and receive
234.3 a thrashing[243] and an immersion, and is later
234.4 purified, either above or below. He is 234.5 purified according to the value of his works, and he is 234.6 purified, cleansed, and adorned. Afterwards, he
234.7 is fashioned a Light-image
234.8 and is drawn and elevated to the Land of Rest, so that,
234.9 where his heart is, his treasure is there too.
234.10 Until he becomes strong in his catechumenate
234.11 he will receive repayment for his good (works) in this way.
234.12 If, however, he should lie or turn away from the truth, then 234.13 all his sins will be counted against him again, the former and 234.14 the latter. The judgement [which] condemns his sins will be poured over him.
234.15 But, if he should confirm himself in his faith and 234.16 become strong in it, then a fate will be (assigned[?]) to him and he will come
234.17 back again, be just, escape, and save
234.18 his live in eternal life. At the time of his
234.19 departure, he will go and rest in eternal
234.20 life. When the disciples heard
234.21 these words of wisdom, they glorified their teacher (and) contemplated
234.22 the first Light, which makes wise through the Mind and the 234.23 richness of his knowledge.

[243] A&C: ⲟ[ⲩⲥ]ϩⲱϣⲉ.

CHAPTER 95

THE APOSTLE ASKS HIS DISCIPLES: WHAT DOES CLOUD MEAN?

240.16 Again, as the Apostle sat in the assembly of his
240.17 disciples, the sky was cloudy that day,
240.18 (so) he raised his eyes and looked at this cloud
240.19 (and) said to his disciples: This cloud, which appears
240.20 before you, as you look at it, I will reveal to you
240.21 and teach you how it ascended.
240.22 Know that it is stripped from
240.23 Five Places, ascends above this Great Earth, is then revealed
240.24 and is visible in the middle-air.
240.25 The cloud that ascends from the upper fire
240.26 towards the image of the Virgin of Light, which she 240.27 makes visible to it, its sign is the flash
240.28 found in lightning-bolts … passing away …
240.29 But it is purified towards [the image of the Virgin of][244]
240.30 Light [to whom] it becomes visible.[245]

241.1 … the Archons are stripped off of the lightning-bolts. They go out 241.2 and separate, but these angels are sent to 241.3 them immediately so that they might seize them.
241.4 Knowing that they never do good, (and that) every place that they touch
241.5 they cause death and ruin, when
241.6 the angels make for them and come beside(?) …
241.7 they flee in their distress before them and come [to]
241.8 what(ever) they meet and assume it. Like a 241.9 thief, (when he) is caught (and) flees from a man stronger than him, who
241.10 pursues him in order to overtake him. Now, these Archons
241.11 who escape to this cloud, they bear that 241.12 which they meet … … in …
241.13 it, which they do not … will seize
241.14 this little bit, whether a tree [that] they found
241.15 in the way or beasts or people. In short,
241.16 every place that they assume, they burn and

---

[244] A&C: [ⲡⲓⲛⲉ ⲛ̄ⲧⲡⲁⲣⲑⲉⲛⲟⲥ ⲙ̄]-.
[245] A&C: [ⲛⲉⲥ ⲁⲃⲁⲗ].

241.17 destroy with the fire of their bodies—that is the Archons, the 241.18 sons of fire, those who are stripped of the fire.
241.19 The cloud, however, that rises up from the 241.20 water and ascends to the Virgin of 241.21 Light, its sign(s) are this thunder and this noise which 241.22 is in the air in various forms and (which people) hear.
241.23 … when the Archons who belong
241.24 to those found in the cloud find time, they strip themselves
241.25 of this cloud,[246] flee from it and leave it behind
241.26 [them. But, their sign][247] is this, that in every place which [they]
241.27 [destroy] they make frost and hail and snow,
241.28 and they lay waste[248] to seeds and fruit and plants, and they 241.29 … every place [that] they destroy. Angels are also sent 241.30 [down][249] to seize them. But,

242.1 the angels,[250] while pursuing them in order to seize them, cause this destruction.
242.2 [The] cloud, however, which rises up from the wind,
242.3 comes up to the middle-air, towards the image of the
242.4 Virgin who makes it visible—its sign is 242.5 [the] dark wind that blows bitterly.
242.6 By these winds, however, and these storm, living beings
242.7 are purified in her. But, the Archons who are stripped of the wind
242.8 cloud descend from it, being secure in 242.9 their image. All these rivers and seas, which 242.10 they reach and attain, they make waves in them and 242.11 raise … and they … the ships and they
242.12 cause destruction among those who they destroy[251] and they seize them
242.13 and bring them … astray(?).
242.14 Also, the cloud that belongs to the Light, when they
242.15 are stripped of it … …
242.16 … … … the Virgin becomes visible.
242.17 sign(?) too … but its sign is
242.18 this—so that you might find it as it journeys in rest and calm.
242.19 Living beings are purified in it by rest and calm,

242.24 from the mixed air and comes up to [the image]
242.25 of the Virgin, its sign is this, that [their living beings][256]
242.26 are purified by it[257] in rest and peace. These Archons, however,
242.27 who are stripped of this cloud, they come

242.29 They cause them(?) … …

243.1 they seize them and take them in their midst. Their strippings,

243.8 throw the demons down to those Seven Pits, [which] (are)
243.9 beyond the Great Sea that is the passage of 243.10 the waters found outside of the cosmos.
243.11 Then, his disciples said to him: Open our eyes,
243.12 our Lord, to which place these Seven Pits come
243.13 down to. [The Apostle] spoke to them:
243.14 These pits and these roads [descend][260] until 243.15 they reach the lower earths, and [meet][261] the 243.16 feet of the Porter. Hear, also this other thing:
243.17 Sometimes these angels are dispatched to them
243.18 to catch the Archons. When the Archons …
243.19 because the angels pursue them, they approach[262] them …
243.20 those who are given the commands. But, these Archons
243.21 free themselves and bear
243.22 [the tree] and [the flesh] and swallow them in these two[263] offspring, 243.23 [that of the][264] tree and that of the flesh. The angels leave their

244.4 they threw these first ones. When they return to the middle

244.6 Behold, then, I have opened your eyes concerning this cloud, how 244.7 it ascends to the height and (how) the living beings that are purified in it.
244.8 I have also taught you (about) the Archons that are in it, how 244.9 they cause these adversities and how they are seized

244.11 who were given the command by the power of the Virgin
244.12 of Light, she who has authority over the entire Zone to[266] purify

244.14 heard [these things from him],[267] they glorified him, saying:
244.15 You … [(have) revealed][268] all the secrets, o
244.16 instructor of all revelations. We thank 244.17 you, our father, with great professions, since you have 244.18 opened our eyes concerning everything. You have given us great

CHAPTER 100

ON THE DRAGON, THE ONE WITH FOURTEEN HEADS; WHAT IS IT AND . . .

251.29 [Again] one of his disciples asked the [Apostle . . .]
251.30 . . . . . spreading . . . . . .
251.31 . . . . . .
251.32 . . . . . .

252.1 The laws of the Magi say that there is a
252.2 dragon with fourteen heads holed
252.3 up (in his) lair, in Five Hollows! Now, I implore
252.4 you, my lord, that you open my eyes concerning this statement.
252.5 Is there really a real[270]
252.6 dragon who has fourteen heads or is there, rather, a spiritual 252.7 explanation? Then the Apostle said to him:
252.8 There is never any dragon in the flesh, nor does it have fourteen heads,
252.9 as the Magi claim. Rather, this statement is a [parable][271]
252.10 that they have proclaimed in [error(?)][272]
252.11 . . . the Magi did not know, however, the true
252.12 meaning of[273] all the statements that they recorded,
252.13 [supposing them] (to be) real.[274] This is also the way with this 252.14 dragon, which they . . . considering it (to be) a real
252.15 dragon . . . I will open our eyes
252.16 to . . . . . the dragon is the teaching . . .
252.17 . . . . . of the flesh . . .
252.18 . . . the fourteen heads, however, which are attributed to 252.19 the [dragon], they are like this: the seven senses that are found 252.20 on [the] head of the body, which are the two eyes with which 252.21 it sees, the two ears with which it hears,
252.22 the two nostrils with which it smells, as well as 252.23 its tongue[275] with which he selects and tastes

---

[270] I take σωματικόν here to mean "real", rather than "bodily" or "corporeal", states that imply real existence. The disciple seems to want to know whether such a dragon really exists.

[271] A&C: ⲟⲩⲡⲁⲣⲁ[ⲃⲟ] |[10][ⲗⲏ] ⲡⲉ.

[272] A&C: ⲟⲩⲙⲛⲧ[ⲡⲁⲣⲁⲡⲉⲛⲟⲩⲧ].

[273] A&C: ⲇ[ⲉ] ⲁ̣ⲑ̣ⲉ̣[ⲣ] |[12][ⲙⲏⲛ]ⲓ̣ⲁ̣ ⲙ̣ⲙ̣ⲏ̣[ⲉ].

[274] A&C: ⲁ[ⲣⲁ]ⲩ ⲉⲩ |[13]ⲱ̣[ⲡ ⲛ̄]ⲙ̣ⲁⲩ ⲁ[ⲡⲥⲱⲙⲁ]ⲧⲓⲕⲟⲛ.

[275] A&C: ⲡ]ⲉ̣ⲭⲙⲁⲛ̣[ⲭ]ⲓ[ⲧⲡ]ⲉ.

252.24 the various flavours that are found in every form.
252.25 [These are] the seven heads of the dragon, the seven
252.26 senses that (are part of) the human form …
252.27 … below. The seven of the body
252.28 are these: two hips,[276] two buttocks, [two …]
252.29 … Archon … …
252.30 … … … …
252.31 … … [the] seven [heads that]

253.1 above and below, they add up and make [four]teen 253.2 heads for the dragon. The Five Pits, however, which they 253.3 spoke about, in which the dragon is holed
253.4 up (and) spread, they are these: The first is [the] tongue,
253.5 the second is the lung, the third is the heart,
253.6 the fourth is the spleen, and the fifth is the [blood that]
253.7 flows through them. He also looks out from them [and]
253.8 reveals his image and his appearance from above
253.9 and below as he makes war [with]
253.10 his fourteen heads. He who recognizes
253.11 the dragon, which is the desire of [the]
253.12 body, struggles with it, conquers it, and kills
253.13 it in them, will thus [he be called][277]
253.14 the righteous one, holy and elect, a good
253.15 man. He conquers without suffering on the day [of] his 253.16 advent. Behold, then, I have taught you about the dragon, the 253.17 one with fourteen heads and his Five Pits,
253.18 in which he hides and conceals (himself), doing his will
253.19 from them at all times. Then this disciple said
253.20 to him: My heart is persuaded, my lord, by that which you have 253.21 proclaimed to me. You have taught me about the dragon, the one with fourteen
253.22 heads. Blessed is everyone in whom it is dead, killed,
253.23 or damaged. He will live forever and become a person who is victorious
253.24 in all his works.

[276] A&C: ⲧⲕⲉ[ϩ]ⲧⲉ.
[277] A&C: ⲛ̄[ⲧ]ⲓ[ϩ]ⲉ ⲉⲩⲛⲁⲙ[ⲟ]ⲩⲧ[ⲉ] ⲁⲣⲁ[ⲫ] ⲉⲩⲛ[ⲁ]ⲙⲟⲩⲧⲉ |[14][ⲁ]ⲣⲁⲫ.

CHAPTER 103

ON THE FIVE WONDERWORKS THAT THE LIGHT-MIND REVEALS IN THE ELECT

257.12 Again, the Apostle spoke: The Light-Mind
257.13 works Five Light-Wonders for the Elect. The first
257.14 sign is the Wisdom that the Elect preaches
257.15 and proclaims in all its forms, in all its kinds,
257.16 (and) in all its places. The second is Faith,
257.17 since after his preaching of Wisdom, he … the Wisdom[278]
257.18 preached and the others hear it and believe.
257.19 The third is [the] … … in his Wisdom
257.20 by his preaching, with which he proclaims Peace
257.21 to the assembly of his brothers …
257.22 [The] fourth is Love, because he loves Wisdom and the 257.23 brothers and sisters who sit in his [presence.]
257.24 [The] fifth is the terrible Severity of Judgement, with which 257.25 he separates those who have not received the hope[279] of God. Also, those 257.26 in error, whom he finds in the Church, he severely judges
257.27 them rightly on account of their foolishness.
257.28 [The] Light-[Mind] places these Five Signs in the New Man, 257.29 [whom] it has purified, refined, raised up, (and)
257.30 [saved] … Blessed is everyone
257.31 … … the Mind and is diligent in his Wisdom
257.32 … this other thing: These Five Signs

258.1 are established and perfected in him and perfect him so that 258.2 [he might] become a spotless vessel and a priceless pearl[280]
258.3 forever and ever.

[278] A&C: ⲉ[.] . . ⲭⲧⲁ … [. .] . . ⲁⲧⲥⲟⲫⲓⲁ.

[279] Here "hope" is synonymous with "message" or "gospel" (see Kephalaia, "Prologue" 7.18–8.7 and Kephalaia 371.6–30). Possibly a reflection of Syriac ܒܫܪܬܐ "gospel" from ܫܒܪ "hope."

[280] Compare Kephalaia Chapter 91 "On the Catechumen" (1 Ke 230.6–11).

CHAPTER 104

ON FOOD, THAT IT IS APPOINTED TO FIVE PRODUCTS IN THE HUMAN BODY

258.7 [Again] he spoke to his disciples: The food that 258.8 people gather together of every kind,
258.9 so that they might eat it and (have) it enter into the body, it breaks down into 258.10 Five Products. The first product is that which 258.11 comes out of the human being in amazement, raises in 258.12 the Mind, and comes out of all the limbs—it is without 258.13 measure. The second is that which comes out of the 258.14 human being in sound and word. The third is that which 258.15 leaps from them in power and diligence.
258.16 The fourth is that which is produced in the pleasure of desire 258.17 between male and female. The fifth is that 258.18 which is made and formed in the flesh and 258.19 is produced and issues from them—this is this corporeal
258.20 product. This product, which they produce, only its 258.21 parents know. Its affection and its 258.22 reason and its love they seek daily for 258.23 all time. The other four products they do not perceive,
258.24 nor do they pity them, since
258.25 they are not evident to them.

CHAPTER 107

ON THE KIND OF SPEECH THAT . . .

260.31 Again, he spoke about the production of speech, which [comes]
260.32 from the mouth and is heard with the [ears].
260.33 He said … … …

261.1 … and the throat draws it in, the tongue
261.2 is spread, the teeth cut it, and the lips [gather]
261.3 it together. Speech comes out through the power of [these Five] 261.4 Limbs and is heard outside. Just as
261.5 a coin that one (person) smelts, [another]
261.6 forges, and still another cuts as it is turned, another
261.7 puts a seal on it, (while) another wipes the sieve, [so]
261.8 these Five Craftsmen beautify and fashion [their]
261.9 coin, and it comes into people's use and becomes a good
261.10 by which they buy and sell—so too is this speech
261.11 fashioned and adorned by the Five [Limbs],
261.12 when it comes out (and) is heard by the ears [of] 261.13 others.

CHAPTER III

ON THE FOUR QUALITIES THAT ARE FOUND IN THE EYE AND THE FIFTH, WHICH IS HIDDEN IN THEM; TO WHOM THEY BELONG

265.13 [Again] he spoke: There are Four Qualities found in [the eyes][281]
265.14 of human beings that see, as they look at … …
265.15 [without][282] the four that are hidden in them … they belong …
265.16 While [the cold] that is in the [eye] belongs [to them, the heat(?)][283]
265.17 belongs to the fire. The pupil,[284] however, belongs to the Light-
265.18 Mind, which perceives what is hidden in all things,
265.19 since it inhabits the Living Air.
265.20 [Again] he spoke: Why does the pupil of the eye [see],
265.21 seeing during the day, but the approaching night it [does not see]?
265.22 Which mystery does this signify?
265.23 [This (thing),[285] which] you do not know, I will explain [it]
265.24 [to you.[286] The fact that] the pupil of the eye [cannot see at night]
265.25 [signifies the] mystery of the [First Man] …
265.26 … … is the door …
265.27 … … below …
265.28 … the other four regions. Since in the …
265.29 … … above, he has …
265.30 … … great … they have …
265.31 … … also that which comes down[287] …
265.32 … … the Living Spirit[288] …

266.1 [the] First Man has risen through him (and) has known 266.2 everything.

CHAPTER 112B

(ON THE FIVE THINGS REVEALED BY JESUS)

267.18 Then, after he had proclaimed this,
267.19 at that moment one of his disciples said
267.20 to him from among those standing before him: Tell
267.21 us, our Lord, and clarify to us this matter.
267.22 If this likeness of humanity does not belong to 267.23 God, as you spoke about, why did Jesus come into 267.24 the world, the Son of the Living God, reveal
267.25 himself (and) suffer tribulation and persecution, get hung
267.26 upon the cross (and) have his enemies commit against him the 267.27 torture and shame of their wickedness?
267.28 [The] Apostle [said] to him: Jesus did not come (and) reveal[289]
267.29 (himself) to the world because of humanity alone, but 267.30 [rather, before he][290] came (and) revealed (himself) on the earth, 267.31 [he accomplished first his][291] great and strong [works] outside of 267.32 [the great world].[292] But, when he finished doing his

268.1 [work] outside of the great world, he came …
268.2 [he sōrs][293] out with Adam and Eve (and) revealed [to them].
268.3 Indeed it was he who sent the Apostles for the Good
268.4 to every generation, and revealed to them Five Great Things:
268.5 [First]: He told them that they belonged to the race of Light.
268.6 Second: He revealed to them about the Aeons [of Great-]
268.7 [ness], how they exist, and he taught them about [the]
268.8 [nature][294] of Darkness, how it too exists.
268.9 The Third time: He proclaimed to them about the [Heroism][295]
268.10 of Light, how it overcame the power
268.11 [of] Darkness (and) defeated it.
268.12 Fourth: He taught them that he had come to the region of death
268.13 in their midst, which is the flesh, until he might benefit them and bring 268.14 them from the gate of hell below in which they

that the rebels will be bound by a great fetter, those who rebel against the Good and against the righteousness
which has been proclaimed by the Apostle.

CHAPTER 137

ON THE FIVE TYPES OF BROTHERHOOD THAT ARE DISTINCT FROM ONE ANOTHER

338.22 Again, the Apostle spoke to his disciples …
338.23 as he was sitting among his community: There [are Five]
338.24 Types (of Brotherhood) found in the Church that I have chosen. The [first]
338.25 are the "brothers," the second are the "children," the [third are]
338.26 the "disciples," the fourth are the "day-labourers," (and the fifth are)
338.27 … (the "slaves")[296] … …
338.28 … which are in it … …
338.29 … the people of righteousness …
338.30 … … … …
338.31 … after he mad e it ready … …

339.1 … their [shadow(?)] is light in the Church …
339.2 … this way. The Light-Mind …
339.3 … which is their shepherd and separates them from …
339.4 … each one according to the hue that it …
339.5 … for they are like brothers, who do not hide themselves [from]
339.6 the task which is appointed them, but rather the task which [they]
339.7 are able to do in the Church, they really do it.
339.8 [The] "children," however, are those caring and wise people,
339.9 the craftsmen, those considerate people …
339.10 … every moment, as they preach the truth always, with 339.11 no falsehood in their mouths at all. Every single Church
339.12 in which a judgement is found, they do not … this
339.13 judgement, but rather they judge according to righteous
339.14 judgement. They do even more and seek God.[297]
339.15 But, they do not separate from him, since they are [his] "children".
339.16 [The] "disciples," too, they are honourable and 339.17 patient people, splendid sheep, who live in 339.18 wisdom, following their teacher in patience
339.19 … as they follow the foot-prints of their shepherd, who 339.20 [is a guide] for them toward (what is) good and useful.
339.21 [The "day-]labourers," however, are those people who stand in

[296] See 340.15. W.-P. Funk, Kephalaia (I): Zweite Hälfte [Lieferung 13–14] (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1999), 168 note line 338.27.

339.22 righteousness according to three things: on account of the … in order to 339.23 … and on account of the clothing in order to acquire and wear,
339.24 and on account of bodily honour, since they are honoured
339.25 by empty praise until the time
339.26 … When one of these three [things] will be lacking,
339.27 [they …] and they flee and become strangers
339.28 … … … their guide
339.29 … … … …

340.1 But, [the "slaves,"] they are the people who reproach
340.2 … their spirit, which is full of vanity, as they …
340.3 … are heedless and cruel, not heeding
340.4 [their] shepherd. But, their sign is this: as long as …
340.5 … the rest, as they stand in the Church. But, when 340.6 tribulation rises against them
340.7 and persecution comes upon them, they attach themselves to whatever comes 340.8 to them immediately and carry it away by stealth and run away from the 340.9 Church, without anyone knowing, (and) become strangers to it, and 340.10 go to another foreign place—while the people of this place
340.11 do not know—so that they might do the will of their
340.12 desire. Because of this, I say to you
340.13 that blessed is every one who guards himself and does not accept 340.14 the type of these two foreign races, which are the 340.15 "day-labourers" and the "slaves" who are in the 340.16 Holy Church. Rather, he (should) receive … the type of these 340.17 other three: the "brothers," or the "children," or the "disciples,"
340.18 accepting their type so that he might live forever
340.19 in their (Way of) Life.

CHAPTER 146

THE OLD MAN HAS FIVE FOODS TO LIVE ON; THE NEW MAN HAS FIVE OTHERS

348.31 [Again] he spoke … … …

349.1 there is holy food with which the Holy
349.2 Spirit feeds his children, as he …
349.3 … through them in the holy images …
349.4 … … … …
349.5 [The] first food is the spirit, that [of the great(?)]
349.6 teacher, that of the leaders, that of the brothers, and that [of] the 349.7 sisters, which the perfect Elect see and 349.8 rejoice in.
349.9 The second food is the prayer that he (i.e., the Elect) prays
349.10 hour after hour.
349.11 The third food is the joy that he
349.12 proclaims hour after hour and rejoices in.
349.13 The fourth food is the preaching [that he preaches]
349.14 everywhere he goes.
349.15 The fifth food is a holy book that he carries
349.16 in his hand, either reading everything written inside
349.17 or listening to the one who reads it. Or, having read,
349.18 he gets others to listen
349.19 and finds the way to make them read it.
349.20 These are the Five Foods which the Elect
349.21 … practices and receives …
349.22 … … the food of life
349.23 … life through it forever.
349.24 Again, he spoke: Five Foods also come
349.25 [from] Matter, those on which it feeds …
349.26 … the image of the Old Man.
349.27 [The first] food is every sight of the world
349.28 the various … of pleasant forms
349.29 [that] he will see and rejoice at.
349.30 [The second] food is the evil discourses …
349.31 … the telling of holy myths
349.32 … and the lying speech (found) in
349.33 [them] … the statements and exaggerations …
349.34 … to proclaim, profiting them …
349.35 [The third food] is the beautiful work …

349.36 … … hou ıs of …
349.37 [The fourth food] is the food [of the world(?)]

350.1 which people eat and from which they are sated and rest.
350.2 The [fifth] food is the sexual desire
350.3 with which people fornicate.
350.4 These [are] the Five Foods of Matter which
350.5 … sin, (and) from which the Old Man
350.6 eats and becomes strong.
350.7 Blessed is every holy Elect who keeps his 350.8 heart from these Five Foods and the dinners of 350.9 Matter … all to snare and sin
350.10 … and drive him to their retribution and their 350.11 torment, under which they will (have to) suffer, that is, those who eat from 350.12 [them].

CHAPTER 148

ON THE FIVE BOOKS, THAT THEY BELONG TO FIVE FATHERS

355.4 Again the Enlightener spoke to his disciples:
355.5 These great writings that I have written for you, they are 355.6 gifts given freely to you by the Fathers of 355.7 Light.
355.8 The great Living Gospel is the gift
355.9 of the Messenger
355.10 The Treasure of Life is the gift of the Column of 355.11 Glory. The Pragmateia and the Book
355.12 of Mysteries and the Writing of the Giants, these 355.13 three holy writings which form a single one,
355.14 they are the gifts of the Light-Twin.
355.15 All the Epistles, too, that I have written to you,
355.16 from time to time, they are my gifts and my 355.17 presents. This is the good fruit that I have given
355.18 [to you] from the Good Tree.
355.19 [Be thankful], you yourselves, my beloved,
355.20 [be] encouraged by these good writings,
355.21 [those] which have been freely given to you by 355.22 [the Fathers] of Light. Receive them into your 355.23 [hearts] and believe in them. Write them on you
355.24 … memory, for you will …
355.25 [through them] to eternal life.

CHAPTER 165

ENVY EXISTS IN FIVE FORMS

409.10 [Again] the Enlightener spoke to his disciples: …
409.11 … … … …
409.12 … what is envy? …[298]
409.13 … … … …
409.14 … … … …
409.15 … … … …
409.16 … … … …
409.17 … … … …
409.18 … … … …
409.19 … … … …
409.20 … being wise in wisdom …
409.21 … Also, the third envy is …
409.22 … … … …
409.23 … … … …
409.24 … … … …
409.25 … … … …
409.26 … on account of what … envying …
409.27 … living in … …
409.28 … … … …
409.29 … … … …
409.30 ?
409.31 ?

410.1 either [in] the name of a teacher or because of a
410.2 disciple, either great or small …
410.3 Envy … … …
410.4 alms … … …
410.5 b rother(?) … … …
410.6 … … … …
410.7 … … … …
410.8 … … … …
410.9 … … … …
410.10 … … … …
410.11 … … … …
410.12 Behold, I have clarified for you envy (and) 410.13 its Five Forms … … …

[298] Funk, personal communication.

410.14 from you … so that you do not [envy]
410.15 one another … envy …
410.16 one another … envy …
410.17 you … … …
410.18 great … … …
410.19 fight … … …
410.20 toil … Blessed is every one [who separates]
410.21 himself from every envy … …
410.22 … … … …

CHAPTER 176

ON SPIRITUAL TRANSITION IN [FIVE(?)] FORMS AND THAT THROUGH WHICH THE CHURCH ADAPTS

452.31 Again the Apostle spoke to his [disciples who sat]
452.32 in his presence about the [transition . . .]

453.1 . . . done in the Church. He said [to them]:
453.2 [There are] Five Transitions, through which . . .
453.3 . . . transitions from [the] body.
453.4 [The first] transition: He passes from the body
453.5 of heaven and earth and the body of human beings. Afterwards,
453.6 he will come to this statue of humanity.
453.7 [The second] transition: He changes from the 453.8 . . . . . .
453.9 . . . . . bearing the body . . .
453.10 . . . the Catechumen.
453.11 [The third] transition: He changes . . .
453.12 . . . . . .
453.13 . . . riches and . . . . . .
453.14 . . . the world and his . . . . . .
453.15 . . . and the [just(?)] . . . . . his righteousness
453.16 he bears the body . . . their righteousness
453.17 . . . . . .
453.18 . . . . . .
453.19 . . . . . .
453.20 . . . . . .
453.21 . . . . . .
453.22 . . . . . .
453.23 . . . . . .
453.24 . . . in the place . . . from the . . .
453.25 . . . . . to the good place . . .
453.26 . . . . . the soul . . .
453.27 . . . . . in the resting place . . .
453.28 . . . The fourth transition . . . . . .
453.29 . . . . . pass . . .
453.30 . . . . . the life of the human being in . . .
453.31 . . . . . .

454.1 The . . . which it . . . . . .
454.2 . . . the entire profit that is polluted . . .

454.3 every … and earthen vessels and herbs …
454.4 … the vessel so that he may acquire it …
454.5 … … the quarrel …
454.6 … retum … …
454.7 … … … …
454.8 … … … …
454.9 … … … …
454.10 … changes … …
454.11 … rest … …
454.12 … … great …
454.13 … … … …
454.14 … … great …
454.15 … … … …
454.16 … … … …
454.17 … … … …
454.18 … … … …
454.19 … … … …
454.20 … … … …
454.21 … … … …
454.22 … … … …
454.23 … … twelve …
454.24 … … … …
454.25 … every … …
454.26 … … … …
454.27 … … … …
454.28 … a man, and he changes …
454.29 … … … …

455.1 … the New Man, who comes to him …
455.2 … he becomes a healthy man …
455.3 … and he does the will that his good physician
455.4 has prescribed for him, which is the commandment of [transition].
455.5 [He] becomes a solitary …
455.6 … as is written in the scripture.
455.7 [He said]: There are Five other Transitions,
455.8 through which the human being transitions in …
455.9 [of the] body. The first transition that [he experiences]
455.10 is [this]: When the time comes and he leaves his 455.11 body, he passes from the body of destruction,
455.12 from the image of flesh and blood, and abandons human
455.13 custom, he renounces all the mirages
455.14 of this world and enters into the presence of the Great
455.15 [Judge]. His deeds … him before
455.16 [the] Judge of Truth. The second transition
455.17 [that] he experiences: He passes from …
455.18 … … to the First Man …
455.19 … [the] Enlightener of the Night toward the place that …

455.20 … it receives him … …
455.21 … this Holy Church.
455.22 The third transition is this: He passes from 455.23 [the Enlightener] of the Night and goes to the place of the 455.24 Enlightener of the Day. He enters the Ship of the Day
455.25 … holy … of his riches …
455.26 … he has glorified(?) … …
455.27 … … again to the Ship of
455.28 [the Night. The fourth] transition: [He] passes
455.29 [from the Third] Messenger and
455.30 [transitions …] and goes to the place of the Great

456.1 [First] Righteous One. He reaches him and rests in himself …
456.2 … of the teacher. The Great First Righteous One …
456.3 … with the spirit of his brothers and they …
456.4 … and he reaches this place and rejoices for them.
456.5 [The last] transition is when he changes from …
456.6 … at the end time. On the day when the Father will …
456.7 [unveil his(?)] face and all the Fathers of Light
456.8 … to the secrets of the Father, this Elect
456.9 will also rise and all the spirits
456.10 of his brothers elect, and will come to the 456.11 Father, the God of Truth, and find rest by 456.12 their Father. They remain with him for all time, which …
456.13 they, too, the course will suffice for them. The …
456.14 … he will purify them and send them to peace [and]
456.15 rest, and he (will) raise them up and assign them [each]
456.16 one in his place. They (will) dwell in the Light [and]
456.17 live forever, [being] in the heart of the Father …
456.18 … These are the Five [Spiritual] Transitions
456.19 through which the spiritual person passes
456.20 from place to place. But whenever …
456.21 … and they reveal life in the presence [of the Aeon] …
456.22 … forever. Because of this, I say to you
456.23 that blessed is every faithful Elect [who knows]
456.24 that the commandment of this transition is great before … because 456.25 of it, he will become a perfect and thoughtful man, so
456.26 that he might perfect all the commandments …
456.27 and [become] free of fault …
456.28 … … … …
456.29 … the transition. Again [he spoke:(?) I implore you(?) my]
456.30 lord, that you tell me about and [open my eyes to]
456.31 the commandment of transition. The …

457.1 … … also transitions …
457.2 … … from … belongs to
457.3 [whose mystery]? Or does the testimony of this

457.4 [transition] …? Then the Apostle spoke to this 457.5 [disciple]: Rightly have you asked. I will tell
457.6 [you] … say …
457.7 … … … …
457.8 … … … …
457.9 … … likeness of the mystery of …
457.10 … … The soul also …
457.11 … … it will live …
457.12 … … … …
457.13 … the transition of … but …
457.14 … it will bear the earths and clothe them
457.15 … tribulation. … it will cast out in
457.16 … [Sun(?)] and Moon and bears
457.17 … … … …
457.18 … … spirit …
457.19 … … … …
457.20 … … it bears the …
457.21 … Again, it distils it and purifies the
457.22 … and it … and it transitions
457.23 … from every body of the world …
457.24 … … … …
457.25 … … … …
457.26 … … … …
457.27 … first. The power …

458.2 this transition of stillness.
458.3 [The] first transition is this: [It ascends into] 458.4 the Living Air and comes into the …
458.5 holy, distilled, (and) purified. The [second transition]:
458.6 It ascends to the Column [of Glory and enters the] 458.7 ship of the First Man, which shines …
458.8 The third transition: [It leaves(?) … the] 458.9 ship of the First Man and goes …
458.10 so that every vessel that shines is purified. [The fourth]
458.11 transition: It exits … …
458.12 also the air of the creations and the …
458.13 … The fifth transition … …
458.14 … from [the] Great First Righteous One to …
458.15 … the greatness … and enters his …

CHAPTER 189

[ON THE FIVE TEMPTATIONS]

484.20 [Again] … … …
484.21 … … … …
484.22 … … … …
484.23 … … … …
484.24 … … … …
484.25 … … … …
484.26 … … … …
484.27 … … … …

485.1 … and he resists the temptation …
485.2 … and his heart does [not] sink …
485.3 … the desire for something to eat and something to drink …
485.4 … resisting the temptation and he becomes 485.5 … the purification of his food …
485.6 … perfect and true.
485.7 [The] second temptation is when …
485.8 … … … …
485.9 … has established … …
485.10 … … … …
485.11 … … … …
485.12 … this one, however, … the temptation of the …
485.13 … and he … the truth.
485.14 [The third] temptation is when …
485.15 … and suffers from it …
485.16 … … … …
485.17 … … … …
485.18 … and leaves his … …
485.19 … … … …
485.20 … … … …
485.21 … … by which he is tested …
485.22 … … … …
485.23 … The fourth temptation is the desire for women
485.24 … … … …
485.25 … … desire for possessions
485.26 … … wants to let it fall
485.27 … … this perfect Elect has not 485.28 … … and he does not defeat and does not move 485.29 … [but he resists] it.
485.30 [The fifth is this:] When a persecution

486.1 [happens] in … beyond the persecutor …
486.2 … the Sects, those who stand in …
486.3 … tribulation. Or again as they …
486.4 … as they strike him with whips …
486.5 … and they come to crucify him and he does not turn …
486.6 … from his truth and he bears every thing …
486.7 … wrath, bond, (and) crucifixion. In these Five
486.8 Temptations … … of the Elect 486.9 … he receives the … of … When [he]
486.10 … increases in faith and becomes righteous …
486.11 his knowledge … temptation …
486.12 … and he returns immediately and reveals 486.13 the truth and … gives …
486.14 … … … …

CHAPTER 191

THERE ARE FIVE PROPERTIES IN THE IMAGE OF OUR APOSTLE SYMBOLIZING THE FIVE LIGHT FATHERS

487.9 [Again] he spoke to his disciples: There are Five Properties
487.10 in the Image … in the Five …
487.11 … The first is the humble aspect …
487.12 … it is with this property that I have acquired my Church …
487.13 … … and bear the temptation of [good(?) and] 487.14 just [souls(?)] … … …
487.15 … humble … …
487.16 … … … …
487.17 … … … …
487.18 … apostle, the twelve …
487.19 … … … …
487.20 … … the First Man …
487.21 … … chosen …
487.22 … … The third property …
487.23 … … … …
487.24 … … the First Man …
487.25 … he and … …
487.26 … … … …
487.27 … … … …
487.28 … … I have …
487.29 … … … Image

488.1 … the beauty revealed to you in the Image …
488.2 … … he reveals …
488.3 … in a beautiful image he has saved(?) …
488.4 … through the beauty of his image.
488.5 [The] fifth property is my light-wisdom …
488.6 … … from the Living Fire which …
488.7 … weed(?), but, while I receive the property of …
488.8 … [laying on of hands(?)].[299] Since in his wisdom and his …
488.9 … in all the worlds, he has revealed
488.10 … … … …
488.11 … … … …
488.12 [wears] their flesh. It is his own will that he has done [in]

[299] Funk, Kephalaia (I): Zweite Hälfte, 488 [432], note line 8.

488.13 all [the] worlds, in his wisdom, (and) in his love.
488.14 [This is also that way that] I have chosen my Church …
488.15 … … … …
488.16 … … … …
488.17 … … the soul of the …
488.18 … … he received …
488.19 … … … …
488.20 … … … …
488.21 … all … which I have come to love …
488.22 … … … …
488.23 … … … …
488.24 … Father … …
488.25 … … … …
488.26 … … … …
488.27 … again, b dongs to … …
488.28 … I have left it, I have chosen …
488.29 … … … …
488.30 … … … …

489.1 … wicked evil …
489.2 [the] wicked desire of evil …
489.3 … in this Image of …
489.4 daily, namely, those who have seen me …
489.5 depict the images, it depicts in their hearts …
489.6 their inner image perfected in my Image …
489.7 … likeness and vision of silence.
489.8 [The] fifth: Through my light-wisdom I have separated 489.9 good from evil, Light from 489.10 Darkness. I have separated Error from …
489.11 … their god. I have given victory to them through my …
489.12 … victory. All the Sects …
489.13 … in the … their body …
489.14 … the Land of Light, from which they have come 489.15 … … rest forever.

CHAPTER 193

THE EVIL ONE HAS [FIVE PROPERTIES]; THE GOOD ONE HAS [FIVE OTHER PROPERTIES]

490.26 Again he spoke to his [disciples: The Evil One has] 490.27 Five Properties, [which are …]
490.28 slander(?),[300] murder, [greed, mixing of Light]
490.29 and Darkness. This is … …
490.30 about which I have taught you … …

491.1 [He who] acts on them and lives by them …
491.2 … the truth and the kingdom of God …
491.3 … torture and punishment forever.
491.4 [The Good One] also [has] Five Good Qualities, 491.5 which are fasting, pity, [almsgiving],
491.6 faith, and separation of Light [and Darkness.]
491.7 He who acts on these Five Good Qualities …
491.8 … … [he] will not taste [death] …
491.9 … but, he will share in life …
491.10 … well, and inherit the [kingdom of] 491.11 [God].

APPENDIX

THEODORE BAR KHONAI'S RÉSUMÉ OF THE MANICHAEAN MYTH (ANNOTATED TRANSLATION)

Translated from Theodore bar Khonai's Syriac Liber scholiorum (ed. Addai Scher; CSCO 69; Louvain: Imprimerie orientaliste L. Durbecq, 1954, pp. 313–318), this excerpt, in spite of its relatively late date, is perhaps the most important secondary witness to how Mani likely conceived of his own cosmogonic myth, especially in terms of Syriac terminology.[1]

313.10 On his abominable teaching: It is, however, necessary that we set down
313.11 a little of the fictitious blasphemy of Mani the wicked in this book
313.12 in order to shame the Manichaeans. For he says that before
313.13 there was heaven and earth and all that is in them, there were two 313.14 natures[2]–one good and the other evil. The good
313.15 nature dwelt in the Realm of Light, and he calls him "Father
313.16 of Greatness." He also says that his Five Shekinahs dwelt beside him:[3]
313.17 Mind, Thought, Insight, Counsel, and Consideration.[4]
313.18 The evil nature he calls King[5] of Darkness and he says

[1] In the following notes comparative references will be made to the following English, French, and German translations: Yohannan (from Williams Jackson, Researches in Manichaeism, 121–154); Schubert (from Haardt, Gnosis, 289–295); Reeves (from Jewish Lore, 185–206); Reitenztein and Schaeder (from Studien, 342–353); Pognon (from Inscriptions mandaïtes, 184–193).

[2] ܟܝܢ ܚܕ̈ܐ.

[3] ܫܟ̈ܝܢܬܐ ܕܝܩܪܐ. Yohannan: "Glories"; Schubert: "dwelling-places"; Reeves: "Shekinahs."

[4] While the terms for the Five Shekinahs are notoriously difficult to translate, Burkitt suggested that they should be rendered as follows: sense (as in sanity or sound mind), reason (as in reasoning faculty), thought (or mind), imagination, and intention (as in will) (Religion of the Manichees, 33). Pognon translated: l'intelligence, la science, la pensée, la réflexion, and le sentiment; Yohannan: intelligence, knowledge, reason, thought, and deliberation; Reitzenstein and Schaeder: Bewußtsein, Vernunft, Denken, Vorstellung, and Gesinnung; and Reeves: mind, knowledge, intellect, thought, and reflection.

[5] Scher's text actually has ܡܠܐܟܐ "angel" of Darkness, while other manuscripts read ܡܠܟܐ "King," which is supported by other sources such as the Acta Archelai 12.4 and Kephalaia Chapter 6 (see Reeves, Jewish Lore, 201 n. 18). As Reeves points out, the epithet "Angel of Darkness" can be found in 1QS 3:20–22 (Reeves, Jewish Lore, 201 n. 18).

313.19 that he dwelt in his Dark Land with his Five Worlds:[6]
313.20 the World of Smoke, the World of Fire, the World of Wind, the World of Water,
313.21 and the World of Darkness. And he says that when the King of Darkness sought
313.22 to ascend to the Realm of Light, these Five Shekinahs stirred
313.23 and he says that the Father of Greatness then
313.24 thought and said: "From the worlds of these Five Shekinahs
313.25 I will not send from them to do battle because for tranquility and peace
313.26 they were created by me. Rather, I myself will go and do
313.27 battle." And he says that the Father of Greatness called the Mother
313.28 of Life, and the Mother of Life called the First Man,[7] and the First

314.1 Man called his Five Sons, like a man who puts on armour
314.2 for battle. And he says that an angel went forth against him, whose name
314.3 was Nhshbt,[8] holding in his hand a crown of victory. And he says 314.4 that he spread out light before him, i.e.,[9] First Man. When 314.5 the King of Darkness saw it, he thought and said: "That 314.6 which I desired in the distance, I have found nearby." Then
314.7 First Man gave himself and his Five Sons
314.8 as food for the Five Sons of Darkness, like a man
314.9 who has an enemy mixes deadly poison into a cake[10] and gives it
314.10 to him. And he says that when they ate them, their reason
314.11 was taken from the Five Shining Gods[11] and they became like
314.12 a man bitten by a rabid dog or snake (because of) the venom

[6] ,ⲙⲁⲑⲗⲁⲗ ⲣⲉⲩⲛ: Pognon: cinq mondes (Inscriptions mandaïtes, 184); Yohannan: "five worlds" (Researches in Manichaeism, 224); Reitzenstein and Schaeder: fünf Äonen (342); Schubert: "five Aeons"; and Reeves: "five Aeons." The translation of ⲕⲗⲁ as "world" is, however, supported by Coptic sources, especially Kephalaia Chapter 6, which uses the Graeco-Coptic word ⲕⲟⲥⲙⲟⲥ for the five regions of darkness. The fact that matter is so closely associated with the dark realm cannot really justify the use of a term such as "aeon," which in such systems is usually reserved for entities of the higher realm.

[7] Yohannan: "Primal Man"; Schubert: "Primary Man" and "Primal Man"; Reeves: "Primal Man."

[8] Both Yohannan and Reeves leave the name unvocalized, while Schubert translates "Nachashbat." This name is not found in any other sources, although the abjuration formulae attest the term στεφανοφόρος "crown-bearer" (Reeves, 201 n. 24).

[9] The ⲛ in this construction seems to be a "pronom annonciateur" (Costaz, 507). Yohannan and Pognon attribute the spreading out of light to First Man, while Reitzenstein and Schaeder, Hespel and Draguet, and Reeves attribute the action to the angel.

[10] Schubert: "in a kitchen."

[11] According to Payne-Smith ⲙⲁⲛⲁ means "guardian" (115a), while ⲙⲁⲛⲁ is not listed with a ⲉ. Why is this? Could there also be some sort of confusion or play on words with ⲙⲁⲛⲁ "armour" (115a), since in other sources the five sons are known as First Man's "armour"?

314.13 of the Sons of Darkness. And he says that when the First Man regained
314.14 his reason and prayed to the Father of Greatness seven times
314.15 and he called the Second Calling—the Beloved of Lights,[12] and the Beloved
314.16 of Lights called the Great Builder,[13] and the Great Builder called the Living
314.17 Spirit,[14] and the Living Spirit called his[15] Five Sons: the Ornament of Splendour[16]
314.18 from his Mind, the Great King of Honour from his Thought,
314.19 the Adamos[17] of Light from his Insight, the King of Glory from 314.20 his Counsel, and the Porter[18] from his Consideration. They came 314.21 to the Land of Darkness and found First Man
314.22 swallowed by the Darkness along with his Five Sons. Then the Living
314.23 Spirit called out with his voice and the voice of the Living Spirit became like
314.24 a sharp sword and it revealed the form of the First Man,
314.25 and he said: "Greetings to you, O good one[19] in the house of evil,
314.26 O shining one[20] in the house of darkness, O god who dwells in the house of 314.27 wrathful beasts who do not know their[21] honour." Then First Man answered

[12] ܒܚܒܝܒ… Yohannan: "Friend of Light"; Schubert: "Friend of the Lights"; Reeves: "Friend of the Luminaries."

[13] Yohannan: "Great Ban"; Schubert: "Great Architect"; Reeves: "Great Ban."

[14] Payne-Smith states that ܪܘܚܐ is normally feminine "except when used of the Holy Spirit" (533b), which reflects a theologically motivated interpretation of grammar. The Manichaean Living Spirit, rooted in early Syriac images of spirit, would have originally been conceived as feminine, since she is essentially an elaboration of Mother of Life, the second member of the first divine triad. The fact that the neuter word πνεῦμα was used in Greek created a gender ambiguity and an eventual shift in Coptic, in which it is considered a masculine noun.

[15] Theodore reports that the Living Spirit called forth "his sons" ܒܢܘܗܝ. It is not inconceivable that an eight-century author such as Theodore, accustomed to the theologically masculine interpretation of "spirit" would have naturally used the masculine suffix when referring to the sons. It cannot be assumed that this wording is taken verbatim from Mani.

[16] Yohannan: "Custody of Splendor"; Schubert: "Adornment of the Light"; Reeves: "Ornament of Splendour."

[17] Yohannan: "Adamas"; Schubert: "Adamas"; Reeves: "Adamos."

[18] Yohannan: "Supporter"; Schubert: "Bearer"; Reeves: "Porter."

[20] Yohannan: "the luminous one"; Schubert: "Creature of Light"; Reeves: "O Divine One."

[21] The manuscripts read ܒܝܩܪܗܘܢ, "their glory," which was amended by Lidzbarski to ܒܝܩܪܟ "his honour" (followed by Schaeder and Reeves), presumably referring to the Father. This reading, however, is also problematic since this is a vocative address to the First Man. Thus, it could conceivable be amended to ܒܝܩܪܟ "your glory." The original manuscript reading may simply imply that the beasts are without honour.

314.28 and said: "Come, you who bear the merchandise of peace."

315.1 And he said: "How fare our fathers, the sons of 315.2 Light in their city?" And the Call said to him: "They are faring
315.3 well!" And ⟨Living Spirit⟩[22] and Call and Response[23] joined with one another
315.4 and they ascended to the Mother of Life and the Living Spirit. And Living Spirit
315.5 put on the Call and the Mother of Life put on the Response, her[24] beloved
315.6 son, and they descended to the Land of Darkness to where First 315.7 Man and his sons (were). Then the Living Spirit ordered three 315.8 of his sons,[25] that one should kill and another skin the Archons, the Sons of 315.9 Darkness, and deliver (them) to the Mother of Life. The Mother of Life
315.10 stretched out the sky from their skins and made Eleven[26] Heavens.
315.11 And they threw down their corpses to the Land of Darkness and made Eight
315.12 Earths. And the Five Sons of the Living Spirit each
315.13 completed his task. The Ornament of Splendour is the one who holds the Five
315.14 Shining Gods by their waists and below their waists the heavens were 315.15 spread out. Also, the Porter is the one who bends down on one of his knees
315.16 and carries the earths. And after the heavens and the earths were 315.17 made the Great King of Glory sat among the heavens
315.18 and kept watch over everything. Then, the Living Spirit
315.19 revealed his forms[27] to the Sons of Darkness and from the light which had been 315.20 swallowed by them from these Five Shining Gods he filtered the 315.21 light and built the Sun and the Moon.[28] And (with) light that was left over from

[22] There appears to have been some confusion by the copyist here (?).

[23] Yohannan: "the Appellant and the Respondent"; Schubert: "the Call and the Answer"; Reeves: "the Caller and the Respondent."

[24] Yohannan: "her"; Schubert: "its"; Reeves: "her."

[25] ⲛ̀ϩⲙⲟⲩ ⲛ̀ⲥⲁⲗⲓ is interpreted by Yohannan, Schubert, and Reeves to mean "three of his sons" since it is clear that Living Spirit has five sons.

[26] Other sources indicated that "ten heavens" should be read instead.

[27] This perhaps indicates the same gender ambiguity as with the Third Messenger who reveals male and female aspects.

[28] Yohannan: "and the light (of the Stars) more than a thousand"; Schubert: "and over a thousand stars."

315.22 (the making of) the vessels she[29] made the wheels:[30] wind and water and fire. He 315.23 descended and forged them beneath the Porter. The King of Glory called 315.24 and raised above them a bed(?) so that they might ascend over those 315.25 Archons who are subdued by the earths that they might serve the Five
315.26 Shining Gods without being burned by the venom of the Archons.
315.27 And he says that the Mother of Life, First Man, and the Living Spirit
315.28 rose in prayer and asked of the Father of Greatness

316.1 and the Father of Greatness heard them and called the Third Evocation—
316.2 the Messenger. And the Messenger called Twelve Virgins,[31]
316.3 with their garments, their crowns, and their attributes: the first is 316.4 majesty, the second wisdom, the third victory,
316.5 the fourth persuasion, the fifth chastity, the sixth truth,
316.6 the seventh faith, the eighth patience, the ninth
316.7 uprightness, the tenth grace, the eleventh justice,
316.8 (and) the twelfth light. And when the Messenger came to those 316.9 vessels, he commanded three servants to make the vessels move.
316.10 The Great Builder he commanded to build a New Earth and Three 316.11 Vessels[32] to ascend. And when the ships went and reached the middle 316.12 of heaven, then the Messenger revealed his images, male and female,
316.13 and was manifested to all the Archons, the Sons of Darkness, male
316.14 and female. At the appearance of the Messenger, who was beautiful in his forms,
316.15 all the Archons were inflamed with lust, the males
316.16 for the image of the female, and the females for the image of the male.
316.17 They began to expel through their lust the light which they had swallowed from 316.18 the Five Shining Gods. Then the sin which was in them
316.19 conspired and like a hair in dough it mixed itself
316.20 with the {light}[33] which came out of the Archons and it sought
316.21 to enter in. Then, the Messenger concealed his image and separated

---

[29] This feminine verb form supports the idea that the Living Spirit was conceived as a feminine being by early Manichaeans.

[30] Yohannan and Reeves translate "wheels"; Schaeder Sphären; Pognon vases.

[31] According to Reeves, the Twelve Virgins are identified with the twelve signs of the Zodiac (Jewish Lore, 204 n. 46), yet this needs to be reconciled with the depiction of the Zodiac found in the Kephalaia (see Chapter 3 above).

[32] Both Yohannan and Reeves have translated "wheels" for ܓܠ̈ܓ̈ "wheels" (see Payne-Smith, 3a).

[33] All manuscripts read ܢܝܗܪܐ "moon," which has been corrected to "light" ܢܝܗܝܠܐ by most commentators (Yohannan, 245; Reeves, 204 n. 48).

316.22 the light of the Five Shining Gods and the sin which (was) in them.
316.23 It (i.e., sin) then fell onto the Archons from whom it had fallen, but they did not 316.24 accept it, like a person who recoils from his vomit. It (i.e., sin) then fell down to 316.25 the earth, half on the moist (part) and half on the dry, and it became 316.26 a hateful animal in the image of the King of Darkness. The Adamos of Light
316.27 was sent against her, made war with her
316.28 and defeated her. He turned her on her back, struck her heart with a spear,[34]

317.1 and threw his shield on her mouth. He set one of his feet on 317.2 her thigh and another on her chest. That (part) which fell on dry land
317.3 sprouted itself into Five Trees. He says that these Daughters of 317.4 Darkness were pregnant from before by their natures
317.5 and because of the beauty of the Messenger's form which they saw, they 317.6 miscarried their foetuses[35] and they fell to the earth. They ate the seeds of the 317.7 trees. The abortions counselled with one another and remembered the form
317.8 of the Messenger which they had seen and said: "Where is the form that we saw?"
317.9 Then, Ashqalun, the son of the King of Darkness, said to the abortions: "Give 317.10 me your sons and your daughters and I will make you
317.11 a form like the one you saw." They brought (them) and gave (them) to him. He ate
317.12 the males and gave the females to Namrael,[36] his companion.
317.13 Namrael and Ashqalun then united with one another and she conceived
317.14 and gave birth to a son, and named him Adam. She conceived (again) and 317.15 gave birth to a daughter, and named her Eve. He says that Jesus the Splendour
317.16 came to Adam, the innocent, and awoke him from the sleep

[34] Manuscript reads ⲥⲁⲓⲁⲣⲧⲏ "aorta," corrected to ⲥⲁⲗⲓⲟⲩ "spear" by Cumont (See Scher 316 n. 8).

[35] Could there be a play on words here between ⲥⲁⲁⲩ "foetus" and ⲥⲁⲁⲩ "iniquity" (Payne-Smith, 405a)?

[36] There are a number of variants for the name of Ashqalun's consort (See Scher, 317 n. 4, Yohannan, 249 n. 118, Reeves, 204 n. 53), although Namrael has been adopted as standard.

317.17 of death, so that he might be delivered from many (evil) spirit(s).[37] Just as 317.18 a righteous person finds someone possessed by a mighty demon
317.19 and calms him with his skill, thus also was Adam
317.20 when the Beloved found him lying in a deep
317.21 sleep. He awoke him and held him and shook him and expelled from him
317.22 the deceptive demon and bound from him the great 317.23 Archonic power. Then Adam examined himself and recognized who he was.
317.24 He (i.e., Jesus) revealed to him the Fathers on high and how his soul was wholly
317.25 thrown into leopard's teeth and elephant's teeth, swallowed by swallowers
317.26 and gulped by gulpers, eaten by dogs, mixed
317.27 and imprisoned in all that was, and bound in the stench of Darkness.
317.28 He says that he (i.e., Jesus) raised him and made him taste the Tree of Life. Then,

318.1 Adam cried out and wept and raised his voice loudly, like
318.2 a lion that roars and tears. He threw (himself down) and beat (his chest) and said:
318.3 "Woe, woe to the one who formed my body and to the one who bound my soul
318.4 and to the tyrants who have enslaved me."

[37] Just what this phrase means remains unclear. According to Yohannan, ܪܘܚܐ ܒܝܫܬܐ implies a reference to the "two Archons" mentioned by al-Nadīm (Researches, 250), while Reeves suggests it refers to Ashaqlun (Jewish Lore, 205 n. 56). See Pognon, Inscriptions mandaïtes, 192 n. 2. At any rate, it seems clear that Adam is being liberated form negative forces.

La Bibliothèque de l'École des hautes études, sciences religieuses

La collection Bibliothèque de l'École des hautes études, sciences religieuses, fondée en 1889 et riche de plus de cent soixante-dix volumes, reflète la diversité des enseignements et des recherches menés au sein de la Section des sciences religieuses de l'École pratique des hautes études (Paris, Sorbonne). Dans l'esprit de la section qui met en œuvre une étude scientifique, laïque et pluraliste des faits religieux, on retrouve dans cette collection tant la diversité des religions et aires culturelles étudiées que la pluralité des disciplines pratiquées : philologie, archéologie, histoire, philosophie, anthropologie, sociologie, droit. Avec le haut niveau de spécialisation et d'érudition qui caractérise les études menées à l'EPHE, la collection Bibliothèque de l'École des Hautes Études, Sciences religieuses aborde aussi bien les religions anciennes disparues que les religions contemporaines, s'intéresse aussi bien à l'originalité historique, philosophique et théologique des trois grands monothéismes – judaïsme, christianisme, islam – qu'à la diversité religieuse en Inde, au Tibet, en Chine, au Japon, en Afrique et en Amérique, dans la Mésopotamie et l'Égypte anciennes, dans la Grèce et la Rome antiques. Cette collection n'oublie pas non plus l'étude des marges religieuses et des formes de dissidences, l'analyse des modalités mêmes de sortie de la religion. Les ouvrages sont signés par les meilleurs spécialistes français et étrangers dans le domaine des sciences religieuses (enseignants-chercheurs à l'EPHE, anciens élèves de l'École, chercheurs invités…).

SECRETS OF HEAVEN: MANICHAEAN COSMOLOGY IN ITS LATE ANTIQUE CONTEXT

Jason David BeDuhn
Northern Arizona University
Jason.Beduhn@nau.edu

In attempting to characterize or summarize the Manichaean religion, researchers have frequently related it to better known traditions, portraying it as an outgrowth of one or another antecedent tradition, and to some degree more understandable in light of its essential relation to such an antecedent tradition. The history of research shows a succession of favored explanatory contexts for Manichaeism, its cosmogonic myth, and its cosmological construct: Buddhism, native Mesopotamian religion, Zoroastrianism or Iranian religion more broadly, and Christianity either generally or specifically in its "gnostic" form. Some of these proposed associations suffer from anachronism, however, since religions such as Christianity, Zoroastrianism, and even Buddhism were still undergoing formation at the time that Manichaeism joined them as a peer emergent entity. The difficulty of sorting out antecedence and dependence among these contemporaneous traditions plagued the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule, and led to its demise as an interpretive movement within the comparative study of religions. This interpretive debacle has left a great deal of unfinished business in the study of the Manichaean conception of the cosmos in relation to its historical and cultural context.

There has been less attention than might be imagined to trying to discern the precise cultural conditions in which Mani himself produced the distinctive Manichaean cosmogonic narrative and cosmological model, chiefly within third century Mesopotamia. The rediscovery of ancient Mesopotamian literature starting in the second half of the nineteenth century unveiled the degree to which Manichaean cosmogonic and cosmological themes could be traced back to native Babylonian sources.[1] Yet, the "doctor from Babylon" who introduced "the last significant outburst of mythological thought in the world of antiquity"[2] lived in a Mesopotamia massively transformed in the centuries that preceded him by immigration and cultural colonialism. In order to situate Manichaean cosmology more fully in its late antique Mesopotamian context, it is necessary to consider as well mythologies belonging to the non-native Hellenic, Jewish, and Christian traditions that we have good reason to think had infiltrated Mesopotamian religious culture from the west.

It is not my intention to deny originality to Mani's mythopoesis; Mani speaks of visionary experiences, and we must not disregard the importance of these experiences for his authority and the creativity of his discourse.[3] Yet psychologizing Mani's myth offers only a fruitless exercise in speculation. Instead, we need to give due regard to the fact that Mani did not consider his visions as sui generis, but as confirmations and clarifications of the visions of prior messengers of God preserved in the cultural traditions around him in West Asia. Mani famously proclaimed his interest in and affirmation of prior religious traditions:

> The writings, wisdom, revelations, parables, and psalms of the earlier churches are from every place collected, brought back to my church, and joined to the wisdom which I have revealed to you. As a river is joined to another river to form a powerful current, just so are the ancient books joined in my writings, and form one great wisdom such as has not existed in preceding generations.[4]

Mani, then, had a self-conscious interest in the existing religious cultures of his world, and openly affirmed them in a kind of "comparative religion" project in his own late antique world, examining and comparing the distinct traditions around him for common elements he could attribute to a primordial ur-myth.

Although it is readily recognized that the Manichaean mission underwent rapid assimilation of new regional elements as it spread, we need to avoid too sharp of a contrast between this development and the conditions in which the religion originated, as if it arose in a singular, monolithic culture with only one antecedent religious context. Mani came to maturity as a cultural interpreter and innovator in a multicultural environment. Among the intriguing data from the ipsissima verba of Mani himself indicative of a cosmopolitan Mesopotamian culture linked to the west would be the following: (1) Greek terminology apparently used by Mani himself in his Syriac compositions, including titles of his books (Evangelion, Pragmateia), and vocabulary such as hyle, bōlos, archon, hypodektai, etc.;[5] (2) familiarity with characters and motifs of Greek literary traditions, such as the sage Anacharsis; (3) figures in Manichaean myth apparently modeled on Hellenistic artistic models, such as the "Supporter" (sabbālā), i.e., Atlas;[6] (4) Mani's apparent direct knowledge of Jewish literature and traditions, such as the books of Enoch; (5) his knowledge as well of Christian literature produced across the border in the Roman Empire, including the Diatessaron, the Letters of Paul, and some writings of Bardaisan of Edessa. In the following pages, I will explore how these three continuums of religious culture—Hellenic, Jewish, and Christian—intersected in providing part of the context for Mani's cosmogonic and cosmological formulations. Out of several interesting points of comparison, I will review three: the primordial combat of the gods against monstrous opponents, the conception of a multi-tiered heaven and earth, and the origin of human beings from a failed sexual assault on a goddess.

The Mesopotamian "Melting Pot"

The Macedonian hegemony established by Alexander's Seleucid successors filled Mesopotamia and neighboring regions with Hellenic settlers along with Hellenistic institutions and material culture. In recent decades, historians of this period have come to understand that the Seleucid Empire had a very clear economic strategy consisting of two axes anchored at the Syrian coast, one running to southern Mesopotamia and the Persian Gulf, and the other to Bactria. Most of the state's resources were poured into anchoring these economic axes at their ends, where both rich agricultural land and key trade routes provided a major part of the state's wealth, and as a result southern

Geo Widengren's observation that some of these terms are found as loan-words in several Aramaic dialects, including Talmudic literature (Mesopotamian Elements in Manichaeism, Uppsala 1946, pp. 38–39 and p. 38 n. 4) supports the conclusion that Mani did not derive them from any specific sectarian literature, but from Greek vocabulary in common use in cosmopolitan Mesopotamia. The secular character of the terms (e.g., everyday natural and political vocabulary) suggests the same conclusion. Cf. O. Klíma, Manis Zeit und Leben, Prague 1962, pp. 108–111, for a thought-provoking demonstration of Greek juridical, military, and civil terminology from the Coptic Manichaica also found in Jewish Aramaic of the Talmud and Targums.

6. Even though Mesopotamian myth also contained an Atlas-like figure, Ubelluri, the figure of Atlas in Manichaean cosmology, both as described literarily and in surviving Manichaean art, is unmistakably dependent on Hellenistic and Roman period architectural decorations employing the Atlas motif. It should be noted that in Manichaean myth Atlas is a positive figure, part of the divine cosmic superstructure, and does not occupy his position as a punishment as in Greek myth (see Odyssey 1.52–54: he stands in the sea and holds pillars on which the sky rests).

Mesopotamia and Bactria witnessed extensive settlement programs.[7] An official communication between Antioch-in-Persis and Magnesia dated 205 BCE (OGIS 233) bears witness to a kind of league of at least seven cities with the status of polis in southern Mesopotamia and the northeast rim of the Persian Gulf: Antioch-Persis, Apamea-Seleias (at Silhu, the confluence of the Sillas and Tigris), Seleucia-on-the-Tigris, Seleucia-by-the-Erythraean Sea, Seleucia-Eulaeos (Susa), Alexandria-on-the-Tigris (Charax, at the confluence of the Eulaeos and Tigris, refounded in 166/5 BCE as Antioch), and an unidentified Antioch. Of these, Seleucia-on-the-Tigris was one of the largest cities of the ancient world, with a reported population of 600,000. There was a Laodicea-in-Media (Nihavend), as well as Ecbatana/Hamadan, which housed a Seleucid mint which continued to produce Parthian coins with Greek inscriptions, and from which Mani's family reportedly came. Hellenic colonies had also been planted in the city of Babylon and further up the Euphrates at Dura-Europos. Most of these colonies were established early, with the intention of forming the homeland of the Seleucid state. Local peoples mixed with the Hellenes of these metropolises, with ensuing cultural exchange.

They all went on as before under new Parthian masters from the middle of the second century BCE. The Hellenic culture of Seleucia-on-the-Tigris can be traced all the way to its sack by Roman forces in 165 CE;[8] from that point on it lost its distinct Hellenistic institutions in the megalopolis of "The Cities" (Mada'in in the local Aramaic) that had been built up all around it.[9] Dura-Europos also maintained its Macedonian identity up to its conquest by the Romans the same year that Seleucia was sacked, and for some time afterwards, although it came under the increasing domination of a Palmyrene garrison in its latter days.[10] Susa (Seleucia-on-the-Eulaeos) likewise still had a fully functioning Hellenic polis in the 1st century CE.[11]

Adams, Heartland of Cities: Surveys of Ancient Settlement and Land Use on the Central Floodplain of the Euphrates, Chicago 1981, pp. 192ff., documents extensive development of agricultural land and construction of major new canal systems in this period. Mani was himself born in a town along one of these Seleucid canals, the Nar Kutha. Adams also notes the shift of settlement to the Tigris in connection with the development of international trade, for which the river provided more navigable channels than the Euphrates did. He estimates a doubling of settlement relative to the Achaemenid period.

The explicit philhellenism of the Arsacid Parthian regime in its first two centuries was directed at this substantial Hellenic population in the main population center of the empire, and reflected Arsacid reliance on the existing Seleucid political institutions and bureaucracy. The occupants of this network of offices were not, of course, all Hellenes. From the beginning, the Seleucids welcomed native Mesopotamians into the ranks of the government and military, and through these institutions they became Hellenized, at least to the degree of speaking, reading, and writing Greek in their official capacities. Contact of religious cultures also occurred. At Dura and elsewhere, individuals with non-Greek names are recorded as making offerings or serving as priests of Hellenic cults.[12]

It becomes increasingly difficult to follow the traces of the Hellenic population and cultural influence in Mesopotamia as we get to the latter days of the Parthian regime. The Parthians themselves turned away from their public philhellenism in the mid-first century CE, toward a reassertion of their Iranian identity.[13] Yet Vologeses IV, for instance, still took the trouble to dedicate a statue of Herakles he had transferred from Mesene to Seleucia in 151 CE with an inscription in both Greek and Parthian, and fourteen years later Lucius Verus carried off from the same city the Hellenistic image of its still venerated Macedonian chief deity, Apollo Komaios.[14] Continuation of Hellenistic culture cannot be expected in some "pure," unchanged form; that would constitute cultural stagnation. By the time we get to the late Parthian environment that forms the background of Mani, the Hellenic population of the region had been indigenized by 500 years, and for 300 of those years they had been more or less isolated from the Greek homeland. The Hellenic demographic of Mesopotamia had not departed; it was now at home in the region and to varying degrees contributed to the regional "melting pot."[15] The Parthian inscription on the aforementioned statue of Herakles identified the

13. This change in policy may have been connected to contemporaneous efforts by the Parthian government (beginning with the reign of Vologases I, circa 38–60 CE) to assert more direct control over southern Mesopotamia, in order to better profit from the rapidly accelerating oversea trade on which Seleucia and the other Greek cities of the region had previously enriched themselves.

figure as the Iranian deity Verethragna, and the temple to which it was dedicated as that of Tir—Apollo in the Greek inscription. This sort of syncretism contributed to Mani's own synthesis of traditions.

In Mani's lifetime, Mesopotamia contained a sizable Jewish population, in excess of half a million persons, dispersed among urban areas and in places concentrated in agricultural villages.[16] This population had built up over several centuries by immigration from the frequent political and economic turmoil of Judea to the relative stability of Mesopotamia. That security, especially against the hated Rome, was worth fighting for, and the Jewish community rallied to the side of the Parthians against the invasion of Trajan in 115, mounting guerilla resistance that made a permanent Roman occupation impossible. Mani's own community-building ran parallel to similar community-forming developments in the Rabbinic tradition, involving such leading figures as Rav, Samuel, and other foundational 'Amora'im. Yet this tradition represents only a portion of Jewish religious culture of the time, and it remains exceedingly difficult to ascertain the character of the ideas and practices that prevailed in non-Rabbinic Jewish communities.[17] Jacob Neusner collects evidence of distinct liturgical, legal, and exegetical traditions among Babylonian Jews, now largely submerged by later rabbinic discourse.[18] Babylonian-rooted communities re-settled in Galilee established their own synagogues, suggesting liturgical differences with their Palestinian neighbors, and the one synagogue known from Mesopotamia, at Dura, clearly is non-rabbinic in character.[19] Neusner notes a number of indications that the Babylonian Jews might have been particularly engaged in "mystical" speculations connected to Merkavah and Shi'ur Qomah.[20] It is such "mythological" dimensions of the Jewish tradition that have the closest connection to Manichaeism, and there has been considerable speculation about the role of the Elchasaite community—typically characterized as "Jewish-Christian"—in transmitting Jewish traditions to Mani during his youth spent among them.

It is nearly impossible to say anything with confidence concerning the presence and character of Christianity in Mesopotamia prior to the time of Mani. The only historically secure representatives of this elusive entity are Tatian and Bardaisan of Edessa, both of whom belong to "Assyria," in the Roman sphere, rather than "Babylonia" in the Iranian orbit. It is commonly assumed that "gnostic" Christians had found their way to Mesopotamia, and that Mani was directly influenced by them. That assumption will be examined below, leaving aside the very difficult question of the origin of the Mandaeans, who may be fairly classed as a community of "gnostic" character, but certainly not Christian. Bardaisan provided an abstract, elemental account of cosmic origins, traces of which found their way into Mani's conceptualization of cosmogonic forces. But neither he, nor Tatian, nor "gnostic" Christians spoke in terms of a primordial battle between light and darkness, good and evil. Such a dualistic outlook clearly relates to Iranian mythic antecedents, and yet the specific narrative details of the Manichaean myth appear to owe a great deal not only to Babylonian, but also Hellenic mythology.

The Myth of Primordial Battle

Mani's cosmogonic myth takes its starting-point with a dualistic battle between the divine forces of the realm of light, and the monstrous creatures of the realm of darkness. Although this dualistic conflict is often compared to Zoroastrian ideas, it belongs to a more ancient Near Eastern mythological legacy encapsulated in the Babylonian creation story, Enūma Eliš. As far as we can tell, the indigenous Babylonian myth of primordial cosmic conflict was alive and well in the centuries leading up to Mani, and points of comparison to Mani's myth have been obvious since the discovery of Assyrian and Babylonian texts at the end of the nineteenth century. The elder gods bring forth the new young and vigorous god Marduk (or Bel) to defeat the monstrous embodiment of the sea, Tiamat. Having slain her, he splits her body in half to make the heavens and the earth. Berossus, writing in the early Seleucid period, supplies a summary of the myth in his Babyloniaka, in which he identifies the victorious god Bel with Zeus. With the abandonment of cuneiform and clay tablets in the first century CE, the literary trail in Mesopotamia itself vanishes with the perishable documents on which it no doubt continued to be written.[21]

Whether through an Indo-European mythological legacy or later contact with Babylonia in the "Orientalizing Period," Greek myth shared the idea of primordial divine conflict, including a number of distinct traditions, among which the better-known are the generational conflict between Olympians and Titans, the subsequent war of the Olympians with the Giants, and the individual combat of Zeus with the dragon Typhon.[22] Alexander of Lycopolis refers to

21. The last known cuneiform clay tablet is dated 74 CE: J. Bottéro, Mesopotamia: Writing, reasoning and the Gods, Chicago 1992, p. 206. In Seleucia-on-the-Tigris, tens of thousands of clay bullae are all that remain of the huge city archive, the documents they once sealed being utterly lost.
22. Mention should also be made here of the primordial combat for heaven between Kronos and the monster Ophion, related by Pherecydes of Syros in the sixth century BCE, and repeated in such later sources as Apollonius, Celsus, and Eusebius; see N. Forsyth, The

Manichaean discussion of the Gigantomachy: "They also refer to the battle of the giants as told in our poetry, which to their mind proves that the poets were not ignorant of the insurrection of matter against God."[23] Alexander's remark could be taken to refer to secondary cultural adaptation of the Manichaean mission to the Greco-Roman environment. Yet Mani himself composed a Book of Giants. W. B. Henning and John Reeves[24] have demonstrated the debt Mani's book owes to the Jewish Enoch literature, and we will return to this connection below. The Enoch narrative, however, bears little connection to the more fundamental, dualistic myth of primordial combat at the heart of Manichaean ideology, which instead shows continuity with the Enuma Eliš. A variety of evidence points to the amalgamation of the latter myth with the Greek Gigantomachy in Hellenistic literature and art, when Babylonian and Hellenic culture underwent a new phase of intense engagement.[25]

Ancient critics of Manichaeism expressed horror at the detail that the forces of good are initially "defeated" when the deity Primal Man (in the role of Marduk-Bel) goes out from the realm of light to meet the assault of the dark beings. Yet the theme of initial defeat was a commonplace of divine conflict mythology from Greece to India. In the story of Zeus's combat with the dragon Typhon,[26] for instance, Apollodorus reports such an initial defeat of Zeus, who has his tendons cut out, rendering him paralyzed. Hermes and

25. Note that Plutarch sought authoritative interpretation of the Titanomachy and Typhonomachy from a non-Greek sage living near the Erythrian Sea (i.e., Persian Gulf): Moralia 421A–E. On artistic syncretism on this mythic theme, see, e.g., the relief in the peristyle of the Temple of Bel in Palmyra, dating to the first century ce, where the primordial battle between Bel and Tiamat has been visually synthesized with the current iconography of the Gigantomachy. For further discussion, see J. BeDuhn, "Apparatus of Salvation," in T. Fuhrer – M. Erler (ed.), Cosmologies et cosmogonies dans la littérature antique, Geneva 2015, pp. 219–251.
26. Typhaon or Typhoeus is described by Hesiod as a beast with one hundred snake heads that breathe fire (Theogony 845, etc., see T. Gantz, Early Greek Myth: A Guide to Literary and Artistic Sources, Baltimore 1993, p. 49). But in art, as in a Chalkidian hydria now in Munich (Ibid., p. 596) a figure labeled as Typhoeus has a human head and torso, but a lower body consisting of two snakes; the same representation (unlabeled) is found at Olympia (Ibid., p. 50), and the pediment of the Temple of Artemis at Kerkyra. Later literature (e.g., Apollodorus) concurs with this artistic motif, making the lower part of his body ophidian. We thus can see that in Hellenistic times opponents of the gods—whether Typhon or the Giants—came to be conventionally depicted by this iconographic short-hand.

Aigipan recover the tendons and restore Zeus.[27] This element of the myth also derived from older west Asian tales of divine combat. When Hellenistic culture brought the Greek versions of such myths back into the region, their common motifs would have been immediately recognizable, fostering syncretistic religious culture. Mani turned this common mythological motif into a key theologoumenon, which he saw echoed in the passion of Jesus, and took to convey the non-violent character of the divine.

Turning to examine any possible Jewish elements in the Manichaean myth of primordial combat, it is well known that traces of such a myth appear in places of the Tanakh, while being effectively drained from the Genesis creation account.[28] Rabbinic injunctions against discussion of the inner mysteries of the creation (Berešit) may point to a tradition of mythological elaboration that no longer survives even in the margins of Jewish literature.[29] What survived the filter of Rabbinic orthodoxy can be found in late collections such as the midrash Genesis Rabbah and medieval manuscripts of Ma'aseh Berešit (otherwise known as the Seder Rabbah di-Berešit). We are in much the same position with the equally esoteric discourse on the divine chariot (Merkavah), which has relevance to Manichaean cosmological models, as we shall see. Rabbinic evidence shows more engagement with these traditions in Babylonia than in Roman Palestine.[30] It may well be that the complex demiurgical traditions at the heart of "Gnosticism" derive from exegetical elaborations of the creation account that ventured beyond the limits of emergent post-70 CE Jewish orthodoxy. Thus, "gnostic" texts may provide our only access to the sort of cosmogonic mythology once connected with the Jewish tradition, of which only allusions survive in recognizably Jewish literature.

Although Manichaean texts and ideas were drawn upon in initial definitions of "Gnosticism" a century ago, key differences have now become apparent between Manichaean doctrine and the body of interrelated literature treated in current discussions of the "gnostic" movement. Nowhere are these differences more apparent than in the pre-cosmogonic scenarios of the two respective traditions. Whatever may be meant when modern researchers refer to a "dualist" outlook in gnostic texts, it does not refer to a concept of two original, eternal, and ultimate principles in conflict, as it does in Manichaeism. In fact, most gnostic schools of thought present monistic, devolutionist metaphysics, and a primordial combat narrative is utterly lacking in texts usually classed as "gnostic." This fundamental divergence suggests that the Manichaean myth of primordial combat owes nothing to "gnostic" antecedents, and likewise nothing to Jewish ones, in so far as they may be reflected in "gnostic" literature.

Other Jewish apocrypha, of a non-"gnostic" kind, present closer affinities to Manichaean mythology in offering accounts of angelic rebellion and conflict, and such traditions carried forward in certain channels of the early Christian tradition. These tales usually set the conflict, and subsequent "fall" of angels, in post-cosmogonic time, however. Mani incorporated these narrative elements accordingly in a later period of his myth, and interpreted the fallen angels as evil beings who had been imprisoned in the heavens following the primordial battle, and later escaped.[31] We might speculate that his dualistic solution to the fall of angels may have caused Mani to formulate a prior combat before creation, as the back-story to the later fall. But with more direct examples of primordial combat myths in his cultural environment, such a speculative scenario is unnecessary. Thomas Francis Glasson has argued that Enoch's myth of the fallen angels shows the influence of the Greek Titanomachy and Gigantomachy, traces of which also turn up in lexical choices of the Septuagint.[32] Manichaean myth agrees with Enoch (and with underlying Greek myth) that the superhuman opponents of God are not slain, but "confined forever" beneath the earth (Enoch 10.11–14). Birger Pearson has demonstrated continuing synthesis of the Titanomachy and the Enochic fall of the angels in the letters of Jude and 2 Peter.[33]

Construction of the Cosmos

The elaborate and systematic Manichaean cosmogonic narrative displays close affinity to myths such as the Enūma Eliš, where the cosmos is made from the dissected remains of the slain primordial enemy. Although related themes can be found in Indo-European mythology, they are largely absent from specifically Greek myth; the latter therefore played no obvious role in providing material for Mani's mythopoesis in this regard. It is impossible to say whether the suppressed Berešit speculations retained any trace of the mythological personifications of the tohu wa bohu of the Jewish creation account. Nevertheless, both Babylonian and Jewish creation narratives offer an implicit theodicy in the potential resistance or imperfection of the material out of which the divine demiurge made the cosmos.[34] Plato took a similar approach to theodicy in the Timaeus: matter is intrinsically disorderly, and creation is a positive process of endowing it with order.[35] Manichaeism belongs to this same outlook, in contrast with the typical "gnostic" cosmogony, in which demiurgical activity itself is bad. Ill-intentioned creation appears in Manichaeism only in the case of anthropogony.

The divine demiurgical forces of Manichaean cosmogony construct an elaborate cosmos, consisting of a secondary heavenly domain (the "New Aeon" or "New Paradise") overlooking ten firmaments of the heavens and eight earths, stacked one atop the other. The idea of multiple celestial firmaments appears already in ancient Mesopotamia, and became widely disseminated in the Hellenistic west, in part through astronomical lore. It also entered Jewish thought, and finds a number of elaborations in Jewish apocryphal literature, beginning with the books of Enoch. Gnostic and Manichaean texts assume this complex ouranology, which in the gnostic case certainly also draws on Egyptian ideas.

Most discussions in Rabbinic literature, including Hekhalot tracts, envision seven heavens, with God enthroned in the seventh.[36] The aforementioned Ma'aseh Berešit posits a cosmos in which seven firmaments of heaven mirror seven "depths" (tehomot) or earths, a motif that goes back to the seven layers of the underworld in Mesopotamian cosmology, and is echoed in the seven earths beneath our own eighth earth in Manichaeism.[37] As in Manichaean cosmology, the firmaments do not correlate to astrological spheres for the seven "planets," all of which are located in the second heaven in Ma'aseh Berešit;[38] in the Manichaean scheme the planets (with sun and moon replaced by two dark planets) and zodiac are in the first heaven, while the location of the sun and moon remains unspecified.[39]

The Enoch corpus contains the idea that the celestial bodies enter and exit the sky through "gates" situated respectively in the east and west;[40] Manichaean cosmology retains these gates, even though they no longer have a specified function. The Apocalypse of Enoch (commonly referred to as 2 Enoch) presents a multi-tiered heaven, like that in later Merkavah literature and the Ma'aseh Berešit, and includes the interesting detail that the fallen angels/watchers are imprisoned and punished in the celestial firmaments, rather than in any netherworldly pit.[41] Manichaeans place the binding of evil forces in the same distinctive location, and in some accounts employ expressions such as "watchers" and "rebels" that reveal direct dependence on Enoch literature. The Apocalypse of Enoch survives in two recensions, in which there is a total of seven or ten firmaments, respectively, with God enthroned in the highest.[42] The Manichaean firmaments total ten, with a deity enthroned in the seventh, while the firmaments above it lack any detailed description or function, and seemingly exist just to fill out the number ten, above which exists a richly described super-celestial realm.

The midrash Ma'aseh Berešit also includes a super-celestial realm beyond the seven heavens, where God reigns enthroned surrounded by light, duplicating the deity enthroned in the seventh heaven, who is described contrastingly amid darkness, clouds, and mist.[43] This doubled deity appears also in Merkavah literature, and can be compared with Manichaean multiplication of God into a number of emanations, with the "Great King of Honor" enthroned in the seventh heaven, while other emanations of God are enthroned in the super-celestial "New Aeon," and the Father of Greatness himself remains enthroned in the Realm of Light.

As Peter Schäfer notes, Ma'aseh Berešit contains a surprising correspondence between the seventh heaven and the seventh (lowest) earth, anchoring the divine presence in the netherworld.[44] Here, at the very base of creation, the text inventories a mirror-image of the seventh heaven, containing angels and holy creatures, as well as "wheels" (ofannim) and a "throne of glory." It is impossible to deny some sort of relation between this set of images and the contents of the lowest of the Manichaean four "earths," which rest in turn upon four "deposits." There, an enthroned deity known as the "King of Glory"

supervises the turning of three wheels of wind, water, and fire. Given the late date of rabbinic cosmological texts such as the Ma'aseh Berešit, and the relative unlikelihood that they have been influenced by Manichaean cosmology, we must continue to search for earlier sources of these very specific ideas in late antique Mesopotamian Jewish traditions.[45] John Reeves has pointed to the Jewish-rooted apocalyptic ascent narratives quoted in the Cologne Mani Codex as "important textual evidence for an unbroken chain of tradition connecting Second Temple Jewish apocalyptic texts to the earliest Hekhalot literature," and proposes the Jewish-Christian Elchasaite community as the likely channel of such material into Mani's mythopoesis.[46]

In Manichaean cosmology, the operation of the wheels of wind, water, and fire in the netherworld takes place alongside of an Atlas figure who supports the earths above. This detail brings us back to possible Hellenic sources, and perhaps even more so to another Hellenistic convergence with Babylonian mythology, which had an Atlas figure who bore the heavens on his shoulders.[47] This figure appears among the iconographic repertoire of Mithra cultic centers, and fully Hellenized Atlas figures could be seen as statues or architectural decoration from the Levant to Bactria. Manichaean texts describe the posture of Atlas in quite concrete terms that exactly match the artistic representations that would have been familiar to Mani, and thus demonstrate that he could be influenced as much through the artistic medium as the literary one.

Anthropogony

The Manichaean myth of anthropogony begins with the notorious "Seduction of the Archons" episode, which serves as a prelude to the creation of human beings. One of God's emanations presents itself to the gaze of evil beings who have consumed part of the divine light, and its beauty elicits a libidinous response from them, causing them to release quantities of the captive light through the emission of sexual fluids. These emissions fall to earth, where they become plants and animals. Humans are a derivative product of this event. Here again, the critics of Manichaeism expressed shock at such a tale, despite the fact that the motif had widespread attestation in other mythologies.

Several parallels may be cited from Near Eastern bronze age mythology, but examples exist closer to Mani's own historical context. For example, the tale of the origins of the Athenian people tells how Hephaistos lusted after the virgin goddess Athena, but succeeded only in ejaculating onto her leg. Athena wiped it off and it fell to earth, giving birth to Erichthonios. Pindar (Pythian Ode 2.21–48) summarizes a similar tale involving a goddess resisting unwanted advances, in this case Hera against the advances of the Titan Ixion. Zeus substitutes a phantom-Hera made of cloud, and consequently the assaulter's semen misses its target, yet still produces offspring: the eponymous ancestor of the centaurs. As punishment, Ixion is bound to a winged wheel in the sky, which spins him around ceaselessly. Just as Ixion looses his lust on a false apparition of Hera, formed of mere cloud, so in the Manichaean myth the archons pursue illusory, and ultimately untouchable divine forms. Falling to earth, his semen becomes a humanoid creature who mates indiscriminately with horses, producing the centaurs, similar to the anthropomorphic and zoomorphic creatures born of the archons in the Manichaean tale. Finally, the miscreant Ixion is bound to a rotating wheel as punishment, exactly as Mani told of the dark forces being bound to the wheel of the zodiac and spun on it as a means to both punish them and cause them to yield up the light they had consumed. Such very specific narrative parallels scarcely can be coincidental.

The "Seduction of the Archons" is not an isolated tale in Manichaean myth, but leads on to the creation of human beings on the model of the divine form that had elicited the desire of the story's villains.[48] Thus, anthropogenesis has a decidedly negative setting in Manichaeism. Among the many anthropogonies in Mani's immediate environment, several likewise present human creation as in some sense independent of, or even oppositional to, the supreme being, rather than the result of the latter's initiative. Yet the distinctive theme within Manichaean anthropogony of humans being created in imitation of a divine form clearly relates in some way to the enigmatic passage in Genesis 1,26–27, in which a plurality of creators plan and carry out the creation of human beings "in our image." It is not difficult to discern antecedent polytheistic myth here, preserved in the biblical text for some unknown reason without adaptation to the Torah's monotheistic master narrative. These deities become angels in some para-biblical Jewish literature, such as Jubilees.[49]

49. Cf. Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 62.2; Targum Ps.-Jonathan Genesis 1:26. Note that in Jubilees, the plural creators have been eliminated from the initial creation parallel to Genesis 1, but introduced into the creation of Eve account parallel to Genesis 2.

Philo directly associates angelic creators with the less-than-perfect outcome of anthropogony; in fact, he goes so far as to speak of God assigning "the origin of evil to other workmen than himself," coming remarkably close to a "gnostic" mindset. Only the mind (nous) is created by God, Philo explains, while angels are responsible for joining that rational nature to an irrational one, with reference to the collective address in Genesis 1,26.[50] In addition, Philo explicitly states that the image on which humans were modeled was not God's, but that of a "second god," the Logos.[51] The later rabbis, dealing with "Gnostics" and Manichaeans unknown to Philo, grew less comfortable with such divisions of anthropogonic labor. In Genesis Rabbah 8,9, "heretics" (minim) are reported raising leading questions regarding the use of the plural in the passage, only to be rebuffed by Rabbi Simlai, who draws attention to the singular form of the associated verbs.[52]

The switch from an assistive to an oppositional role for the angelic creators of humanity marks the boundary between more-or-less tolerable kinds of Jewish speculation and the sort of narratives typically classified as "gnostic".[53] Michael Williams has argued that the latter constitute "alternative" solutions to the biblical enigmas, rather than a deliberate "inversion" or "reversal" of the biblical account.[54] These observations suggest that we might, in part, access otherwise suppressed varieties of Jewish demiurgical speculation through so-called "gnostic" literature. Williams' dissection of the modern concept of "Gnosticism" needs to have its day in Manichaean Studies as well. Manichaeism has been associated closely with "Gnosticism" in modern scholarship, and Manichaean material was drawn upon heavily in early definitions and descriptions of "Gnosticism." Yet, as we have seen, Manichaeism has almost nothing in common with Gnostic literature in its theogony and cosmogony: God's emanations do not devolve into morally ambiguous beings, and demiurgical operations are viewed positively overall, rather than negatively. Anthropogenesis provides the principal exception, and is the primary mytholegoumenon that gives us any reason to suppose that

Mani knew specifically "gnostic" traditions. The similarity is to be found not merely in the basic theme of plural demiurges in opposition to the supreme being, but in more specific parallel narrative elements.

In the Apocryphon of John a divine form is revealed in the sky, and is imitated by Yaldabaoth and the archons in crafting Adam (Nag Hammadi Codices II, 14.14ff. and parallels). The direct quotation of Genesis 1,26 in the passage supports the idea that it represents "demiurgical exegesis" of the enigmatic biblical passage. The Hypostasis of the Archons presents the scenario in a form even closer to the Manichaean version. A female deity called "Incorruptibility" becomes the object of desire for the archons:

> As Incorruptibility looked down into the region of the waters, her image appeared in the waters; and the authorities of the darkness became enamored of her. But they could not lay hold of that image, which had appeared to them in the waters, because of their weakness—since beings that merely possess a soul cannot lay hold of those that possess a spirit—for they were from below, while it was from above. This is the reason why Incorruptibility looked down into the region: so that, by the Father's will, she might bring the entirety into union with the light. The authorities laid plans and said, "Come, let us create a man that will be soil from the earth." […] They had taken [some soil] from the earth and modeled their [man] after their body and [after the image] of God that had appeared [to them] in the waters. (II, 87.11–33)

A more graphic parallel to the Manichaean scenario occurs later, when the "authorities" (exousiai) pursue Eve, who eludes them by means of a shadowy double that they inseminate in ignorance (89.17–28). On the Origin of the World employs the theme of sexual discharge from an unconsummated sexual assault in both points of the myth, and draws a very clear connection between them. Yaldabaoth and Pronoia see a human likeness in the heavens above them.

> Then when Pronoia saw the angel, she became enamored of him, but he hated her because she was in darkness. Moreover, she desired to embrace him, but she was not able. When she was unable to quench her love, she poured out her light upon the earth. From that day, that angel was called Adam of Light. (II, 108.14–21 and parallel)

Pronoia's sexual discharge takes the form of blood, which congeals into Eros, an androgynous form that attracts the desire of all the archons, duplicating the narrative theme, this time with various consummations. After a long digression, the text returns to the Adam of Light's self-revelation and its consequences, with the familiar proposition to create human beings built on Genesis 1,26. "And their modelled form became an enclosure of the light" (II, 113.9–10).[55] Later, the seven world-governing archangels see in Eve an exact duplicate of the primordial light image. "Now come, let us seize her and let us cast our seed on her, so that when she is polluted she will not be able to ascend to her light, but those whom she will beget will serve us" (II, 116.13–19). The story unfolds as in Hypostasis of the Archons, with Eve escaping their intention by substituting a soulless duplicate. The same theme is attested by Epiphanius for groups he calls "Gnostics" and "Simonians",[56] who speak of a divine being revealing itself to arouse lust in "archons" in order to elicit divine substance they have come to possess. On the basis of such clear narrative parallels, may we conclude that Mani knew and drew upon specifically "gnostic" anthropogony?

The grounds for caution on this question are familiar. The Nag Hammadi codices and testimony of Epiphanius post-date Mani's Šabuhragan by a century, and the date of composition for the individual "gnostic" texts is unknown.[57] We cannot rule out, therefore, possible Manichaean influence on such narratives, since Manichaeism entered Syria and Egypt in the mid-third century. Moreover, parallels in individual narrative motifs do not necessarily imply familiarity with the whole texts in which they are known to us, or with the "gnostic" schools of thought within which the texts carried their greatest authority. "Gnostic" and Manichaean literature alike may have adopted the narrative theme of archontic desire for and imitation of a divine form independently of each other from a common West Asian mythological source. That source may have been a demiurgical elaboration of Genesis, or a now lost regional anthropogony to which Genesis, too, was indebted. After all, demiurgical exegesis of the Genesis creation account need not have arisen in an interpretive vacuum, but could have involved reconnecting Genesis to the larger regional mythology from which it had been distilled originally.[58] If Mani had familiarity with fully developed

55. An attenuated version of this same theme appears in the Hermetic Poimandres, where the "father of all" gives birth to a human-formed deity, and the latter in turn looks down into the creation of the demiurge, "showing lower nature the beautiful form of god." Nature and the anthropos become enamored of one another, and mingle in embrace. In this example, the metaphorical and mythical vie for control of the meaning of the story, and comes quite close to Neoplatonic accounts of the descent of mind into matter.
56. Panarion 25.2.4 and 21.2–5, respectively.
57. An exception is provided by Irenaeus's report of "gnostic" systems known to him at the end of the second century. Here we find an anthropogenesis that provides some antecedents to the Manichaean one: "But when Achamoth was freed from her passion, she gazed with rapture on the dazzling vision of the angels that were with him [the emanation Savior]; and in her ecstasy, conceiving by them, […] she brought forth new beings, partly after her own image, and partly a spiritual progeny after the image of the Savior's attendants" (1.4.5). "This enthymesis, desirous of making all things to the honor of the aeons, formed images of them […] the Demiurge was in the image of the only-begotten Son, and the angels and archangels created by him were in the image of the rest of the aeons" (1.5.1).

"gnostic" literature, it is difficult to explain why he rejected most of its world view, retaining only echoes of its anthropogony. Given his proven knowledge of the Enoch literature and related parabiblical traditions, it seems more plausible to search for traces of the desire-and-imitation anthropogony in some corner of this non-gnostic material.

The missing Enochic Book of Giants may hold the key. The fact that fragments of Mani's own Book of Giants contains themes found in some "gnostic" texts, rather than proving a gnostic mediation of the material to Mani, may point to common Jewish parabiblical sources behind both "gnostic" and Manichaean literature.[59] John Reeves has shown that, when the Manichaean myth describes the ejections of the archons falling onto the earth and into the sea, and producing in the latter a giant monster, it closely echoes the story of the origin of Leviathan from 1 Enoch 60,7–10.[60] The version in the Enochic Similitudes offers no explanation of how or why the two monsters were cast, one on the land, and one on the sea; but clearly a more dramatic conflict myth stands behind the allusion to a great agitation among the angels (60,1). Milik proposed that the Similitudes, of which no fragments have been found among the Dead Sea Scrolls, took the place of the suppressed Book of Giants, which went into greater detail on the conflict between angels and the nephilim. In a difficult and enigmatic passage of the Similitudes, the angel Michael declares regarding the fallen angels that "They shall not prosper before the eye of the Lord; for they have quarreled with the Lord of the Spirits because they make an image of the Lord" (68,4). It is not at all clear what this alludes to, but the larger context of the Similitudes involves the revelation of the "Man"—a heavenly prototype of the messiah.

Guy Stroumsa argues that Manichaean myth consistently shifts themes back to earlier stages of time, and so the seduction of the angels in Genesis 6 and desire of the archons for Eve in "gnostic" texts, has become a cosmological tale set before the creation of humanity in Manichaeism.[61] He contends that the "abortions" which fall from the sky onto the earth as a result of the Stroumsa, Another Seed: Studies in Gnostic Mythology, Leiden 1984, pp. 165–166, notes striking parallels between fragments of Mani's Book of Giants and the Apocalypse of Adam on the inversion of the story of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah as the death of 400,000 righteous, and draws attention to the fact that this story is alluded to in the context of references to Enoch (Homilies 68:18; Psalm-Book 143:7-8). He concludes that "the traces of Gnostic mythologoumena found in the Manichaean fragments are too scant for us to postulate a gnosticized version of the Book of Giants as Mani's source." Yet, he goes on to assert that there is "no doubt that if Mani knew the Jewish legends, it was a Gnostic or gnosticizing reading of them with which he became acquainted, most probably while living among the Elchasaites" (p. 166).

"Seduction of Archons" in the Manichaean myth connect with the Enoch traditions regarding the Nephilim produced by the fallen angels, where nepilīm ("fallen ones") was exegeted as nepalīm ("abortions, miscarriages"), as it is in Genesis Rabbah 26,7.[62]

The negative character of human creation shared by "gnostic" and Manichaean texts has much in common with Mesopotamian traditions, in which human beings are created by a plurality of gods in order to serve them. In one account, the goddess Ninhursag/Mami is instructed by the gods: "Create Man that he may bear the yoke," and the goddess effects this task by mixing the blood of a slain god with clay.[63] In a later, related version, the Anunnaki conspire to create human beings (again, from the blood of slain gods), "the service of the gods to be their portion for all times"—a service detailed in a long list of tasks involving the infrastructure of agriculture and the temple, in order to supply an endless stream of offerings.[64] The Gnostic-Manichaean turn on this narrative, so to speak, amounts to rejecting the fate of servitude intrinsic to this account, and seeing the "gods" as unjust slave-masters. The basic narrative itself goes unchanged; only its interpretive frame changes. Its presence in late antique literature shows the continuation of a living regional mythological tradition that had not been as completely supplanted by a Judeo-Christian monotheistic narrative as we might be led to believe by fixation on the biblical tradition in modern scholarship. Jews and Christians were exposed to ideas broader than the Bible, and we catch glimpses of that exposure where orthodoxing pressures have not hidden them from view.

Conclusions

With due caution about the pitfalls of "parallelomania",[65] we cannot afford to dismiss the conditions of cultural contact in which the various traditions we have examined here display intriguingly similar themes and motifs. New religious movements are never completely sui generis, but always arise on the foundations of what has come before. Manichaeism provides an effective illustration of this truism. Mani's personal religious experiences included a qualified affirmation of prior religious traditions that he explicitly names as sources of truth. His cosmogonic and cosmological teachings bear clear relation to earlier mythologies present in his cosmopolitan Mesopotamian homeland: Babylonian, Greek, Iranian, and Jewish. Mani represents a development of the regional apocalyptic movement, characterized by revelations of the secrets of heaven and earth, past and future, as a response to crises in traditional religious institutions. His relation to this movement no doubt stemmed from his upbringing in an Elchasaite community, which exposed him to Enoch literature and other parabiblical Jewish traditions. But his engagement with non Jewish mythology in his immediate environment also is unmistakable. Selected appropriations and in some cases inversions of prior mythologies and world views defines Manichaeism in relation to other contemporaneous movements, such as that represented by various examples of "gnostic" literature. The latter literature draws on some of the same regional traditions as Manichaeism, both Jewish and non-Jewish; but direct engagement of Mani with "gnostic" groups that may have predated him has proven difficult to document. Both movements were in formation at the same time, alongside of the emergence of other forms of Christianity, of Judaism itself, and of Zoroastrianism. Mani formed his views at a time when the boundaries between these various movements were not yet clearly defined, and that circumstance is reflected in the "syncretistic" character of Manichaeism. This character remains more visible in Manichaeism than in the other religions due to Mani's programmatic stance on the validity of prior revelations on a broad scale, in contrast to the more circumscribed affirmations of only particular pasts found in the Judeo-Christian and Zoroastrian traditions. Mani's identity as the new—and last—messenger of God came to be defined in large part by his role as the "Interpreter" of prior religious discourse and practice.

Through the special conditions of his cosmopolitan homeland, where originally distinct cultural traditions came together and blended in ever new combinations, and his own travels and inquiries, Mani became aware of what different regional cultures had to say about the origins of the gods and the cosmos. He recognized certain common and recurring themes among these tales; and well he should have, not only from their common origin—e.g., in an Indo-European substrate of Greek, Iranian, and Indian mythology—but from millennia of contact and amalgamation preceding his own efforts. Mani became convinced that these shared themes represented a repeatedly revealed truth, and explained their diversity through a theory of corrupting transmission. Informed by his own visionary experiences, he sought to purge the existing mythic traditions of their corruptions, and restore a single, pure narrative as the foundation of his religious reform, which nonetheless still operated in the mythic mode. To fully explicate the significance of his achievement, therefore, we need to analyze it in terms both of its synthetic and applied originality, and as the culmination of a rich history of mythic creation and recreation. In the latter sense, Manichaean mythology becomes a valuable witness, informing us of the cultural resources present in Mesopotamia in late antiquity, and in this way illuminating the history of many cultures and religious traditions beyond Manichaeism itself.

La collection Bibliothèque de l'École des hautes études, sciences religieuses, fondée en 1889 et riche de plus de cent soixante-dix volumes, reflète la diversité des enseignements et des recherches menés au sein de la Section des sciences religieuses de l'École pratique des hautes études (Paris, Sorbonne). Dans l'esprit de la section qui met en œuvre une étude scientifique, laïque et pluraliste des faits religieux, on retrouve dans cette collection tant la diversité des religions et aires culturelles étudiées que la pluralité des disciplines pratiquées : philologie, archéologie, histoire, philosophie, anthropologie, sociologie, droit. Avec le haut niveau de spécialisation et d'érudition qui caractérise les études menées à l'EPHE, la collection Bibliothèque de l'École des Hautes Études, Sciences religieuses aborde aussi bien les religions anciennes disparues que les religions contemporaines, s'intéresse aussi bien à l'originalité historique, philosophique et théologique des trois grands monothéismes – judaïsme, christianisme, islam – qu'à la diversité religieuse en Inde, au Tibet, en Chine, au Japon, en Afrique et en Amérique, dans la Mésopotamie et l'Égypte anciennes, dans la Grèce et la Rome antiques. Cette collection n'oublie pas non plus l'étude des marges religieuses et des formes de dissidences, l'analyse des modalités mêmes de sortie de la religion. Les ouvrages sont signés par les meilleurs spécialistes français et étrangers dans le domaine des sciences religieuses (enseignants-chercheurs à l'EPHE, anciens élèves de l'École, chercheurs invités…).

Jason David BeDuhn

In attempting to characterize or summarize the Manichaean religion, researchers have frequently related it to better known traditions, portraying it as an outgrowth of one or another antecedent tradition, and to some degree more understandable in light of its essential relation to such an antecedent tradition. The history of research shows a succession of favored explanatory contexts for Manichaeism, its cosmogonic myth, and its cosmological construct: Buddhism, native Mesopotamian religion, Zoroastrianism or Iranian religion more broadly, and Christianity either generally or specifically in its "gnostic" form. Some of these proposed associations suffer from anachronism, however, since religions such as Christianity, Zoroastrianism, and even Buddhism were still undergoing formation at the time that Manichaeism joined them as a peer emergent entity. The difficulty of sorting out antecedence and dependence among these contemporaneous traditions plagued the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule, and led to its demise as an interpretive movement within the comparative study of religions. This interpretive debacle has left a great deal of unfinished business in the study of the Manichaean conception of the cosmos in relation to its historical and cultural context.

There has been less attention than might be imagined to trying to discern the precise cultural conditions in which Mani himself produced the distinctive Manichaean cosmogonic narrative and cosmological model, chiefly within third century Mesopotamia. The rediscovery of ancient Mesopotamian literature starting in the second half of the nineteenth century unveiled the degree to which Manichaean cosmogonic and cosmological themes could be traced back to native Babylonian sources.[1] Yet, the "doctor from Babylon" who introduced "the last significant outburst of mythological thought in the world of antiquity"[2] lived in a Mesopotamia massively transformed in the centuries that preceded him by immigration and cultural colonialism. In order to situate Manichaean cosmology more fully in its late antique Mesopotamian context, it is necessary to consider as well mythologies belonging to the non-native Hellenic, Jewish, and Christian traditions that we have good reason to think had infiltrated Mesopotamian religious culture from the west.

It is not my intention to deny originality to Mani's mythopoesis; Mani speaks of visionary experiences, and we must not disregard the importance of these experiences for his authority and the creativity of his discourse.[3] Yet psychologizing Mani's myth offers only a fruitless exercise in speculation. Instead, we need to give due regard to the fact that Mani did not consider his visions as sui generis, but as confirmations and clarifications of the visions of prior messengers of God preserved in the cultural traditions around him in West Asia. Mani famously proclaimed his interest in and affirmation of prior religious traditions:

> The writings, wisdom, revelations, parables, and psalms of the earlier churches are from every place collected, brought back to my church, and joined to the wisdom which I have revealed to you. As a river is joined to another river to form a powerful current, just so are the ancient books joined in my writings, and form one great wisdom such as has not existed in preceding generations.[4]

Mani, then, had a self-conscious interest in the existing religious cultures of his world, and openly affirmed them in a kind of "comparative religion" project in his own late antique world, examining and comparing the distinct traditions around him for common elements he could attribute to a primordial ur-myth.

Although it is readily recognized that the Manichaean mission underwent rapid assimilation of new regional elements as it spread, we need to avoid too sharp of a contrast between this development and the conditions in which the religion originated, as if it arose in a singular, monolithic culture with only one antecedent religious context. Mani came to maturity as a cultural interpreter and innovator in a multicultural environment. Among the intriguing data from the ipsissima verba of Mani himself indicative of a cosmopolitan Mesopotamian culture linked to the west would be the following: (1) Greek terminology apparently used by Mani himself in his Syriac compositions, including titles of his books (Evangelion, Pragmateia), and vocabulary such as hyle, bōlos, archon, hypodektai, etc.;[5] (2) familiarity with characters and motifs of Greek literary traditions, such as the sage Anacharsis; (3) figures in Manichaean myth apparently modeled on Hellenistic artistic models, such as the "Supporter" (sabbālā), i.e., Atlas;[6] (4) Mani's apparent direct knowledge of Jewish literature and traditions, such as the books of Enoch; (5) his knowledge as well of Christian literature produced across the border in the Roman Empire, including the Diatessaron, the Letters of Paul, and some writings of Bardaisan of Edessa. In the following pages, I will explore how these three continuums of religious culture—Hellenic, Jewish, and Christian—intersected in providing part of the context for Mani's cosmogonic and cosmological formulations. Out of several interesting points of comparison, I will review three: the primordial combat of the gods against monstrous opponents, the conception of a multi-tiered heaven and earth, and the origin of human beings from a failed sexual assault on a goddess.

The Mesopotamian "Melting Pot"

The Macedonian hegemony established by Alexander's Seleucid successors filled Mesopotamia and neighboring regions with Hellenic settlers along with Hellenistic institutions and material culture. In recent decades, historians of this period have come to understand that the Seleucid Empire had a very clear economic strategy consisting of two axes anchored at the Syrian coast, one running to southern Mesopotamia and the Persian Gulf, and the other to Bactria. Most of the state's resources were poured into anchoring these economic axes at their ends, where both rich agricultural land and key trade routes provided a major part of the state's wealth, and as a result southern

Geo Widengren's observation that some of these terms are found as loan-words in several Aramaic dialects, including Talmudic literature (Mesopotamian Elements in Manichaeism, Uppsala 1946, pp. 38–39 and p. 38 n. 4) supports the conclusion that Mani did not derive them from any specific sectarian literature, but from Greek vocabulary in common use in cosmopolitan Mesopotamia. The secular character of the terms (e.g., everyday natural and political vocabulary) suggests the same conclusion. Cf. O. Klíma, Manis Zeit und Leben, Prague 1962, pp. 108–111, for a thought-provoking demonstration of Greek juridical, military, and civil terminology from the Coptic Manichaica also found in Jewish Aramaic of the Talmud and Targums.

6. Even though Mesopotamian myth also contained an Atlas-like figure, Ubelluri, the figure of Atlas in Manichaean cosmology, both as described literarily and in surviving Manichaean art, is unmistakably dependent on Hellenistic and Roman period architectural decorations employing the Atlas motif. It should be noted that in Manichaean myth Atlas is a positive figure, part of the divine cosmic superstructure, and does not occupy his position as a punishment as in Greek myth (see Odyssey 1.52–54: he stands in the sea and holds pillars on which the sky rests).

Mesopotamia and Bactria witnessed extensive settlement programs.[7] An official communication between Antioch-in-Persis and Magnesia dated 205 BCE (OGIS 233) bears witness to a kind of league of at least seven cities with the status of polis in southern Mesopotamia and the northeast rim of the Persian Gulf: Antioch-Persis, Apamea-Seleias (at Silhu, the confluence of the Sillas and Tigris), Seleucia-on-the-Tigris, Seleucia-by-the-Erythraean Sea, Seleucia-Eulaeos (Susa), Alexandria-on-the-Tigris (Charax, at the confluence of the Eulaeos and Tigris, refounded in 166/5 BCE as Antioch), and an unidentified Antioch. Of these, Seleucia-on-the-Tigris was one of the largest cities of the ancient world, with a reported population of 600,000. There was a Laodicea-in-Media (Nihavend), as well as Ecbatana/Hamadan, which housed a Seleucid mint which continued to produce Parthian coins with Greek inscriptions, and from which Mani's family reportedly came. Hellenic colonies had also been planted in the city of Babylon and further up the Euphrates at Dura-Europos. Most of these colonies were established early, with the intention of forming the homeland of the Seleucid state. Local peoples mixed with the Hellenes of these metropolises, with ensuing cultural exchange.

They all went on as before under new Parthian masters from the middle of the second century BCE. The Hellenic culture of Seleucia-on-the-Tigris can be traced all the way to its sack by Roman forces in 165 CE;[8] from that point on it lost its distinct Hellenistic institutions in the megalopolis of "The Cities" (Mada'in in the local Aramaic) that had been built up all around it.[9] Dura-Europos also maintained its Macedonian identity up to its conquest by the Romans the same year that Seleucia was sacked, and for some time afterwards, although it came under the increasing domination of a Palmyrene garrison in its latter days.[10] Susa (Seleucia-on-the-Eulaeos) likewise still had a fully functioning Hellenic polis in the 1st century CE.[11]

Adams, Heartland of Cities: Surveys of Ancient Settlement and Land Use on the Central Floodplain of the Euphrates, Chicago 1981, pp. 192ff., documents extensive development of agricultural land and construction of major new canal systems in this period. Mani was himself born in a town along one of these Seleucid canals, the Nar Kutha. Adams also notes the shift of settlement to the Tigris in connection with the development of international trade, for which the river provided more navigable channels than the Euphrates did. He estimates a doubling of settlement relative to the Achaemenid period.

The explicit philhellenism of the Arsacid Parthian regime in its first two centuries was directed at this substantial Hellenic population in the main population center of the empire, and reflected Arsacid reliance on the existing Seleucid political institutions and bureaucracy. The occupants of this network of offices were not, of course, all Hellenes. From the beginning, the Seleucids welcomed native Mesopotamians into the ranks of the government and military, and through these institutions they became Hellenized, at least to the degree of speaking, reading, and writing Greek in their official capacities. Contact of religious cultures also occurred. At Dura and elsewhere, individuals with non-Greek names are recorded as making offerings or serving as priests of Hellenic cults.[12]

It becomes increasingly difficult to follow the traces of the Hellenic population and cultural influence in Mesopotamia as we get to the latter days of the Parthian regime. The Parthians themselves turned away from their public philhellenism in the mid-first century CE, toward a reassertion of their Iranian identity.[13] Yet Vologeses IV, for instance, still took the trouble to dedicate a statue of Herakles he had transferred from Mesene to Seleucia in 151 CE with an inscription in both Greek and Parthian, and fourteen years later Lucius Verus carried off from the same city the Hellenistic image of its still venerated Macedonian chief deity, Apollo Komaios.[14] Continuation of Hellenistic culture cannot be expected in some "pure," unchanged form; that would constitute cultural stagnation. By the time we get to the late Parthian environment that forms the background of Mani, the Hellenic population of the region had been indigenized by 500 years, and for 300 of those years they had been more or less isolated from the Greek homeland. The Hellenic demographic of Mesopotamia had not departed; it was now at home in the region and to varying degrees contributed to the regional "melting pot."[15] The Parthian inscription on the aforementioned statue of Herakles identified the

13. This change in policy may have been connected to contemporaneous efforts by the Parthian government (beginning with the reign of Vologases I, circa 38–60 CE) to assert more direct control over southern Mesopotamia, in order to better profit from the rapidly accelerating oversea trade on which Seleucia and the other Greek cities of the region had previously enriched themselves.

figure as the Iranian deity Verethragna, and the temple to which it was dedicated as that of Tir—Apollo in the Greek inscription. This sort of syncretism contributed to Mani's own synthesis of traditions.

In Mani's lifetime, Mesopotamia contained a sizable Jewish population, in excess of half a million persons, dispersed among urban areas and in places concentrated in agricultural villages.[16] This population had built up over several centuries by immigration from the frequent political and economic turmoil of Judea to the relative stability of Mesopotamia. That security, especially against the hated Rome, was worth fighting for, and the Jewish community rallied to the side of the Parthians against the invasion of Trajan in 115, mounting guerilla resistance that made a permanent Roman occupation impossible. Mani's own community-building ran parallel to similar community-forming developments in the Rabbinic tradition, involving such leading figures as Rav, Samuel, and other foundational 'Amora'im. Yet this tradition represents only a portion of Jewish religious culture of the time, and it remains exceedingly difficult to ascertain the character of the ideas and practices that prevailed in non-Rabbinic Jewish communities.[17] Jacob Neusner collects evidence of distinct liturgical, legal, and exegetical traditions among Babylonian Jews, now largely submerged by later rabbinic discourse.[18] Babylonian-rooted communities re-settled in Galilee established their own synagogues, suggesting liturgical differences with their Palestinian neighbors, and the one synagogue known from Mesopotamia, at Dura, clearly is non-rabbinic in character.[19] Neusner notes a number of indications that the Babylonian Jews might have been particularly engaged in "mystical" speculations connected to Merkavah and Shi'ur Qomah.[20] It is such "mythological" dimensions of the Jewish tradition that have the closest connection to Manichaeism, and there has been considerable speculation about the role of the Elchasaite community—typically characterized as "Jewish-Christian"—in transmitting Jewish traditions to Mani during his youth spent among them.

It is nearly impossible to say anything with confidence concerning the presence and character of Christianity in Mesopotamia prior to the time of Mani. The only historically secure representatives of this elusive entity are Tatian and Bardaisan of Edessa, both of whom belong to "Assyria," in the Roman sphere, rather than "Babylonia" in the Iranian orbit. It is commonly assumed that "gnostic" Christians had found their way to Mesopotamia, and that Mani was directly influenced by them. That assumption will be examined below, leaving aside the very difficult question of the origin of the Mandaeans, who may be fairly classed as a community of "gnostic" character, but certainly not Christian. Bardaisan provided an abstract, elemental account of cosmic origins, traces of which found their way into Mani's conceptualization of cosmogonic forces. But neither he, nor Tatian, nor "gnostic" Christians spoke in terms of a primordial battle between light and darkness, good and evil. Such a dualistic outlook clearly relates to Iranian mythic antecedents, and yet the specific narrative details of the Manichaean myth appear to owe a great deal not only to Babylonian, but also Hellenic mythology.

The Myth of Primordial Battle

Mani's cosmogonic myth takes its starting-point with a dualistic battle between the divine forces of the realm of light, and the monstrous creatures of the realm of darkness. Although this dualistic conflict is often compared to Zoroastrian ideas, it belongs to a more ancient Near Eastern mythological legacy encapsulated in the Babylonian creation story, Enūma Eliš. As far as we can tell, the indigenous Babylonian myth of primordial cosmic conflict was alive and well in the centuries leading up to Mani, and points of comparison to Mani's myth have been obvious since the discovery of Assyrian and Babylonian texts at the end of the nineteenth century. The elder gods bring forth the new young and vigorous god Marduk (or Bel) to defeat the monstrous embodiment of the sea, Tiamat. Having slain her, he splits her body in half to make the heavens and the earth. Berossus, writing in the early Seleucid period, supplies a summary of the myth in his Babyloniaka, in which he identifies the victorious god Bel with Zeus. With the abandonment of cuneiform and clay tablets in the first century CE, the literary trail in Mesopotamia itself vanishes with the perishable documents on which it no doubt continued to be written.[21]

Whether through an Indo-European mythological legacy or later contact with Babylonia in the "Orientalizing Period," Greek myth shared the idea of primordial divine conflict, including a number of distinct traditions, among which the better-known are the generational conflict between Olympians and Titans, the subsequent war of the Olympians with the Giants, and the individual combat of Zeus with the dragon Typhon.[22] Alexander of Lycopolis refers to

21. The last known cuneiform clay tablet is dated 74 CE: J. Bottéro, Mesopotamia: Writing, reasoning and the Gods, Chicago 1992, p. 206. In Seleucia-on-the-Tigris, tens of thousands of clay bullae are all that remain of the huge city archive, the documents they once sealed being utterly lost.
22. Mention should also be made here of the primordial combat for heaven between Kronos and the monster Ophion, related by Pherecydes of Syros in the sixth century BCE, and repeated in such later sources as Apollonius, Celsus, and Eusebius; see N. Forsyth, The

Manichaean discussion of the Gigantomachy: "They also refer to the battle of the giants as told in our poetry, which to their mind proves that the poets were not ignorant of the insurrection of matter against God."[23] Alexander's remark could be taken to refer to secondary cultural adaptation of the Manichaean mission to the Greco-Roman environment. Yet Mani himself composed a Book of Giants. W. B. Henning and John Reeves[24] have demonstrated the debt Mani's book owes to the Jewish Enoch literature, and we will return to this connection below. The Enoch narrative, however, bears little connection to the more fundamental, dualistic myth of primordial combat at the heart of Manichaean ideology, which instead shows continuity with the Enuma Eliš. A variety of evidence points to the amalgamation of the latter myth with the Greek Gigantomachy in Hellenistic literature and art, when Babylonian and Hellenic culture underwent a new phase of intense engagement.[25]

Ancient critics of Manichaeism expressed horror at the detail that the forces of good are initially "defeated" when the deity Primal Man (in the role of Marduk-Bel) goes out from the realm of light to meet the assault of the dark beings. Yet the theme of initial defeat was a commonplace of divine conflict mythology from Greece to India. In the story of Zeus's combat with the dragon Typhon,[26] for instance, Apollodorus reports such an initial defeat of Zeus, who has his tendons cut out, rendering him paralyzed. Hermes and

25. Note that Plutarch sought authoritative interpretation of the Titanomachy and Typhonomachy from a non-Greek sage living near the Erythrian Sea (i.e., Persian Gulf): Moralia 421A–E. On artistic syncretism on this mythic theme, see, e.g., the relief in the peristyle of the Temple of Bel in Palmyra, dating to the first century ce, where the primordial battle between Bel and Tiamat has been visually synthesized with the current iconography of the Gigantomachy. For further discussion, see J. BeDuhn, "Apparatus of Salvation," in T. Fuhrer – M. Erler (ed.), Cosmologies et cosmogonies dans la littérature antique, Geneva 2015, pp. 219–251.
26. Typhaon or Typhoeus is described by Hesiod as a beast with one hundred snake heads that breathe fire (Theogony 845, etc., see T. Gantz, Early Greek Myth: A Guide to Literary and Artistic Sources, Baltimore 1993, p. 49). But in art, as in a Chalkidian hydria now in Munich (Ibid., p. 596) a figure labeled as Typhoeus has a human head and torso, but a lower body consisting of two snakes; the same representation (unlabeled) is found at Olympia (Ibid., p. 50), and the pediment of the Temple of Artemis at Kerkyra. Later literature (e.g., Apollodorus) concurs with this artistic motif, making the lower part of his body ophidian. We thus can see that in Hellenistic times opponents of the gods—whether Typhon or the Giants—came to be conventionally depicted by this iconographic short-hand.

Aigipan recover the tendons and restore Zeus.[27] This element of the myth also derived from older west Asian tales of divine combat. When Hellenistic culture brought the Greek versions of such myths back into the region, their common motifs would have been immediately recognizable, fostering syncretistic religious culture. Mani turned this common mythological motif into a key theologoumenon, which he saw echoed in the passion of Jesus, and took to convey the non-violent character of the divine.

Turning to examine any possible Jewish elements in the Manichaean myth of primordial combat, it is well known that traces of such a myth appear in places of the Tanakh, while being effectively drained from the Genesis creation account.[28] Rabbinic injunctions against discussion of the inner mysteries of the creation (Berešit) may point to a tradition of mythological elaboration that no longer survives even in the margins of Jewish literature.[29] What survived the filter of Rabbinic orthodoxy can be found in late collections such as the midrash Genesis Rabbah and medieval manuscripts of Ma'aseh Berešit (otherwise known as the Seder Rabbah di-Berešit). We are in much the same position with the equally esoteric discourse on the divine chariot (Merkavah), which has relevance to Manichaean cosmological models, as we shall see. Rabbinic evidence shows more engagement with these traditions in Babylonia than in Roman Palestine.[30] It may well be that the complex demiurgical traditions at the heart of "Gnosticism" derive from exegetical elaborations of the creation account that ventured beyond the limits of emergent post-70 CE Jewish orthodoxy. Thus, "gnostic" texts may provide our only access to the sort of cosmogonic mythology once connected with the Jewish tradition, of which only allusions survive in recognizably Jewish literature.

Although Manichaean texts and ideas were drawn upon in initial definitions of "Gnosticism" a century ago, key differences have now become apparent between Manichaean doctrine and the body of interrelated literature treated in current discussions of the "gnostic" movement. Nowhere are these differences more apparent than in the pre-cosmogonic scenarios of the two respective traditions. Whatever may be meant when modern researchers refer to a "dualist" outlook in gnostic texts, it does not refer to a concept of two original, eternal, and ultimate principles in conflict, as it does in Manichaeism. In fact, most gnostic schools of thought present monistic, devolutionist metaphysics, and a primordial combat narrative is utterly lacking in texts usually classed as "gnostic." This fundamental divergence suggests that the Manichaean myth of primordial combat owes nothing to "gnostic" antecedents, and likewise nothing to Jewish ones, in so far as they may be reflected in "gnostic" literature.

Other Jewish apocrypha, of a non-"gnostic" kind, present closer affinities to Manichaean mythology in offering accounts of angelic rebellion and conflict, and such traditions carried forward in certain channels of the early Christian tradition. These tales usually set the conflict, and subsequent "fall" of angels, in post-cosmogonic time, however. Mani incorporated these narrative elements accordingly in a later period of his myth, and interpreted the fallen angels as evil beings who had been imprisoned in the heavens following the primordial battle, and later escaped.[31] We might speculate that his dualistic solution to the fall of angels may have caused Mani to formulate a prior combat before creation, as the back-story to the later fall. But with more direct examples of primordial combat myths in his cultural environment, such a speculative scenario is unnecessary. Thomas Francis Glasson has argued that Enoch's myth of the fallen angels shows the influence of the Greek Titanomachy and Gigantomachy, traces of which also turn up in lexical choices of the Septuagint.[32] Manichaean myth agrees with Enoch (and with underlying Greek myth) that the superhuman opponents of God are not slain, but "confined forever" beneath the earth (Enoch 10.11–14). Birger Pearson has demonstrated continuing synthesis of the Titanomachy and the Enochic fall of the angels in the letters of Jude and 2 Peter.[33]

Construction of the Cosmos

The elaborate and systematic Manichaean cosmogonic narrative displays close affinity to myths such as the Enūma Eliš, where the cosmos is made from the dissected remains of the slain primordial enemy. Although related themes can be found in Indo-European mythology, they are largely absent from specifically Greek myth; the latter therefore played no obvious role in providing material for Mani's mythopoesis in this regard. It is impossible to say whether the suppressed Berešit speculations retained any trace of the mythological personifications of the tohu wa bohu of the Jewish creation account. Nevertheless, both Babylonian and Jewish creation narratives offer an implicit theodicy in the potential resistance or imperfection of the material out of which the divine demiurge made the cosmos.[34] Plato took a similar approach to theodicy in the Timaeus: matter is intrinsically disorderly, and creation is a positive process of endowing it with order.[35] Manichaeism belongs to this same outlook, in contrast with the typical "gnostic" cosmogony, in which demiurgical activity itself is bad. Ill-intentioned creation appears in Manichaeism only in the case of anthropogony.

The divine demiurgical forces of Manichaean cosmogony construct an elaborate cosmos, consisting of a secondary heavenly domain (the "New Aeon" or "New Paradise") overlooking ten firmaments of the heavens and eight earths, stacked one atop the other. The idea of multiple celestial firmaments appears already in ancient Mesopotamia, and became widely disseminated in the Hellenistic west, in part through astronomical lore. It also entered Jewish thought, and finds a number of elaborations in Jewish apocryphal literature, beginning with the books of Enoch. Gnostic and Manichaean texts assume this complex ouranology, which in the gnostic case certainly also draws on Egyptian ideas.

Most discussions in Rabbinic literature, including Hekhalot tracts, envision seven heavens, with God enthroned in the seventh.[36] The aforementioned Ma'aseh Berešit posits a cosmos in which seven firmaments of heaven mirror seven "depths" (tehomot) or earths, a motif that goes back to the seven layers of the underworld in Mesopotamian cosmology, and is echoed in the seven earths beneath our own eighth earth in Manichaeism.[37] As in Manichaean cosmology, the firmaments do not correlate to astrological spheres for the seven "planets," all of which are located in the second heaven in Ma'aseh Berešit;[38] in the Manichaean scheme the planets (with sun and moon replaced by two dark planets) and zodiac are in the first heaven, while the location of the sun and moon remains unspecified.[39]

The Enoch corpus contains the idea that the celestial bodies enter and exit the sky through "gates" situated respectively in the east and west;[40] Manichaean cosmology retains these gates, even though they no longer have a specified function. The Apocalypse of Enoch (commonly referred to as 2 Enoch) presents a multi-tiered heaven, like that in later Merkavah literature and the Ma'aseh Berešit, and includes the interesting detail that the fallen angels/watchers are imprisoned and punished in the celestial firmaments, rather than in any netherworldly pit.[41] Manichaeans place the binding of evil forces in the same distinctive location, and in some accounts employ expressions such as "watchers" and "rebels" that reveal direct dependence on Enoch literature. The Apocalypse of Enoch survives in two recensions, in which there is a total of seven or ten firmaments, respectively, with God enthroned in the highest.[42] The Manichaean firmaments total ten, with a deity enthroned in the seventh, while the firmaments above it lack any detailed description or function, and seemingly exist just to fill out the number ten, above which exists a richly described super-celestial realm.

The midrash Ma'aseh Berešit also includes a super-celestial realm beyond the seven heavens, where God reigns enthroned surrounded by light, duplicating the deity enthroned in the seventh heaven, who is described contrastingly amid darkness, clouds, and mist.[43] This doubled deity appears also in Merkavah literature, and can be compared with Manichaean multiplication of God into a number of emanations, with the "Great King of Honor" enthroned in the seventh heaven, while other emanations of God are enthroned in the super-celestial "New Aeon," and the Father of Greatness himself remains enthroned in the Realm of Light.

As Peter Schäfer notes, Ma'aseh Berešit contains a surprising correspondence between the seventh heaven and the seventh (lowest) earth, anchoring the divine presence in the netherworld.[44] Here, at the very base of creation, the text inventories a mirror-image of the seventh heaven, containing angels and holy creatures, as well as "wheels" (ofannim) and a "throne of glory." It is impossible to deny some sort of relation between this set of images and the contents of the lowest of the Manichaean four "earths," which rest in turn upon four "deposits." There, an enthroned deity known as the "King of Glory"

supervises the turning of three wheels of wind, water, and fire. Given the late date of rabbinic cosmological texts such as the Ma'aseh Berešit, and the relative unlikelihood that they have been influenced by Manichaean cosmology, we must continue to search for earlier sources of these very specific ideas in late antique Mesopotamian Jewish traditions.[45] John Reeves has pointed to the Jewish-rooted apocalyptic ascent narratives quoted in the Cologne Mani Codex as "important textual evidence for an unbroken chain of tradition connecting Second Temple Jewish apocalyptic texts to the earliest Hekhalot literature," and proposes the Jewish-Christian Elchasaite community as the likely channel of such material into Mani's mythopoesis.[46]

In Manichaean cosmology, the operation of the wheels of wind, water, and fire in the netherworld takes place alongside of an Atlas figure who supports the earths above. This detail brings us back to possible Hellenic sources, and perhaps even more so to another Hellenistic convergence with Babylonian mythology, which had an Atlas figure who bore the heavens on his shoulders.[47] This figure appears among the iconographic repertoire of Mithra cultic centers, and fully Hellenized Atlas figures could be seen as statues or architectural decoration from the Levant to Bactria. Manichaean texts describe the posture of Atlas in quite concrete terms that exactly match the artistic representations that would have been familiar to Mani, and thus demonstrate that he could be influenced as much through the artistic medium as the literary one.

Anthropogony

The Manichaean myth of anthropogony begins with the notorious "Seduction of the Archons" episode, which serves as a prelude to the creation of human beings. One of God's emanations presents itself to the gaze of evil beings who have consumed part of the divine light, and its beauty elicits a libidinous response from them, causing them to release quantities of the captive light through the emission of sexual fluids. These emissions fall to earth, where they become plants and animals. Humans are a derivative product of this event. Here again, the critics of Manichaeism expressed shock at such a tale, despite the fact that the motif had widespread attestation in other mythologies.

Several parallels may be cited from Near Eastern bronze age mythology, but examples exist closer to Mani's own historical context. For example, the tale of the origins of the Athenian people tells how Hephaistos lusted after the virgin goddess Athena, but succeeded only in ejaculating onto her leg. Athena wiped it off and it fell to earth, giving birth to Erichthonios. Pindar (Pythian Ode 2.21–48) summarizes a similar tale involving a goddess resisting unwanted advances, in this case Hera against the advances of the Titan Ixion. Zeus substitutes a phantom-Hera made of cloud, and consequently the assaulter's semen misses its target, yet still produces offspring: the eponymous ancestor of the centaurs. As punishment, Ixion is bound to a winged wheel in the sky, which spins him around ceaselessly. Just as Ixion looses his lust on a false apparition of Hera, formed of mere cloud, so in the Manichaean myth the archons pursue illusory, and ultimately untouchable divine forms. Falling to earth, his semen becomes a humanoid creature who mates indiscriminately with horses, producing the centaurs, similar to the anthropomorphic and zoomorphic creatures born of the archons in the Manichaean tale. Finally, the miscreant Ixion is bound to a rotating wheel as punishment, exactly as Mani told of the dark forces being bound to the wheel of the zodiac and spun on it as a means to both punish them and cause them to yield up the light they had consumed. Such very specific narrative parallels scarcely can be coincidental.

The "Seduction of the Archons" is not an isolated tale in Manichaean myth, but leads on to the creation of human beings on the model of the divine form that had elicited the desire of the story's villains.[48] Thus, anthropogenesis has a decidedly negative setting in Manichaeism. Among the many anthropogonies in Mani's immediate environment, several likewise present human creation as in some sense independent of, or even oppositional to, the supreme being, rather than the result of the latter's initiative. Yet the distinctive theme within Manichaean anthropogony of humans being created in imitation of a divine form clearly relates in some way to the enigmatic passage in Genesis 1,26–27, in which a plurality of creators plan and carry out the creation of human beings "in our image." It is not difficult to discern antecedent polytheistic myth here, preserved in the biblical text for some unknown reason without adaptation to the Torah's monotheistic master narrative. These deities become angels in some para-biblical Jewish literature, such as Jubilees.[49]

49. Cf. Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 62.2; Targum Ps.-Jonathan Genesis 1:26. Note that in Jubilees, the plural creators have been eliminated from the initial creation parallel to Genesis 1, but introduced into the creation of Eve account parallel to Genesis 2.

Philo directly associates angelic creators with the less-than-perfect outcome of anthropogony; in fact, he goes so far as to speak of God assigning "the origin of evil to other workmen than himself," coming remarkably close to a "gnostic" mindset. Only the mind (nous) is created by God, Philo explains, while angels are responsible for joining that rational nature to an irrational one, with reference to the collective address in Genesis 1,26.[50] In addition, Philo explicitly states that the image on which humans were modeled was not God's, but that of a "second god," the Logos.[51] The later rabbis, dealing with "Gnostics" and Manichaeans unknown to Philo, grew less comfortable with such divisions of anthropogonic labor. In Genesis Rabbah 8,9, "heretics" (minim) are reported raising leading questions regarding the use of the plural in the passage, only to be rebuffed by Rabbi Simlai, who draws attention to the singular form of the associated verbs.[52]

The switch from an assistive to an oppositional role for the angelic creators of humanity marks the boundary between more-or-less tolerable kinds of Jewish speculation and the sort of narratives typically classified as "gnostic".[53] Michael Williams has argued that the latter constitute "alternative" solutions to the biblical enigmas, rather than a deliberate "inversion" or "reversal" of the biblical account.[54] These observations suggest that we might, in part, access otherwise suppressed varieties of Jewish demiurgical speculation through so-called "gnostic" literature. Williams' dissection of the modern concept of "Gnosticism" needs to have its day in Manichaean Studies as well. Manichaeism has been associated closely with "Gnosticism" in modern scholarship, and Manichaean material was drawn upon heavily in early definitions and descriptions of "Gnosticism." Yet, as we have seen, Manichaeism has almost nothing in common with Gnostic literature in its theogony and cosmogony: God's emanations do not devolve into morally ambiguous beings, and demiurgical operations are viewed positively overall, rather than negatively. Anthropogenesis provides the principal exception, and is the primary mytholegoumenon that gives us any reason to suppose that

Mani knew specifically "gnostic" traditions. The similarity is to be found not merely in the basic theme of plural demiurges in opposition to the supreme being, but in more specific parallel narrative elements.

In the Apocryphon of John a divine form is revealed in the sky, and is imitated by Yaldabaoth and the archons in crafting Adam (Nag Hammadi Codices II, 14.14ff. and parallels). The direct quotation of Genesis 1,26 in the passage supports the idea that it represents "demiurgical exegesis" of the enigmatic biblical passage. The Hypostasis of the Archons presents the scenario in a form even closer to the Manichaean version. A female deity called "Incorruptibility" becomes the object of desire for the archons:

> As Incorruptibility looked down into the region of the waters, her image appeared in the waters; and the authorities of the darkness became enamored of her. But they could not lay hold of that image, which had appeared to them in the waters, because of their weakness—since beings that merely possess a soul cannot lay hold of those that possess a spirit—for they were from below, while it was from above. This is the reason why Incorruptibility looked down into the region: so that, by the Father's will, she might bring the entirety into union with the light. The authorities laid plans and said, "Come, let us create a man that will be soil from the earth." […] They had taken [some soil] from the earth and modeled their [man] after their body and [after the image] of God that had appeared [to them] in the waters. (II, 87.11–33)

A more graphic parallel to the Manichaean scenario occurs later, when the "authorities" (exousiai) pursue Eve, who eludes them by means of a shadowy double that they inseminate in ignorance (89.17–28). On the Origin of the World employs the theme of sexual discharge from an unconsummated sexual assault in both points of the myth, and draws a very clear connection between them. Yaldabaoth and Pronoia see a human likeness in the heavens above them.

> Then when Pronoia saw the angel, she became enamored of him, but he hated her because she was in darkness. Moreover, she desired to embrace him, but she was not able. When she was unable to quench her love, she poured out her light upon the earth. From that day, that angel was called Adam of Light. (II, 108.14–21 and parallel)

Pronoia's sexual discharge takes the form of blood, which congeals into Eros, an androgynous form that attracts the desire of all the archons, duplicating the narrative theme, this time with various consummations. After a long digression, the text returns to the Adam of Light's self-revelation and its consequences, with the familiar proposition to create human beings built on Genesis 1,26. "And their modelled form became an enclosure of the light" (II, 113.9–10).[55] Later, the seven world-governing archangels see in Eve an exact duplicate of the primordial light image. "Now come, let us seize her and let us cast our seed on her, so that when she is polluted she will not be able to ascend to her light, but those whom she will beget will serve us" (II, 116.13–19). The story unfolds as in Hypostasis of the Archons, with Eve escaping their intention by substituting a soulless duplicate. The same theme is attested by Epiphanius for groups he calls "Gnostics" and "Simonians",[56] who speak of a divine being revealing itself to arouse lust in "archons" in order to elicit divine substance they have come to possess. On the basis of such clear narrative parallels, may we conclude that Mani knew and drew upon specifically "gnostic" anthropogony?

The grounds for caution on this question are familiar. The Nag Hammadi codices and testimony of Epiphanius post-date Mani's Šabuhragan by a century, and the date of composition for the individual "gnostic" texts is unknown.[57] We cannot rule out, therefore, possible Manichaean influence on such narratives, since Manichaeism entered Syria and Egypt in the mid-third century. Moreover, parallels in individual narrative motifs do not necessarily imply familiarity with the whole texts in which they are known to us, or with the "gnostic" schools of thought within which the texts carried their greatest authority. "Gnostic" and Manichaean literature alike may have adopted the narrative theme of archontic desire for and imitation of a divine form independently of each other from a common West Asian mythological source. That source may have been a demiurgical elaboration of Genesis, or a now lost regional anthropogony to which Genesis, too, was indebted. After all, demiurgical exegesis of the Genesis creation account need not have arisen in an interpretive vacuum, but could have involved reconnecting Genesis to the larger regional mythology from which it had been distilled originally.[58] If Mani had familiarity with fully developed

55. An attenuated version of this same theme appears in the Hermetic Poimandres, where the "father of all" gives birth to a human-formed deity, and the latter in turn looks down into the creation of the demiurge, "showing lower nature the beautiful form of god." Nature and the anthropos become enamored of one another, and mingle in embrace. In this example, the metaphorical and mythical vie for control of the meaning of the story, and comes quite close to Neoplatonic accounts of the descent of mind into matter.
56. Panarion 25.2.4 and 21.2–5, respectively.
57. An exception is provided by Irenaeus's report of "gnostic" systems known to him at the end of the second century. Here we find an anthropogenesis that provides some antecedents to the Manichaean one: "But when Achamoth was freed from her passion, she gazed with rapture on the dazzling vision of the angels that were with him [the emanation Savior]; and in her ecstasy, conceiving by them, […] she brought forth new beings, partly after her own image, and partly a spiritual progeny after the image of the Savior's attendants" (1.4.5). "This enthymesis, desirous of making all things to the honor of the aeons, formed images of them […] the Demiurge was in the image of the only-begotten Son, and the angels and archangels created by him were in the image of the rest of the aeons" (1.5.1).

"gnostic" literature, it is difficult to explain why he rejected most of its world view, retaining only echoes of its anthropogony. Given his proven knowledge of the Enoch literature and related parabiblical traditions, it seems more plausible to search for traces of the desire-and-imitation anthropogony in some corner of this non-gnostic material.

The missing Enochic Book of Giants may hold the key. The fact that fragments of Mani's own Book of Giants contains themes found in some "gnostic" texts, rather than proving a gnostic mediation of the material to Mani, may point to common Jewish parabiblical sources behind both "gnostic" and Manichaean literature.[59] John Reeves has shown that, when the Manichaean myth describes the ejections of the archons falling onto the earth and into the sea, and producing in the latter a giant monster, it closely echoes the story of the origin of Leviathan from 1 Enoch 60,7–10.[60] The version in the Enochic Similitudes offers no explanation of how or why the two monsters were cast, one on the land, and one on the sea; but clearly a more dramatic conflict myth stands behind the allusion to a great agitation among the angels (60,1). Milik proposed that the Similitudes, of which no fragments have been found among the Dead Sea Scrolls, took the place of the suppressed Book of Giants, which went into greater detail on the conflict between angels and the nephilim. In a difficult and enigmatic passage of the Similitudes, the angel Michael declares regarding the fallen angels that "They shall not prosper before the eye of the Lord; for they have quarreled with the Lord of the Spirits because they make an image of the Lord" (68,4). It is not at all clear what this alludes to, but the larger context of the Similitudes involves the revelation of the "Man"—a heavenly prototype of the messiah.

Guy Stroumsa argues that Manichaean myth consistently shifts themes back to earlier stages of time, and so the seduction of the angels in Genesis 6 and desire of the archons for Eve in "gnostic" texts, has become a cosmological tale set before the creation of humanity in Manichaeism.[61] He contends that the "abortions" which fall from the sky onto the earth as a result of the Stroumsa, Another Seed: Studies in Gnostic Mythology, Leiden 1984, pp. 165–166, notes striking parallels between fragments of Mani's Book of Giants and the Apocalypse of Adam on the inversion of the story of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah as the death of 400,000 righteous, and draws attention to the fact that this story is alluded to in the context of references to Enoch (Homilies 68:18; Psalm-Book 143:7-8). He concludes that "the traces of Gnostic mythologoumena found in the Manichaean fragments are too scant for us to postulate a gnosticized version of the Book of Giants as Mani's source." Yet, he goes on to assert that there is "no doubt that if Mani knew the Jewish legends, it was a Gnostic or gnosticizing reading of them with which he became acquainted, most probably while living among the Elchasaites" (p. 166).

"Seduction of Archons" in the Manichaean myth connect with the Enoch traditions regarding the Nephilim produced by the fallen angels, where nepilīm ("fallen ones") was exegeted as nepalīm ("abortions, miscarriages"), as it is in Genesis Rabbah 26,7.[62]

The negative character of human creation shared by "gnostic" and Manichaean texts has much in common with Mesopotamian traditions, in which human beings are created by a plurality of gods in order to serve them. In one account, the goddess Ninhursag/Mami is instructed by the gods: "Create Man that he may bear the yoke," and the goddess effects this task by mixing the blood of a slain god with clay.[63] In a later, related version, the Anunnaki conspire to create human beings (again, from the blood of slain gods), "the service of the gods to be their portion for all times"—a service detailed in a long list of tasks involving the infrastructure of agriculture and the temple, in order to supply an endless stream of offerings.[64] The Gnostic-Manichaean turn on this narrative, so to speak, amounts to rejecting the fate of servitude intrinsic to this account, and seeing the "gods" as unjust slave-masters. The basic narrative itself goes unchanged; only its interpretive frame changes. Its presence in late antique literature shows the continuation of a living regional mythological tradition that had not been as completely supplanted by a Judeo-Christian monotheistic narrative as we might be led to believe by fixation on the biblical tradition in modern scholarship. Jews and Christians were exposed to ideas broader than the Bible, and we catch glimpses of that exposure where orthodoxing pressures have not hidden them from view.

Conclusions

With due caution about the pitfalls of "parallelomania",[65] we cannot afford to dismiss the conditions of cultural contact in which the various traditions we have examined here display intriguingly similar themes and motifs. New religious movements are never completely sui generis, but always arise on the foundations of what has come before. Manichaeism provides an effective illustration of this truism. Mani's personal religious experiences included a qualified affirmation of prior religious traditions that he explicitly names as sources of truth. His cosmogonic and cosmological teachings bear clear relation to earlier mythologies present in his cosmopolitan Mesopotamian homeland: Babylonian, Greek, Iranian, and Jewish. Mani represents a development of the regional apocalyptic movement, characterized by revelations of the secrets of heaven and earth, past and future, as a response to crises in traditional religious institutions. His relation to this movement no doubt stemmed from his upbringing in an Elchasaite community, which exposed him to Enoch literature and other parabiblical Jewish traditions. But his engagement with non Jewish mythology in his immediate environment also is unmistakable. Selected appropriations and in some cases inversions of prior mythologies and world views defines Manichaeism in relation to other contemporaneous movements, such as that represented by various examples of "gnostic" literature. The latter literature draws on some of the same regional traditions as Manichaeism, both Jewish and non-Jewish; but direct engagement of Mani with "gnostic" groups that may have predated him has proven difficult to document. Both movements were in formation at the same time, alongside of the emergence of other forms of Christianity, of Judaism itself, and of Zoroastrianism. Mani formed his views at a time when the boundaries between these various movements were not yet clearly defined, and that circumstance is reflected in the "syncretistic" character of Manichaeism. This character remains more visible in Manichaeism than in the other religions due to Mani's programmatic stance on the validity of prior revelations on a broad scale, in contrast to the more circumscribed affirmations of only particular pasts found in the Judeo-Christian and Zoroastrian traditions. Mani's identity as the new—and last—messenger of God came to be defined in large part by his role as the "Interpreter" of prior religious discourse and practice.

Through the special conditions of his cosmopolitan homeland, where originally distinct cultural traditions came together and blended in ever new combinations, and his own travels and inquiries, Mani became aware of what different regional cultures had to say about the origins of the gods and the cosmos. He recognized certain common and recurring themes among these tales; and well he should have, not only from their common origin—e.g., in an Indo-European substrate of Greek, Iranian, and Indian mythology—but from millennia of contact and amalgamation preceding his own efforts. Mani became convinced that these shared themes represented a repeatedly revealed truth, and explained their diversity through a theory of corrupting transmission. Informed by his own visionary experiences, he sought to purge the existing mythic traditions of their corruptions, and restore a single, pure narrative as the foundation of his religious reform, which nonetheless still operated in the mythic mode. To fully explicate the significance of his achievement, therefore, we need to analyze it in terms both of its synthetic and applied originality, and as the culmination of a rich history of mythic creation and recreation. In the latter sense, Manichaean mythology becomes a valuable witness, informing us of the cultural resources present in Mesopotamia in late antiquity, and in this way illuminating the history of many cultures and religious traditions beyond Manichaeism itself.

SINO-PLATONIC PAPERS is an occasional series dedicated to making available to specialists and the interested public the results of research that, because of its unconventional or controversial nature, might otherwise go unpublished. The editor-in-chief actively encourages younger, not yet well established, scholars and independent authors to submit manuscripts for consideration. Contributions in any of the major scholarly languages of the world, including romanized modern standard Mandarin (MSM) and Japanese, are acceptable. In special circumstances, papers written in one of the Sinitic topolects (fangyan) may be considered for publication.

Although the chief focus of Sino-Platonic Papers is on the intercultural relations of China with other peoples, challenging and creative studies on a wide variety of philological subjects will be entertained. This series is not the place for safe, sober, and stodgy presentations. Sino- Platonic Papers prefers lively work that, while taking reasonable risks to advance the field, capitalizes on brilliant new insights into the development of civilization.

Submissions are regularly sent out to be refereed, and extensive editorial suggestions for revision may be offered.

Sino-Platonic Papers emphasizes substance over form. We do, however, strongly recommend that prospective authors consult our style guidelines at www.sino-platonic.org/stylesheet.doc. Manuscripts should be submitted as electronic files, preferably in Microsoft Word format. You may wish to use our sample document template, available here: www.sino-platonic.org/spp.dot.

Beginning with issue no. 171, Sino-Platonic Papers has been published electronically on the Web at www.sino-platonic.org. Issues 1–170, however, will continue to be sold as paper copies until our stock runs out, after which they too will be made available on the Web.

Please note: When the editor goes on an expedition or research trip, all operations (including filling orders) may temporarily cease for up to three months at a time. In such circumstances, those who wish to purchase various issues of SPP are requested to wait patiently until he returns. If issues are urgently needed while the editor is away, they may be requested through Interlibrary Loan. You should also check our Web site at www.sino-platonic.org, as back issues are regularly rereleased for free as PDF editions.

Foreword

Among various narratives of cosmology throughout the world Manichaean creation myth is undoubtedly unique and significant. In the first chapter, before entering the fantastic imaginary scenario of Manichaean creation myth, I attempt to shine a new light on the cultural, artistic and literary reflections of Manichaean Gnosis and its roots in Iranian culture as an introduction to an Iranian approach to Gnosticism.

However, my main motive is to supply various texts on creation myth or cosmogonical process in Manichaeism. In addition, I found it necessary to coordinate and reconstruct the myth based up on various multilingual texts, such as Parthian, Middle and Classical Persian, Sogdian, Syriac, Coptic, Uigurian, Chinese and Arabic texts, translating these into a fluent narrative. This is provided extensively in the second chapter. Most of the texts referred to throughout the present work are available in my other books: Ostūre-ye Āfarīnesh dar Ā'īn-e Mānī (The Myth of Creation in Manichaeism, 2nd edn., 3rd print., Tehran: Cāravān Books, 2004), and Adabīyyāte Mānavī (Manichaean Literature) written in collaboration with Professor Mehrdād Bahār (Tehran: Kārnāmeh, 2005). Titles of the original texts referred to are listed at the end of this book.

The third chapter, "Mani's Pictorial Manifesto", contains a pictorial analysis of Manichaean cosmogony based on the surviving texts, including Classical Persian fragments explaining the precious paintings, some of which survive on the walls of Manichaean monasteries, and also on silk, leather and paper materials found in historical sites in the oasis of Turfan in China.

In the fourth chapter, the role of a significant Manichaean deity, the Beloved of the Lights, in the Process of Cosmogony is discussed through a comparative study of Middle Persian, Parthian, Syriac, Coptic, Arabic and Farsi texts showing the deity as the first direct emanation of the Second Creation.

In the fifth chapter, Manichaean gods and goddesses mentioned in a unique classical Arabic treatise are discussed. The treatise, Kitāb al-Radd-i 'al'al-Zandīq al-La'īn Ibn-i Muqaffa'(The Book of Refutation against the Damned Zandīq Ibn-i Muqaffa') was composed by Qāsim Ibn-i Ibrāhīm (d. 246AH / 848AD). The references to seven Manichaean deities are faced with their specific functions. Different functions and characteristics of the deities are surveyed and analysed through a study of the original Manichaean texts, which leads us to find some new specifications.

In the final chapter, Rūmī's prologue to the Mathnawī (the poet's masterpiece of the world of mysticism) and its Gnostic roots in some surviving pieces of Middle Persian, Parthian and Coptic sources, especially hymns and prayers, as well as Manichaean psalms, the scope of a comparative study in which the motifs of pre-Islamic Gnostic hymns are analysed. In addition, the themes have been compared with the main content of the prologue to the Mathnawī, which leads us to find some common features between Gnostic-mystical motifs of early Christianity and the Muslim mystical literary works. At the end, this sheds a new light on the continuity of the Gnostic-mystical tradition in the broad realm of Christianity, Manichaeism and Islam.

Here, I must offer many thanks to Professor Werner Sundermann, of the German Academy of Human Sciences in Berlin, for his valuable suggestions.

I acknowledge also my debt to Dr. Jason Beduhn, Professor of Manichaean Studies at North Arizona University, who patiently and kindly edited the manuscript of the first three chapters. I am very grateful for his subtle suggestions and corrections.

I am grateful to my dear colleague, Dr. Hassan Rezā'ī Bāghbīdī, of Tehran University, who kindly edited parts of the manuscript of this book and suggested valuable corrections. I should also thank Dr. Ismā'īl Salāmī, of the Iranian Center for Cultural and International Studies, who translated Chapter VI of the work from Persian version into fluent English, which was published in An Anthology of Iranian Studies (vol. 4, Tehran: Center for Cultural and International Studies, 2000). It was also revised by the author.

Finally, I thank Paula K. Roberts, Assistant Director of the Center for East Asian Studies, University of Pennsylvania, for her careful editing. I also thank my colleagues at Shanghai International Studies University (SISU) for their suggestions

Manichaean Gnosis:
An Introduction to Its Iranian Cultural, Artistic and Literary Reflections

The rise of Manichaeism in the 3rd century AD has had multiple and widespread representations and reflections in human culture. Its effects can be seen in religious, social, cultural, artistic and literary aspects of human life. The most important and durable representation of Manichaeism is its gnostic aspect, which influenced Persian mysticism after Islam and is still alive as a mystic viewpoint. Manichaeism changed into a widespread religion from the 3rd to the 9th centuries AD. It dominated a vast geographical area that extended from China in the east and to Byzantium and the Roman Empire in the west. Then it continued its religious life as dispersed and transformed sects in Iran, Mesopotamia and some other parts of the world. However, what survives now from Manichaean religious institutions is not notable. Its significance, of course, rests on its later gnostic, cultural and literary influences. Here, after an introduction to Manichaean gnosis, we survey only its Iranian cultural, artistic and literary reflections.

Manichaean Gnosis

The most important feature of Manichaean religion is the idea of gnostic redemption. Thus, its gnostic aspect bears a specific significance. Contrary to Marcion, who said that redemption is feasible only through faith and divine grace, Mani believed that gnosis and the waking up of the material forgetfulness are the factors of redemption. So, Mani thought of a complex and deep cosmogony which, although affected by mythology, had a marvelous structure and relied on astronomy to some extent.

Manichaeism was deeply a gnostic doctrine. Mani preferred wisdom, knowledge or gnosis to faith and tradition, as we see in one of his writings, which has survived in a Middle Persian fragment (M 49 II):

> Now Self (Narjamīg 'Twin') goes with me (is with me), bears and guards me, with his force I strive with Āz (the Greed Demon) and Ahreman (the Devil), and I teach the people wisdom and knowledge, and I release them from Āz and Ahreman. And I accepted this thing (matter) of gods, wisdom and the knowledge of Ruwānčīnīh (gathering the souls), which was from Narjamīg (Twin)...[1]

In addition, Mani always emphasized wisdom, books, knowledge and allegories in his books and preachings. However, the wisdom which Mani suggested was based on revelation and illumination.

Mani himself was a member of the Mughtasila ('the Baptizers') sect in his youth. His gnostic adept was al-Khasīḥ ('Alkasai or Alchsaius'). One of the problems which caused Mani to separate himself from the sect was that he opposed baptizing the body and taking part in daily baptism. He believed that the true baptism is possible only through gnosis and knowledge. In other words, he suggested spiritual baptism and preferred it to the baptism of the body. He said:

> The purity spoken of [by Jesus] is therefore purity through gnosis. It consists of the separation of light from darkness, of life from death, of living water from the congealed.[1]

The 'living water' that is frequently mentioned in Manichaean writings is the spiritual water which causes the purification of human spirit and soul. The use of this term is metaphorical, a gnostic metaphor for the purification of the imprisoned soul and light.

The Middle Persian term zīndag ('living') is a relevant word in Manichaean texts denoting light-giver to all who attain the 'fruit of gnosis.' Mani also called his religion dyn 'yg zyndg ('living religion') and his Gospel bore the title of `wnglywn zyndg (the Living Gospel). Manichaeans have also called their prophet zyndkkr ('reviver'), because man will be gnostic and knowledgeable through His 'living word'.

Therefore, Manichaean gnosis was, on the one hand, wakeful and illuminating. It was a kind of gnosis that informed man of his true and righteous origin. For, in the Manichaean view, human beings are imprisoned in a world where light is mingled with darkness, and they should release themselves from darkness. The first covenant of this redemption is gnosis, that is, the consciousness of oneself and of the Father of Greatness (Mp. pyd 'y wzwrgyh / zwrw'n) or the God of Light, a transcendental deity who lives beyond this material cosmos, with whom mankind shares the same essence. Of course, only some light-filled and spiritual particles of his being, which are imprisoned in the 'jail of body', share the same essence as the deity. This imprisoned or banished essence, which is illustrated as a light-particle, is to be released through man's efforts to reach the gate of gnosis.

In Manichaean gnosis, there is not a word on the descent of spirit (pneuma) as the Gnostics of the second and the third century described it, but it shows the world as divided into two separate realms of light and darkness. Spirit itself is originally separated from Matter. Only the envy of the Devil and demons caused them to attack the World of Light. In this way, some light-particles were imprisoned by the demons; then the so-called period of 'mingling of light and darkness' began.

According to Manichaean cosmology, man was born out of this 'mingling period'. The human body is demonic but the human spirit is transcendental and celestial. Man should release this imprisoned soul in order to be redeemed. Otherwise, he would be reborn and would live in agony.

The longing for the Paradise of Light (Mp. whyšt'w rwšn) is one of the important themes of Manichaean gnosis. The only wish of the offended, alienated and miserable man in the material world is redemption, then joining the transcendental world, and standing in front of the Father of Greatness who is the supreme and unknown god of the Manichaean pantheon, a deity without any homogeneity with this material world. He lives in the transcendental kingdom, and he will meet the purified and redeemed souls and lights only at the end of the world. All released particles of light which have passed through the Moon to the Sun, and from the Sun to the New Paradise (Mp. whyšt 'y nwg)[1] - a temporary paradise until the end of the world - will join in the Paradise of Light. Then, the world becomes absolute light; darkness will be vanquished and the Devil will be imprisoned in a deep pit.

The redeeming process of Manichaean gnosis is different from the process explained in the other Gnostic schools. In Mani's view, redemption will be possible through a complicated process. This process will take a mythical form because Manichaean gnosis is knotted with the world of myths and is inseparable from it. Hence, to describe the quality of redemption and soul salvation, we have to draw upon a mythical commentary that is presented in the next chapter. Understanding Manichaean gnosis requires a vast awareness of Manichaean mythology. Mani himself had a mythological analysis of the world and the whole galaxy. Unlike other significant gnostics of early Christianity who had analytical and philosophical minds, he was chiefly fascinated by myth and art. Even when he spoke of cosmogony and the creation process and wanted to present an astrological justification, he sometimes mixed astrological beliefs with mythological concepts of stars and planets. In addition, Mani transferred a deep Gnostic belief into an institutional religion that, indeed, lasted for centuries, but in the end it could not survive as such and was restored once again to the form of a Gnostic school.

One of the significant motifs in Manichaeism is the bondage of the Primordial Man (Mp. `whrmyzdby). He descends from the Realm of Light to participate in the battle against the Prince of Darkness at the border of Light and Darkness, because he has the responsibility of keeping the supreme Paradise in peace. The character and function of redemption and watching over the supreme Paradise for which he is responsible show the significance that Mani and other Manichaean gnostics assume for man. The Primordial Man is the symbol of the celestial perfect man, a concept that can be seen in the mysticism of the later periods. He is defeated in his combat and is imprisoned by the demons. Is not his defeat a symbol of man's jihād ('holy war') against concupiscence, sometimes symbolizing human defeat in a difficult passage? Manichaean gnostics have regarded the bondage of Primordial Man as a symbol of the human soul imprisoned in the material world. They said that human salvation at the hand of the Redeemer in itself signifies the salvation and the release of the soul imprisoned in the body.

On the other hand, as the Primordial Man fell unconscious into the depth of darkness, and neither heard nor saw anything, which the Manichaean gnostics interpreted as the forgetfulness, blindness and deafness of man in the material world. The forgotten blind and deaf man, in their view, has fallen into the depth of darkness or into this earthly inferior world, and there is no hope for his salvation. Thus, a large number of prayers, hymns and poems composed by Manichaean gnostics, as well as gnostics of other schools, describe the human sorrow of alienation, forgetfulness and bewilderment.

The Five Elements (Mp. 'mhrspnd'n), Five Sons of the Primordial Man who also took part at the battle against the powers of darkness, are swallowed and imprisoned by the demons. Although a deity of light is defeated at the first combat of Light and Darkness, this event permits the Paradise of Light to be secured from the aggression of the Devil (Mp. 'hrmyn) and the Demons (Mp. dyw'n). In fact, the Five Sons of Light are sacrificed in order that the supreme Realm of Light will not be the battlefield of the demons. In addition, the Five Sons of Light are of the same essence as the Living Spirit (Mp. myhr yzd) who plays a significant role in the creation process. The human soul is made up of the light-particles of these deities. Therefore, man, in spite of his demonic and evil body, has a precious essence imprisoned in him. His apprehension should be the release of this essence. This essence has been compared to a pearl by Manichaeans and other gnostics. It is strikingly similar to the idea presented by Hāfiz, the great Iranian poet, about ten centuries later:

> The pearl that was out of the oyster of the abode of time and space (universe)

It was sought of by the lost beings of the coastline[1]

The essence or pearl is the same light-particle that, in the Manichaean gnostic view, is imprisoned in the oyster-body of man, while it does not belong to the 'oyster of the universe'. The bondage of this essence is not the sign of defeat, but a gnostic symbol and allegory of the spiritually devoted life. It is the sweet final salvation that makes man suffer the anguish of his dark and material body in order to be released from bondage and to find eternal salvation. This immortal salvation is better than the agony of 'suffering the body's load', as Khayyām says:

> No longer can I live without the pure wine
> I cannot suffer the body's load without drinking wine![2]

Thus, the agonized soul finally will be saved. His salvation is at the hand of a powerful and light-embodied deity, the Living Spirit. Although he begins the process of redemption, and organizes some of the light from the first conflict, the bulk of imprisoned light remains to be redeemed by later divine activity. However, he is the symbol of salvation of the jailed Primordial Man, and the creator and arranger of the cosmos with ten firmaments and eight earths; he is also the suppressor of the realm of the demons and the destroyer of the savages and their rebellion.

The salvation of the imprisoned soul is considered one of the fundamental motifs of Manichaean gnosis, such that "the release of the Primordial Man from the bondage of hell" (Mp. t'r zmyg 'the Land of Darkness') in the Manichaean view enjoyed the same significance as Christ's ascension in Christianity. To Manichaeans, the release of the Primordial Man was not considered a fact related to the past, but as a symbolic and eternal example; it was also the guarantor of heavenly salvation of all people and, in the eyes of the believers, an indisputable fact, because the agony and the final salvation of the Primordial Man was considered an example of human destiny."[1]

The mythological commentary of the imprisonment of the soul and its salvation in Manichaeism is that gnosis or the mystery of the truth is not explicable through logical and deductive methods. The deciphering of the mystery is possible, however, through meditation, revelation and an intuition resulting from illumination. Although Mani emphasizes 'wisdom, reason and reasoning', his 'wisdom' is illuminative and revelatory. So, in his point of view, myth has also a fundamental role in explaining the truth, because myth has also a symbolic, mysterious and illuminative expression. Gnostic truths are more explicable through symbols and parables. Parables have a significant role in Manichaean and other religious works.[2]

Achieving immortal life and victory is due to receiving gnosis and the 'living words', i.e. deciphering the myths and the mysteries of gnosis, the mysteries that Mani has deciphered in his Living Gospel. In one of his treatises, Epistula Fundamenti (Mp. frwrdg 'y dw bwn), we read:

> Mani, Apôtre de Jesus-Christ, par la Providence de Dieu le Père. Voici les Paroles du Salut, venant de la Source Eternelle et Vivante: celui qui les écoutera, qui les croira d'abord et ensuite conservera ce qu'elles auront mais au profound de luimême, celui-là ne sera jamais sujet à la mort, amis au contraire, il jouira de la Vie éternelle de Gloire. > bien heureux celui qui sera initié à la connaissance divine, puisque, libéré par elle, il sera établi dans la Vie sans fin.[1]

In the Manichaean view, as much as the soul is transcendent, divine and pure in its essence, the body is corrupted, demonic, abject and dirty. One of the most essential duties of a Manichaean believer is mortification and abjection of the body. A Manichaean Elect (Mp. wycydg) makes the body abject body by following stringent rules, so that he should eat a meal only once a day, a vegetarian meal that is supplied by the Hearers (Mp. nywš'g'n). He should put on just a single garment during a year. He must not kill or torture a beast, not break a branch of a plant. He is not permitted to possess anything, and he must fast many days during the year. All these rigidities are so that he will abstain from the material world. Manichaean elects must even refrain from marriage, because they thought that reproduction caused more light-particles to be imprisoned in the bodies of the offspring. However, free relationships were seen among Manichaean men and women. We know through Manichaean scriptures and some artworks that there were ladies who tended to Manichaeism and were considered as members of the Manichaean distinguished classes.[2]

To be redeemed from the hell of the body, one should be knowledgeable and wakened by the redeeming deities. One of the most important redeeming gods is Jesus, who has three unique characteristics as follows:

1) Jesus the Splendour (Mp. yyšw' zyw'(h) / xrdyšhryzd), who is one of the significant redeeming deities in the Manichaean pantheon. He is a celestial god who is evoked at the third and final phase of creation. He presents 'gnosis' to Adam (Mp. ghymwrd) and awakens him from the 'sleep of death'. Adam wakes up and knows his savior. Through him, he sees the celestial god and heavenly Father. He also sees "his own Self cast into the teeth of panthers and elephants, being devoured by them – what a devouring! - consumed by them, eaten by the dogs, mingled and bound in everything and finally, imprisoned in the stench of darkness. He raised him up and made him eat of the Tree of Life. Then, Adam cried and lamented: smote his breast, and spoke: 'woe, woe unto the shaper of my body, unto those who fettered my soul, and unto the rebels that enslaved me!'"[1] Jesus the Splendour, according to Manichaean gnosis, is the source of all human revelations. He has the function of providing consciousness and of awakening the seekers of the true path who slumber in this earthly world.

2) The Suffering Jesus (Lt. Jesus Patibilis). The name used in Western Manichaean writings for the Living Self (Mp. gryw zyndg, i.e. the sum of the light suffering in matter), crucified as Jesus was crucified on the cross. The Suffering Jesus has a divine representation and is considered a Manichaean deity. He is also as the light-particle imprisoned in the body.
3) Jesus the Messiah (Mp. yyšw' mšyh'). Prophet and Son of God, who had taken on the appearance of man and according to the Christians, had been crucified due to man's sins. Mani himself had opposed the idea of real incarnation and crucifixion of Jesus Christ. He believed in His spiritual crucifixion, i.e. Messiah's ascension to heaven, as the later Islamic view confirms too.

These three conceptions of Jesus are not always kept wholly distinct. Mani knew himself as Paraclete and the first successor of [1] Theodore bar Konai, quoted from: H. Jonas, The Gnostic Religion (Boston, 2nd edn., 3rd pri., 1970), pp. 86-87.

Jesus Christ, and held high regard for the Buddha and Zoroaster. He clearly had full knowledge of Christ and, to some extent, of the two other prophets.

What Jesus the Splendour taught man is: the theme of three periods of Before, Middle, and After. In the Primordial Period, i.e. the golden era of separation of light and darkness, the cosmos is completely light-filled. The deities and spiritual particles are in the Paradise of Light in absolute peace. The Middle Period is the mingled era of light and darkness, a period that human beings live in and during which the heavenly light-particles are still imprisoned in this world. The Final Period is the Resurrection Day when the imprisoned particles of light will be released and will ascend up to heaven, and Darkness will be defeated. All the impurities will be burnt in a great conflagration, and finally the world will be light-filled and heavenly again.

With this knowledge, the seeker reaches the 'fruit of gnosis'. This is by itself a kind of rebirth, a new life in the Realm of Light and Truth.

In one of his Epistles, Mani writes on the redemption of soul and the divine origin of man:

> Mani, Apôtre de Jésus Christ, à sa fille Menoch: sur toi la Grâce et le Salut de notre Dieu, Lui qui assurément est le vrai Dieu. Qu'il illumines lui-même ton âme et qu'il te révèle sa Justice, car tu es le fruit de la Race divine....Tu es rendue à ta splendeur quand tu reconnais ce que tu as d'bord ètè, comment tu es émanée de ce genre d'âmes répandues dans tous les corps, dans la saveur des choses, attachées aux diverses espéces d'êtres. Arrache enfin la Racine souche maudite et alors, à l'instant, tu pourras te contempler toi-même, toute spirituelle.[1]

The Manichaean gnostic and disciple's final wish is: reaching the Paradise of Light and standing in front of the Father of Greatness in the World of Transcendence, in the garment of light, and becoming absolute light. The wish for a merely spiritual and lightful world, the longing for becoming god-like, without any kind of evilness, blurring or darkness are among the purest intentions of a Manichaean disciple. He will get his wish on the Resurrection Day, a day when the multiple firmaments and earths will be cast down, and a great conflagration will burn all the evils and dark-particles. The last light-particles will be refined and will join the New Paradise. Then, the New Paradise will attach to the Paradise of Light or the Paradise of Transcendence. All things will become absolute light. There will be nothing except light.

Cultural Reflections

The cultural origin of Manichaeism was first in Babylonia and Mesopotamia. Mani, although of an Iranian monarchy family, was nurtured in the Gnostic society of Babylonia. However, Manichaeism and its religious-gnostic ideas, when they reached the territory of Persia, naturally took on a Persian tincture. This can be clearly seen through the terms and the nomenclature of Manichaean deities such as Zurwān, Ohrmizdbay, Mihr Yazd, etc.[1] One can see Iranian cultural influence on Manichaeism through its original themes and motifs and also through the functions of the deities. Zoroastrian dualistic doctrine and its impact on the Manichaean approach are undeniable. The specific functions of deities such as Zurwān and Mihr Yazd and their reflections on [1] But these names are found only in the Middle Iranian translations of Mani's works, and the literature that developed among his Iranian followers. The original names and terms were Syriac, not Iranian, and did not include any of these Iranian deity names. Additionally, Mani himself made the first efforts at applying such names to the Manichaean pantheon in his Šābuhragān. Here I thank Dr. Jason Beduhn for his note on Iranian deities' names.

Manichaeism are noticeable as well. In other words, the characteristics and functions of Zoroastrian deities match those of the Manichaean deities that were given their names. For instance, Zurwān, according to Iranian and Armenian source materials, is a God of Time with an unlimited realm who is the origin of Ohrmazd and Ahriman, twin gods of Good and Evil. In this way, Ohrmizdbay of Manichaean cosmogony is comparable with Zoroastrian Ohrmazd. The former is the symbol of forgetfulness and gaining knowledge to be redeemed, and he is the first deity to fight with Ahriman, while the latter is the Lord of knowledge and wisdom and is in conflict with Ahriman too.

On the other hand, Mihr Yazd of Manichaean cosmogony is comparable to Iranian Avestan Mithra to some extent. The former is the savior of Ohrmizdbay and together with his Five Sons fights with demonic powers, while one main function of the latter is also fighting with evil power, and we can see the Avestic vərəθraγna (Varahrān or Bahrām), god of war, among his companions.[1]

We also see Manichaean cultural representation in Iran during the first centuries of the Islamic period. Although Manichaean religious practice could not be as effective in Iranian religious life during the Islamic era, it had a deep affect in the cultural dimension. Mani himself was an expert intellectual and artist who had an undeniable and durable influence on Iranian culture through writing gnostic works, as well as through his paintings, calligraphy and tadhīb ('book-gilding').

The negation of earthly life and the rejection of body and materiality in the Manichaean gnostic attitude have much in common with the ascetic themes, piety and rejection of self and sensuality in the Islamic attitude – especially in its Sufistic and mystical approaches. This attitude, in spite of the belief regarding

[1] Cf. I. Gershewitch, An Avestan Hymn to Mithra (Cambridge, Mass. 1954), pp. 28ff.

Manichaeism as a religion with pessimistic views, is not so pessimist as it appears at the first glance. The object of the rejection of the world and worldly inferiorities, in the Manichaean viewpoint, is to reach a deeper and more aesthetic world, and it is originally an optimistic attitude. Longing for a pure and absolute intellectual life is a wish not unshared with the prophets, mystics and significant intellectuals of every period.

Gnosticism has vast, multiple, and even universal aspects. Some scholars regard it as a universal religion that once influenced both the western and eastern world,[1] and even now it can be a response to some ideological and cultural quests at the dawn of the third millennium.

Manichaeism was also a widespread universal religion in specific periods. It was influential in Iran, Central Asia, India and China as well as in Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Byzantium, Rome and even Africa in the west. One of the characteristics of the religion was that wherever it reached, at once it accepted the local religious features and absorbed its cultural elements. This influence was, of course, mutual, i.e. in addition to the absorption of cultural motifs and themes, Manichaean themes themselves also affected the culture and art of that region. Manichaean intellectuals and mystics in addition to mutual religious-cultural influences were the best specimens of dialogue among civilizations.

Gnostic religion has been regarded as a universal phenomenon because it was based on personal specific experience and says that the discovery of truth is possible only through illuminative and apocalyptic wisdom, a religious experience which does not belong to a special theology or philosophy, but which designates a free-thinking gnosis and attitude. All the gnostics agree that the world is not perfect. Nobody has reached the final redemption through

[1] Of these scholars, Hans Jonas should be noted. See his Gnostic Religion (Boston 1970).

'worldly affairs'. Hafiz of Shiraz also explained the theme with a sigh:

> The world and worldly affairs are nonsense
> One thousand times have I sought for.[1]

In the view of Hafiz, the nothingness of world affairs is not pessimistic at all but it is essentially longing for a heavenly, transcendental and spiritual world. Therefore, this is the right sort of deep optimism in the world of ideology. Manichaean gnosis also does not reject the world through considering 'the world and worldly affairs' as evil, but it wishes a heavenly, splendid and intellectual universe. Since one cannot reach it in this material world, it should be sought in the heavens, where gods, deities and angels live in a halo of absolute light, which is the right dwelling of the transcendent and gnostic man.

This gnostic belief is seen in the essence of most religions and sects. It has been represented as Cabbalistic mysticism in Judaism; as gnostic faiths and schools in Christianity; as seeing the world afflicted, the bondage of the chain of rebirth, the release of this causal circle or Saṃsāra, and reaching Nirvāna in Buddhism; as gnostic sects and schools, and Islamic mystic sects such as Zanādiqa, Ismā`īlīyya and Shi'ite Gholāt, etc., which we will discuss later.

Eastern Europe was a refuge of the gnostics and heretics of the Medieval Ages. During the fourth and the fifth centuries, Armenia was a region secure from church cruelties for gnostics such as the followers of Marcion and Mani.[2]

Shi'ite Gholāt established different extremist sects who believed "one of Ali's offspring has been gifted with divinity. For a long time after his death, they were waiting for his resurrection such as with Jesus. Today, their last remnants are the Syrian Nuṣairīyya or the Alavians. The treatise of the Umm'al-Kitāb, composed at the end of the 2nd century AH / 8th century AD, belongs to the 'Gholāt of Kūfa'. It consists of an apocalypse with vivid gnostic motifs"[1]

In mystical exegeses of the first centuries after Islam, the term N*ūr al-Azalīyya'* (the Eternal Light) has been frequently discussed. For instance, in an exegesis ascribed to Imām Ja`far Ṣādiq, the interpretation of 'Nūn wa'l-Qalam' we read:

> Nūn, huwa nūr al-azalīyya, al-ladhī ikhtara`a min al-akwān kulluhā faj`al dhālik li- Muḥammad ṣa'l-Allāhu 'alayh
>
> "He is the eternal light of which all the beings are originated. So, it was established for Muhammad, Peace Be upon Him."[2]

It is obvious that the 'Eternal Light' is a key figure in Manichaean and Mandaean gnosis. The Realm of Light or Light Paradise is the final redemption. The Eternal Light, in Islamic mystical exegeses, has a fundamental theme that is occasionally mentioned as 'Nūr-i Muḥammadīyya' (Muhammadan Light). Also in Manichaeism, the Father of Greatness radiates his eternal light and creates divinities such as the Primordial Man who evokes Five Light-Sons.

Cultural reflection of Gnosticism in Iran and the Islamic world began at the end of the third century AD after Mani's death. Manichaeans did not withstand the affliction and execution brought by Zoroastrian fanatic clergymen during Bahrām and Shābūhr II reigns and fled to Transoxiana. In the 6th century AD, the eastern branch of Manichaeism led by Mār Šād Ōhrmizd was established, a sect which was known as Dēnāwarīyya. In the 5th century AD, the religion of Mazdak built upon the Manichaean dualism of light and darkness and transformed it into a vast social, religious and cultural movement in Sassanian Iran. Even before Mazdak, a person named Bundos – who was undoubtedly related to a Gnostic sect – arose and spoke of the conflict of the realms of light and darkness, thought of a social reformation and promised a classless society. Later, in the Islamic period, Abū Muslim of Khurāsān was also accused of having esoteric thoughts. The social and historical consequences of Gnosticism are much more extensive. However, historical background is not the aim of this chapter.

Ismāīlī gnosis and one of its significant branches, 'Zanādiqa', in the third century AD were founded by Abdullāh Khūzī. Later the Fatimīd and the Qirmatīs also sprouted as branches of the Ismāīlī Zandīqs. In the 5th century AH /11th AD a sect called Drūziyya 'the Diruzīs' (or better Iranian pronounced 'Darzīyān' = the sewers) originated from them, a sect whose followers are still living in Syria, Lebanon and Palestine. In the 6th century AH /12th AD the sect of 'Malaḥida', a branch of Ismāīlī Qirmatīs appeared. All these sects had Gnostic ideas. One of the oldest works of the Ismāīlītes, 'Kitāb al-Kashf' (the Book of Revelation) is about creation and cosmology. It describes a kind of mythology with Gnostic-Manichaean features.[1]

Gnostic myths were very likely transmitted to the 'Gholāt of Shī'ite' and the Ismāīlītes via 'the Mawālī' of Iran, a group who converted to Islam during the reign of Banī `Umayya 'the Umayyīd. They preserved original Iranian customs and traditions. Henceforth, the Islamic world was directly influenced by Manichaeism and gnostic ideas. These ideas by themselves had cultural reflections as well.[1]

Abū 'Isā Warrāq, Ibn-i Rāvandī, Bashshār ibn-i Burd, Isḥāq ibn-i Khalaf and Ibn-i Sīyābe, most Bamakīds, the most significant of them Faḍl ibn-i Barmakī, were among the Manichaean Zandīqs of Islamic era to whom Ibn-i Nadīm clearly referred in his al-Fihrist.[2] Of course, it is noticeable that the Zanādiqa were not exactly Manichaeans, but their esoteric thoughts had Manichaean-Mazdakī features, and they hid their pan-Iranistic and nationalistic attitudes behind them. Being Zandīq meant by itself opposition to the predominant political system and government.

Such a judgement can be true also of Ismāīlī gnosis. Henry Corbin, who has comprehensively researched Ismāīlī gnosis, believes that "Shī'īte gnosis in general, and Ismāīlī gnosis in particular, cannot be conceived simply as a continuation of ancient gnosis. It follows a path that is purely its own, eliminating some themes while it assimilates and transforms other perfectly recognizable ones".[3]

Therefore, we cannot deny the presence of old gnosis and mysticism in Iranian culture, but its quality and functions should be considered. Iranian Gnosticism is related with the intellectual elects. It is not a school of thought for the masses. Old mystics called it 'ilm al-bātin 'esoteric science' and elm al-yaqīn 'science of truth' that are for redemption of the soul. Spiritual birth 'wilāda rūḥānīyya' is possible in the world of exegesis 'ta'wīl', while bodily birth 'wilāda jismānīyya' takes place in the world of revelation 'tanzīl' from heaven. 'Tanzīl' in Corbin's words, "is a figurative shape and 'Ta'wīl' is a spiritual exegesis. They are two opposed poles. Etymologically 'Ta'wīl' means 'to bring back or lead back to', i.e., to bring literal forms 'ẓāhir, sharī`a (appearance, Law) back to the plane of spiritual Truth 'ḥaqīqa'. By this exegesis, Ismāīlism transforms the literal forms of Koranic Revelation in the same way that the gnosis of antiquity worked with the given forms of Christianity: it performs a transformation of all these forms, events, and persons into symbols. In so doing, it realizes a transmutation of the soul, its resurrection ('qīyāma') – and thereby bears the fundamental feature that relates it to the other forms of gnosis."[1]

The oldest gnostic treatise of the Islamic period, Umm'al-Kitāb 'the Mother-Book') was composed in the 2nd century AH / 8th century AD. The author, 'Abu'l Khaṭṭāb', was one of Imām Ja`far Ṣādiq's devoted disciples. Later, the Ismāīlītes knew themselves as the spiritual offspring of the same Abu'l Khaṭṭāb, regarding him as loyal to His Majesty Ismā`īl', the son of Imām Ja`far Ṣādiq.

There are some Gnostic motifs, but with different specifications, that can be seen in the religious-mystical works of Islamic period. How they are reflected in the source materials depends on different mystical schools. Gnosticism expressed in the Umm'al-Kitāb is different from the doctrine described through Ismāīlī works of the Fatimīd period. For instance, the structure of paradise and the celestial essence described in the works of Nāṣir Khusrow is different from the parallel view in Ḥamīd al-Dīn Kirmānī's works.

Proto-Ismāīlītes emphasized the case of individual redemption and knew their school as the religion of resurrection 'dīn-i qīyāma', i.e. the resurrection and release of the soul from the material body. This influenced all Iranian Sufistic attitudes. Even the 'mystical secret' ('sirr-i 'irfānī') ascribed to Shams-i Tabrīzī, recorded in the Walad-Nāmeh composed by Sultān-i Walad, the son of Jalāl al-Dīn Rūmī, has its exact equivalence in the commentary on the Khuṭbat

[1] Ibid.

al-Bayān ('Sermon of Expression') which Ismāīlī tradition has attributed to Ḥassan Ṣabbāḥ[1]

On the other hand, Ismālī 'ḥikma' (philosophy) contains Islamic gnosis. It is a kind of gnosis that, in the view of Ismāīlī 'ḥukamā' (philosophers), should present spiritual redemption, and it is possible through illumination and epiphany of the soul. The soul's redemption has common points with the Ḥikmat al-Ishrāq (the philosophy of Illumination) of Suhrawardī and the Ḥikma (philosophy) of Ibn-i Arabi.

The theory of ''uqūl' (intelligences) or 'malā'ika' (angels) of Avecinna is substituted for "a succession of syzygies that correspond to the structure of the major Gnostic systems. From each Intelligence (`ql), Nous, or Cherub 'karrūb' there proceeds a soul (nafs) that forms a couple with it.... The name of the first of these Cherubs, Wajh al-Quds ('the Holy Face') corresponds to that of the first hypostasis (the Monogenes) in the Excerpta of Theodotus: the 'Face of the Father'. The Taṣawwurāt ('Concepts') of Nāṣir al-Dīn-i Ṭūsi preserves the same schema, although there it is complicated by the fact that not only the Intelligence, but also the Soul produces acts of contemplation that gives rise to being."[2]

The classes of Ismāīlī 'ukhuwwa' ('brethren') and human characters have spiritual and celestial aspects. For instance, Nāṭiq or the 'Enunciating' is the Prophet ('Nabī') or the First Nous (`Aql-i Awwal') and his spiritual successor or Waṣī ('heir'), that establishes the foundation of Imāmat (leadership), is the Second Nous (`ql-i thānī). Henry Corbin believes that the idea that "an earthly person may represent or typify a heavenly hypostasis also occurs in Medieval Latin Gnosticism."[3]

The second Nous can be conceived as the world spirit that, with the First Nous, makes the eternal couple, or Intelligence and Soul.

[1] Cf. Ibid., p. 156.
[2] Ibid., pp. 156-157.
[3] Ibid., p. 157.

The First Nous is Nāṭiq ('Ennunciating') and the Second is Ṣāmit ('Acute'). So, the Soul is not completely perfect and there is the possibility of fall in it.

Seyyed Aḥmad 'Alavī, one of the significant disciples of Mīr Dāmād (11th century AH / 17th century AD), found a relationship between old Iranian Zurvanism and this notion that "with the unfolding of the First Intelligence there emerges a shadowy dimension (its aspect of non-being, inasmuch as its being is not necessary in itself), a shadow that goes on growing and intensifying until the tenth and last Intelligence (`ql-i 'āshir). To be sure, this comparison does involve a profound modification of Zurvanism, by delaying somewhat the moment at which the Zurvanite schema makes its appearance (since Zurwān here becomes an angel in the Pleroma, rather than the absolute godhead). Moreover, this is the same transposition that one also finds in the cosmic dramaturgy of Ismāīlism, and the shift had already taken place in the doctrine of the Zurvanites (Zurvaniyya) and the Gayōmartians (Kiumarthiyya), as that was described by Shahristānī. This transposition must be listed among those characteristics differentiating Ismāīlī gnosis from dualism in general. Here the crisis that gives birth to Darkness is conceived as situated within the Pleroma – but only so that Darkness may be overcome and banished from it, as soon as it has emerged. That is why the Intelligence who will assume the role of the Demiurge in Ismāīlī gnosis has none of the disquieting traits of an Ialdabaoth, any more than the Angels governing the celestial spheres resemble hostile Archons. On the contrary, the notion of angelic tarbīya or pedagogy (already indicated in the Mi'rāj-Nāma or the Book of Ascension attributed to Avecinna) shows the angels ready to come to the aid of the gnostic in order to help him to 'escape', to return 'home' and carry out his mystical mir'āj. Instead, the demonic force is on the earth, where it manifests itself in the implacable battle carried on by the opponents of Imām."[1]

The Tenth Nous, or the "active intelligence of philosophers, is seen in Ismāīlism. In the mystical traditions of Avecinna and Suhrawardī, the personal relationship of this Nous with a mystic and the role of his celestial pedagogy are decisive. The Tenth Nous is the end of a pilgrimage that is described in the Treatise of Ghurbat al-Gharbīyya in which some famous themes of Manichaean gnosis can be found: "the young man thrown into the bottom of a well, the Stranger who is reawakened to the awareness of his Self by a letter sent to him by his heavenly family, the stages of the pilgrimage of return, etc."[2]

One of the angels or the previously mentioned 'uqūls (Intelligences), in philosophers' words, is Jibrā'īl, the revelation angel, or the same 'Rūḥ al-Qudus' ('the Holy Spirit') in Suhrawardī's words. He was called a human deity. This 'ql in Ismaili religion, called 'Ādam-i Rūḥānīyya' ('the Spiritual Man') is the same Anthropos or the celebrated Primordial Man in different Gnostic schools. According to the philosophers' cosmogony, he descends from the third stage to the tenth stage of the angels and is the origin of sacred and mythical history. This spiritual man is the same celestial Messiah who has earthly representation.[3]

Abū Ḥatim Rāzī in 'Ālam al-Nubuwwa ('The World of Prophecy') and Abū Ya'qūb Sejestānī in Ithbāt al-Nubuwwāt 'The Proof of Prophecies') have presented different gnostic commentaries of the Gospels, especially the Gospel of Matthew.

They have understood them as the early gnostics of the 2nd and 3rd centuries AD.

Ibn-i Nadīm asserts in his al-Fihrist that the Dayṣānīyya, the followers of Bardesan, were scattered throughout Khurāsān and China. Bardesan was one of the gnostics before Mani, who disputed with him only in the quality of amalgamation of light and darkness. The Dayṣānīyya themselves were divided into two sects. One believed that light mixed with darkness voluntarily to refine it, but could not do it; the other sect believed that as soon as light felt the cruelty and stench of darkness, it wished to separate from it, and disputed with it involuntarily.[1]

It is obvious that the Daiṣānīyya were active in the 2nd century AD too. "A fervent disciple of Imām Ja`far Sādiq," as Corbin says, "was a family friend of the Barmecids Hishām ibn al-Ḥakam, in contact with all sorts of non-Muslim elements (Bardesanian Gnostics, Manichaeans, Nestorians and Jews). He was one of the first Shi'ite theologians and a supporter of the nascent Imamology. A good number of Shi'ite traditions refer to his authority. That someone so representative of the Shi'ite milieu could have had such connections and could even have served as an intermediary between them and the Imām should give some indication of the ways in which gnostic ideas and influences were able to penetrate both Shi'ism and Sufism."[2]

The influential paths of Gnostic thought, especially in its mystic dimension, have been spread in Iranian-Islamic culture in general, and in Iranian mysticism in particular. So, the analysis of all its cultural influences and reflections needs comprehensive research. However, we cannot deal with all aspects of Iranian Gnosticism here.[3]

Artistic Reflection

Gnostic–Manichaean myths and doctrines have undoubtedly influenced Manichaean art. Originally, the religious-mystical representation of art is one of the significant and vast dimensions of human culture that has been reflected most aesthetically in Manichaeism, especially in the shape of the visual arts. In fact, the relationship of art and mythology has shown its transcendental shape in Manichaean gnosis. Art and myth have been knotted here in an inseparable way. Mani himself was among the artists who tended to painting, calligraphy and nibēgān-nigārīh (a special term of Manichaeans for tadhhīb or the art of book painting, gilding and decorating) in order to promote and preserve his religion. Manichaean art was not really intellectualistic but was at the service of the doctrine and religion.

Mani's innovation in his religious-mystical attitude was also represented in his art. It created a new artistic characteristic which is worthy of investigation. The prophet had a volume of illustrations, known as the Ārdahang (Cop. Eikon) that illustrated the most important motifs of his teachings. This painting book was even known as 'the Great Men-ho-i' (Drawing) in China.[1] form of the Cathar sect in France and Italy. Bogomiles (the Lovers of God; bogo comes from Iranian word baga or bay 'god') had dualistic thoughts and promoted piety and vegetarianism, and they did not believe in Jesus' sufferings. Bogomile religion spread throughout Turkey and Asia Minor, and finally became a secret mysterious sect in Byzantine Empire in the 11th century AD. However, both the Bogomiles and the Cathars, who emphasized asceticism, piety, and vegetarianism and were also anti-church, followed a qualified dualism, in which Jesus and Satan were brothers, both children of God. Although this is not the Manichaean view, it reflects a similar dualistic way of thought. In addition, it reminds us of the Zurvānite myth in which Ohrmazd and Ahriman are in the womb of Zurwān and they are brothers.

[1] Cf. G. Haloun and W. B. Henning, "The Compendium of the Doctrines and Styles of Teaching of Mani, the Buddha of Light" in Asia Major (London 1952), N. S. 3, p. 209.

The most significant aesthetical aspect of Manichaean art is also the theme of the human soul's redemption and its reaching the Paradise of Light. The concept of the soul's redemption probably was illustrated in Manichaean paintings. The release of souls from the earthly world – that was regarded as a mixture of light and darkness - would be considered the most significant theme of Manichaean art. Manichaeism, like other Gnostic schools of thought, wished to flee from the material world and seek salvation beyond it.

Mani's Ārdahang was a painting-book or perhaps a scroll-like epistle about creation and the story of cosmogony, the world of light and darkness, and the quality of releasing light-particles, reaching the vessel of the moon and the sun, the paradise of eternal light and similar motifs. Although Mani's Ārdahang, possibly the most beautiful instance of Iranian pictorial art in the past centuries, vanished in the hands of the fanatics of the time, fragments of its commentary, including a Parthian fragment named Ārdahang Wirfrās, have survived, upon the basis of which we can describe the content and pictorial motifs to some extent.[1]

The Ārdahang's paintings were most probably about the cosmogonical processes, creation, the structure of the cosmos, and the end of the world, the motifs of which were painted on several pages of a pictorial book, or in the shape of precious scrolls or pictorial textiles. These paintings were presumably divided into three parts or three scrolls, for Mani thought of three periods of creation; thus we see the content in one of Manichaean wall-paintings preserved in Turfan that has been illustrated as a tree with three trunks symbolizing three sacramental periods.

Therefore, one can presume that the Ārdahang contained the illustrations of Manichaean Paradise, and its multiple deities, angels and their functions. The figures such as the Father of Greatness, the Primordial Man, the Mother of Life, the Living Spirit and other celestial characters, the fighting of the demons and the Devil with the deities of light, the creation of the first human beings, and eschatology were most probably among the pictorial themes of Manichaean art.

The Iranian tradition of pardeh-khānī (narrating through pictorial curtains in front of the audience), which continued up to the centuries after Islam in Iran and Central Asia and also is still a living tradition in Iran continued by the traditional narrators of the Shahname of Ferdowsi, can be seen to have originated from Manichaean pictorial traditions. This is clearly described in one of the Manichaean scriptures (M 219).[1]

Each of various Manichaean arts is related to a specific geographical and cultural dominion and later spread to other regions. For instance, the art of nibēgān-nīgārīh or tadhhīb (book-painting and gilding) originates in Jewish and Gnostic artistic traditions of Mesopotamia. Mani himself learned the arts of paintings and calligraphy among these Gnostic sects. On the other hand, Manichaean silk-paintings have been influenced by Chinese and Indian arts. Frescoes and wall-paintings have chiefly survived in mānestāns or Manichaean monasteries in Turfan. Therefore, they are affected by the local arts of these regions.

Mani was assumed to be the inventor of a new script which was called 'Manichaean script'. It originated in Syriac-Estrangelo script with 22 alphabetical characters. Several manuscripts have been preserved in Manichaean or Sogdian scripts. The art of tadhhīb and book-painting can also be observed through leather, paper, or silk pieces discovered in Turfan treasuries. On these works Klimkeit writes,

> The holy books of the Manichaeans, together with their illustrations, reflect an inner attitude determined by constant reference to the World of Light. The inner spark in the human person ultimately belongs to that World of Light, and as everything there is filled with brightness, is orderly arranged, is divine and fragrant, so it is also in a pure and well-arranged soul. The beautifully written and embellished page of a handwritten and illustrated book is a mirror of such a soul."[1]

The picture of the benefactors of Shajirat al-Ḥayāt or the Tree of Life has survived in one of the wall-paintings of Manichaean monasteries, the painting of cave no. 38b, in Bäzäqlīq, the oasis of Turfan. The picture symbolizes the Realm of Light. The tree has three trunks or branches which, as mentioned above, may represent the three stages of creation or the three periods of Manichaean cosmogony.[2]

This remarkable motif was found at Bäzäqlīq, of three trunks arising from a body of water in which two water fowl swim. However, the interpreters of the painting "were hitherto of the opinion that this is a symbolic representation of the World of Light. The tree is laden with blossom and fruit, and men, angels and gods adore it. In this interpretation the three trunks could be explained by the fact that, according to the Book of Giants, the Kingdom of Light is spread out in three directions." [3] Here, Professor Sundermann, referring to the Chinese Compendium of the [3] H.-J. Klimkeit, op. cit., p. 307; Severus of Antioch (Patriarch from 512-518 AD) says in reference to the Book of Giants: "The good – which they [i.e. Manichaeans] also signify as 'light' and 'tree of life' – has its regions toward the east, the west, and the north, but toward the south is Tree of Death. Of such appearance is the Tree of Life, which is decorated with all its "beauty and with its splendid ornaments" (A. Adam, Texte zum Manichaismus, 2nd ed. (Berlin 1969), pp. 11f.); cf. Ibid.

Teachings of Mani (art. 5, st. 3), proposes that "the Tree with the three trunks might be viewed as a symbol of the three functions of the Manichaean church, viz. the sacramental, teaching and serving functions. Sundermann refers to the Middle Persian terms that denote these three functions, or rather the people that are concerned with these functions, viz. āfarīnsar, xrōhwān and ruwānagān-ispasag.[1]

Also, the picture in which the Tree of Life and the Tree of Death are twisted around each other can be seen in the wall-paintings of a Manichaean monastery in the north of Sangim, cave no. 4. The Tree of Life is in blossom, beautiful and green, while the Tree of Death is withered and leafless.[2]

On the Trees of Life and Death, Klimkeit says,

> It becomes clear that the image of the two trees can be interpreted cosmologically and anthropologically. Cosmologically the trees represent the two kingdoms or principles, and anthropologically they represent the righteous and the godless. The texts tell us that the good tree bears fruits, whereas the evil tree is bare, the latter referring to those in whose lives the powers of darkness reign.[3]

However, here Sundermann has another interpretation of the separate but interlacing trees; "he sees in the two trees the duality of religion (or church) and state. This could be substantiated by the

[2] Here Dr. Jason Beduhn, on editing the manuscript of this book, adds "This description of the trees in the Sangim temple is found in many publications, but it is inaccurate. The so-called 'Tree of Death' is actually a willow-tree, with a full set of leaves that do not reproduce well in photographs. Therefore, the interpretation may be doubtful."

Shepherd of Hermas which depicts the church as a willow tree covering the whole earth."[1]

Manichaeans used a symbolic language to justify their specific aesthetics and to transmit the aesthetic themes. This symbolic language had two pictorial and expressive representations.

Among the fundamental and most frequent symbols of the human soul, the motif of the pearl is noticeable. The Song of Pearl which is included in the Acts of Thomas has been reputed to exist in many countries, but it was not really explained or quoted. The metaphor of the pearl is related both to the soul of the individual that requires redemption, and to the lighted soul of the cosmos, i.e. the Living Self that is spread throughout the world and the Manichaean redeeming characters that release it. The quest of the soul is always assimilated to a diver's actions, a diver who dives into the depths of the sea to take up precious treasures. The sea signifies the material world. In eastern Manichaeism, the image of the sea might be the Buddhist idea of Saṃsāra, which is 'the sea of birth and death'.[2]

Manichaeans used the most beautiful imagery in order to explain the concept of redemption and salvation of the soul-particles. Elements such as pearl, treasure, the Arks of the Moon and the Sun, Lotus, the Tree of Life, the Column of Glory, the Harbor of Peace etc. are among the themes of Manichaean gnosis. Treasure or pearl is the symbol of the Living Soul, i.e. the juice of light-particles spread in the world. The Ark of Light carries the light-particles. The helmsman of the Ark is the Primordial Man who is released of the powers of darkness.[3] The navigator of the Ark is the Light Nous (Pth. mnwhmyd rwšn) and the Ark itself represents the commandments of Manichaean church or 'Truth'. Therefore, according to A Manichaean Psalm-Book, the believer is the treasure which is carried through the Ark to the realm of salvation; sometimes he/she can be the Ark itself which sails into the Harbor of Peace.[1]

Lotus symbolizes birth and the sun, and it is seen in most Manichaean paintings. The deities are mostly depicted standing on beds of lotus. Lotus, as a symbol, has been transmitted into Manichaean art mostly under the influence of the Buddhist art of China and Central Asia.

The Column of Glory, who is considered as one of the Manichaean deities of the Third Creation (the creation of man and his redemption), is the Milky Way through which the pure souls and released light-particles rise up to the moon, the Sun, and the Paradise of Light.

The Harbor of Peace is another Manichaean symbol which refers to the Realm of Light. The ultimate wish of a Manichaean righteous or Gnostic is: reaching the same heavenly abode, and this happens when a great fire appears at the end of the world. It burns all the wickedness and the elements of darkness, and then the world joins the Paradise of Light.

Another Manichaean artistic motif is 'the vine bearing grapes' depicted in a small cave in Sangim. It may represent the church, "as the church has its leader or its head, its archegos, thus the vineyard or the vine is cared for a gardener or tender."[2]

Therefore, the origin of Manichaean aesthetics and symbolism should be investigated in Gnosticism, mythology and art. For, the Gnostics were, in fact, Mani's predecessors who taught him a lot. Manichaeans flourished upon a bed of Gnostic and Parthian art of

Mesopotamia, brought the tradition to Central Asia and the far regions of the East, and combined it with Chinese and Indian-Buddhist art.[1]

One of the representations of the combination of Manichaean and Buddhist art can be seen in the painting of the Cross of Čintāmani (the pearl of wish, salvation, and reaching Buddhist Nirvāna) at the scene of Paranirvāna (a Sanskrit term which means 'going towards Nirvāna, or ascending from the causal circle or chain') found in the Petra Cave of Ming Oi, in Turfan.

Other paintings like Akšobhya (one of five representations of Buddha created by Ādibuddha, "the first Buddha". Thunderbolt and the Cross of Light are his signs. It signifies the light and splendour of "divinity" in human beings, animals and plants) and the Cross of Light (Manichaean symbol and the mystery of light-particles spread in the world), the representation of Five Tathāgatas (gone forth toward Nirvāna)[2] in the realms of light, the painting of the Judge Scene, a Manichaean miniature with figure of the Buddha, the pictured fragment of a Sogdian book in Indian Pothi style, and the other examples, prove this combined aesthetic mood of Manichaean-Buddhist art of Central Asia and China.[3]

The Manichaean artworks have been affected also by Iranian art, as the words of Louis Hambis confirm:

> These wall-paintings, which are the only known Manichaean frescoes surviving today, display all the characteristics of Buddhist paintings of Tang dynasty in the oasis of Turfan, and

[2] The term Tathāgathas consists of two derivatives, tathā (thus) and gata (gone forth) from the root of gam (go, walk). So, it means 'thus gone forth', and signifies a person who paved the mid-way to reach the sea of Nirvāna. See A. Pāshāi, Buddha (Tehran 2003), p. 287.

> show undoubtedly some effects of later Sassanian art. A specific technique has been applied in the frescoes of Bäzäqlīq, but the frescoes of Qočo have been executed upon a surface that are similar to old Buddhist frescoes of this region. The influence of Chinese art has been reflected in some of its general characteristics, such as the general colourful motifs of some of the frescoes and the importance of its designs through which the lines have given a kind of splendour and fluency to the configuration..., however it seems that Chinese art was not the effective art in Manichaean wall-paintings, but the influence of Iranian Sassanian art is obvious.[1]

As an example, the influence of Sassanian artistic tradition on Manichaean art can be seen in the Sassanian relief of Tāq-e Bostān. In the relief, one can observe the pearl band which is one of the decorative characteristics of Sassanian art.[2] Examples like that reveal the influence of Sassanian art on Manichaean art of Central Asia and the oasis of Turfan. However, since the paintings of the Sassanian dynasty have mostly vanished, should we not build on the common aesthetic aspects of Manichaean and Sassanian art based on the surviving Manichaean paintings? This is, of course, only a suggestion. More discoveries of Manichaean artistic works and miniatures and a comparative survey of Sassanian and Manichaean visual arts are needed to prove their close connection.

Literary Reflection

One of the important representations of Manichaean gnosis can be seen in its literature, i.e. Manichaean religious scriptures, poetry and hymns, which constitute a kind of precious treasure. Some volumes of Mani's own writings of which some fragments survived, and the prose and poetry of his disciples and church dignitaries from the 4th through the 9th centuries AD have created a deep and vast literature through which one can survey Manichaean gnosis and its aesthetic values.

Manichaean literature, which has survived chiefly in Syriac, Coptic, Middle Persian, Parthian and Chinese, can be divided into the two categories of prose and poetry. At this point, we should pay attention only to that part of Manichaean literature which depicts aesthetic aspects to some extent. We should undoubtedly refer to specific parables and symbolism of Manichaean writings which bear the most beautiful aspects of symbolic, poetical and gnostic expressions. The prevalent gnostic, philosophical and ritual theme of these writings is the concept of 'two principles and three periods' about which we will speak in the next chapter. Manichaeans used marvelous parables and allegories in their commentary and hermeneutics of this theme, of which the most significant examples are referred to here. One can deduce from Manichaean parables that man has a devil-like and dark origin. According to Manichaean gnosis, the material world has been created of the bodies of the defeated demons in the battles between the forces of light and darkness. It is completely mixed with the realm of darkness and the devil powers, but since this mixture of the material world is felt, redemption is possible. The only way to redemption is throwing away this temporary garment in which the Devil clothed man. And since man puts on this cloth, the 'body-addicted' soul will suffer rebirth to this world in another body. This Manichaean attitude is called Zādmurd (birth-death, rebirth), that is, the same metamorphosis found in Buddhist gnosis; presumably it entered Manichaean gnosis under the influence of Buddhism of Central Asia, India and China.

Therefore, there is only one way to save the human soul: the release of light imprisoned in the dark body. In one of the Manichaean Middle Persian texts we see the same motif:

Wake up of deep drunkenness in which thou art slept,
And watch me..., take me out of the bosom of Death.[1]

The Uigurian fragment T II D 78a, II, a prayer for deliverance preserved from Turfan documents, has:

Deliver me from those that do evil,
Separate me from those that are laden with guilt,
And deliver me from the sons of Hell
Who are all wicked
And who do nothing but spread wickedness.
My God, protect me from those devouring
And from manifold kinds of poisonous [snakes].[2]

Thus, life in Manichaean view means the redemption and salvation of the soul; and death means the imprisonment in the material jail. As in another Uigurian fragment (TM 296) we read:

Because he deigned to enlighten [us],
We were saved from the place of no return.
Because he established the Law of the Buddha (i.e. Mani),
We were freed from [distress] and misery.[3]

The investigation of the symbolic characters of Manichaean deities, especially in the three periods of the Creation Myth, which is vastly described throughout Manichaean prose and poetical writings, will reveal most of the aesthetic aspects of Manichaeism.

In a prayer of divine beings and the angels, we read:

May happiness and joy increase

> Untarnished blessing, growth, increase and new victory,
> Furthermore, may the valiant and mighty angels
> And the great ones, the perfectly meritorious...divine beings, alight;
> May all the great angels grant power and help, victory and triumph.[1]

The description of two essences of light and darkness is found in Manichaean scriptures. The essence of light exists on high, in the Paradise of Light, a heaven which is unlimited on the east, the west and the north, and bordered by darkness on the south. The dark essence exists in the lower depths and borders the Paradise of Light only on the north.

The Father of Greatness is at the head of all Manichaean deities. He is absolute Beauty. In Manichaean literature, he is depicted as a wakeful shepherd and the captain of the Ark of Light. The Father has a crown of light on his head and is surrounded by heavenly light-particles.

In Manichaean scriptures, creation is described as a mythical drama: One day the Father of Greatness, that joyous and splendid Light, invoked the aeons of light and shared them in his grand joy. He invoked all the aeons of peace and all his spiritual offspring. He established the lodge of life depicting undestroyable and living pictures in it. He invoked bright clouds through which he made life fall down as rain. Then, he invoked the sacred fire, wind and air to breathe the spirit of life.[2]

The allegory of the Primordial Man's bondage in Manichaean literature is described as: He was lodged in the ship as treasure; a ship whose bottom was Dawn, upon which were the ropes of light. Its helmsmen were splendid, and its sailors put on Dawn as their garments. They brought the treasure of that worthy deity, a treasure that was immeasurable. When the Devil saw the burdened ship of the Primordial Man, he gathered the plunderer and dark-hearted demons and sent them forth towards the ship. They robbed the innumerable treasure of that lightful ship, seizing the rubies and pearls and sailing them on the sky. They also put the diadems on their heads.[1]

Thus, the deity who carried the celestial light was imprisoned in the hands of demons. His captivity is a symbolic theme for later procedures of human soul redemption, the release of light and the saving of the souls captured in the material body. Is not this the Gnostic theme shared with one of the fundamental motifs of Islamic mysticism? To me, we should give high regard, above all to the Iranian great mystics, the significant gnostics such as Mani, Mar Ammo, Wahman Xwarxšēd, and some others who have created deep gnostic hymns, prayers, and poetical prose.[2]

Here we refer only to some examples of hymns and prayers which represent perfect beauty in Manichaean gnostic view:

I knew the King of Light
Who is the Tree of Life
I found Darkness
Who is the Tree of Death.
Whoever taught me wisdom
He put the wreath on your head
Whoever led me towards the sacred ones

He would lead me towards the lights (stars)[1]

Leaving the material body in this world and flying towards the heavens are themes beautifully expressed in the following Manichaean hymn:

I'll pass through the heavens
And will put this body upon the earth.
They invoke me too
Blowing into the trumpets
Towards the immortals
I'll leave my body upon the earth
Of which soil I'd been originated.[2]

Manichaean hymn-cycles are preserved in Middle Persian and mainly in Parthian. Two famous Gnostic hymn-cycles are Huyadagmān (Our Happy-Fortune) and Angad Rōšnān (The Perfect Lights). There is also a collection of hymns called Mahrnāmag (Hymn-Book).[3] The theme of the soul's captivity, for instance, is described in the Hymn-Cycle Angad Rōšnān:

The Soul replied:
I'm the tormentless tender-born of the Father
Mixed with the material world
And I'm tormented

Take me out of the bosom of Death.[1]

The theme of the inferior material world and the longing for ascension to the Realm of Light and Beauty is described in a Parthian hymn:

I weep for my Self
I wish I could redeem it
Of the fright of the savages
Who devour each other. [2]

Mahrnāmag, the other hymn-book of the Manichaeans who moved to Turfan, survives most probably from the 9th century AD. It was, first, composed by one of the Manichaean dignitaries, but he could not finish it; during 825-832 AD one of Manichaean dibīrs (scribes) called Naxūrīg Rōšn finished it. The original title of this hymn-book was Xwaš Āwāgān (Sweet Voices). It praises Mani and his ascension to heaven. It also refers to Messiah and Mar Zaku, one of the Manichaean 'teachers' (hmmwc'g'n). It consists of a hymn in praise of the Living Self (gryw zyndg) who is created of the light-particles of the Five Sons of the Primordial Man. He is the symbol of the imprisoned soul which is freed from the claws of the demons:

Remember us, O thou Soul!
Thou hast come to salute, O thou Soul!
Thou hast come to salute, O thou Soul of the Light!
Came forth this imprisoned Soul
Came forth the Saved Soul![3]

We see that the grief of alienation or being away from the transcendental principle or essence, which takes the main theme of Islamic mysticism, has a specific representation in Manichaean gnostic poetry. The mystical theme of

> Whoever is alienated from his essence
> Will be in search of his union,[1] has been expressed also in Psalm 261 of the Manichaean Psalm-Book of which we spoke before. The theme of despising Self which is one of the current themes of our mystics, has been represented through Manichaean gnostics' tongues two or three centuries before the rise of Islam:

> This lion that is within me I have strangled
> I have turned him away from my soul
> Him who polluted me at all times.[2]

Or in Manichaean Psalm 265, we read:

> The days of thy life running from thee,
> Why dost thou vainly waste thy zeal
> On the wings of earth
> And puttest behind thee all [the things of evil]?
> Thou hast spent thy life sunk in the worries and cares of the world
> Working thyself into a decline through the pains and sorrows.
> Thou art a stranger housed in a body of earth
> Defiled, how long therefore hast thou been heedless
> Of what thou ignorantly dost?
> Blessed art thou, for the path of journey is open to you.

Do not entrust your journey to oblivion.[1]

Such examples reveal that a deep relationship can be seen between the Gnostic hymns of the Manichaeans and the mystical themes of the Islamic period. The Prologue to Rūmī's Mathnawī is indirectly affected by Gnosticism and Christian mysticism of the first centuries AD. It shows the continuity of the Gnostic culture of the Sassanian period for centuries after Islam. The isolation and straying of the human soul and the fall of spirit from heaven down to the material world is the main theme of the Prologue in which the motif of separation is allegorically explained as the separation of nay (reed) from the paradaisal nayistān (reed bed):

Everyone who is left far from his source
Wishes back the time when he was united with it.[2]

This longing for union with the celestial source can be seen among the followers of the above two systems of Gnosticism. Inter alia, in one of the Manichaean Psalms:

I will pass up into the skies
And leave this body upon the earth
The trumpet sounds, I hear
They are calling me up to the immortals
I will cast away my body upon the earth
From which it was assembled.[3]

The antagonism between soul and body or the battle between intellect and spirit can be seen explicitly in the poetry of Rūmī:

The soul in its separation from the throne like a she-camel

[3] C. R. C. Allberry, A Manichaean Psalm-Book (Stuttgart 1938), p. 261.

The body from its love of the thorn
The soul takes wings towards heaven above
The body claws at the earth
O you who have died for your country, as long as you are with me
My soul will be far from Leilī.[1]

In these couplets, Rūmī has assimilated the tug of war between soul and body or the battle between form and meaning or the antagonism between intellect and spirit to the antagonism of Majnūn with the she-camel.[2] The squabble between soul and body and between intellect and spirit or the dispute between love and intellect, and form and meaning conjures up the duality of Gnostics who believe in the eternal and everlasting separation of the world of light and darkness or of spirit and matter. Of course, this analogy does not suggest that the mystics accepted the fundamentals of Gnostic-Manichaean thought, but it conjures up a kind of dialectical attitude, which is observed in most cultures, inter alia, in Iranian mystical and literary works.[3]

Conclusion

An indication of the continuity of the Manichaean gnostic themes can be seen in some Iranian cultural and literary aspects as discussed above. The influence of Manichaean-gnostic approach in Iran is undeniable. However, as we have seen, the influence was indirect especially during the Sassanian and Islamic era, because the Manichaean idea of dualism was strictly regarded as a dangerous heresy both in early Christianity and the first centuries after Islam. Therefore, Manichaean gnostics tried to hide their beliefs in Christian and Islamic coverings during later periods. In this way, we observe their deep impact on Iranian cultural, mystical and literary dimensions up to the centuries after Islam. Although the idea of the permeation of Gnostic themes into Islamic mysticism, especially the manner in which these themes permeated through the Christian and Manichaean ascetics, is a new trend in mystical and literary researches, the continuation of deep, sustained and steady research might bring about a profound change in the study of mystical texts.

Manichaean Creation Myth

Manichaean Pantheon

Gods and Goddesses of the Creation Myth and Their Functions

There are more than twenty gods and goddesses with different names and functions so far known through the original Manichaean sources. The variation of the divinities' names is due to different Manichaean manuscripts in an assortment of languages. Each language has its own way of nomenclature that causes confusion and amazement among most readers. So it is worthwhile to choose a specific name for each deity. For this, we prefer those names - with a little turning- mentioned in Mary Boyce's Reader. For the other names of gods and goddesses used in Syrian, Coptic, Greek, Latin, Sogdian, Arabic and Persian, see Adabīyyāt-e Mānavī (Manichaean Literature), edited by M. Bahār and the author.

The Golden Era
(The period of the separation of Light and Darkness before Creation)

The Father of Greatness (Pid i Wuzurgīh, Zurwān): The supreme god, father of all the cosmos, and the King of the Paradise of Light.

The Great Spirit (Wāxš Yoždahr): Heavenly spouse of the Father of Greatness.

The First Creation
(The period of the Demons' invasion of the border of the Light Realm, their battles with the deities of Light, and the imprisonment of the Primordial Man)

The Mother of Life (Mādar i Zīndagān): the Mother of the cosmos and the bearer of the Primordial Man.

The Primordial Man (Ohrmizdbag): the Son of the Mother of Life and the symbol of man's bondage in the material world.

The Five Elements (Amahraspandān): the Primordial Man's children who are Ether (Frāwahr), Wind (Wād), Light (Rōšn), Water (Āb), and Fire (Ādur).

The Living Self (Grīw Zīndag): a deity shaped from the Five Elements, the light imprisoned in Matter.

The Second Creation
(The Redemption process of the Primordial Man and the Creation of the material world)

The Beloved of the Lights (Rōšnan Xwārist): a deity who is the illuminator of the battlefields in the redeeming process of the Primordial Man by the Living Spirit and his Five Sons.

The Great Architect (Bām Yazd): the architect and builder of the New Paradise, a temporary paradise to keep the released light-particles until the end of the world.

The Living Spirit (Mihr Yazd): the redeemer of the Primordial Man and the creator of the material world.

Five Sons (Panj Puhrān): the Sons of the Living Spirit who are:

The Keeper of Splendour (Dahibed): the King of the first firmament and the keeper of the three upper firmaments.

The King of Honour (Pāhragbed): the king of the seven lower firmaments.

The Adamas of Light (Wisbed): a deity standing in the middle of the cosmos and its keeper.

The King of Glory (Wādahrāmyazd): the revolver of the three Wheels of Wind, Water and Fire.

Atlas (Mānbed): a deity standing on the fifth earth, who holds all the eight earths on his shoulders and feet.

The Call-God (Xrōštagyazd): the sixth son of the Living Spirit, a deity who calls the imprisoned Primordial Man.

The Answer-God (Padwāxtag Yazd): the sixth son of the Primordial Man, a deity who answers to the Call-God.

The Third Creation
(The period of Man's Creation and his redemption)

The Third Messenger (Narisah Yazd): the redeemer and messenger god in the process of releasing the light-particles.

Jesus the Splendour (Yišō' Zīwā(h): the divine messenger and man's spiritual guide.

The Maiden of Light (Kanīg Rōšn): the redeemer of some imprisoned light-particles.

The Column of Glory (Bāmistūn): the Light-Column or the Milky Way through which the released pure souls and light-particles pass and ascend to the Moon, the Sun, and the New Paradise.

The Best Chariot-Pulling God (Rahangweh Yazd): a deity in the chariots of the Moon and the Sun, who is the gatherer and keeper of all the saved light-particles.[1]

The Great Nous (Wahman Wuzurg): the redeemer god and man's spiritual guide who has five Limbs: Reason (Bām), Mind (Manohmed), Intelligence (Uš), Thought (Andešišn), and Understanding (Parmānag).

The Just Judge (Dādwar i Dādgar*): a god who judges human's souls after death.

The Last God (Istomēn Yazd): the last deity of the Manichaean pantheon, who is born – after the Great Fire at the end of the world – of the last released light-particles.

Reza'ī Bāghbīdī, "On the Unknown Epithet of a Manichaean God" in Central Asiatic Journal, 46 (2002) n. 1, pp. 1ff; although the author of the paper regards it as an epithet for the Column of Glory, in my opinion, it is an epithet for another distinctive deity who is traveling in the chariots of the Moon and the Sun. The Reconstruction and Narration of Manichaean Creation Myth

At the beginning, there were two Essences: the Essence of Light and the Essence of Darkness. The first existed on high, in the Paradise of Light which was unlimited on the east, the west and the north, bordered by the Realm of Darkness on the south. The Essence of Darkness existed in the lower depth which was also unlimited on the east, the west and the south, bordered by the Paradise of Light on the north. The king of the Paradise of Light was the Father of Greatness or Zurwān, and the ruler of the Realm of Darkness was called the Devil or Ahreman.

The Paradise of Light [1]

The Paradise of Light consists of 'Five Greatnesses'[2]: the Father of Greatness, Twelve Aeons[3], the Aeon of Aeons, Pure Air, and the Realm of Light.

First, the Father of Greatness is a splendid king and the god of all gods and the father of all our races.[1] The sun exists in his aeons or [1] Among more than a hundred texts on Manichaean creation myth which were chosen to reconstruct the myth, there is only one Sogdian text, which most fantastically describes the Paradise of Light and its ruler, the Father of Greatness. See Sogdian texts, no. 54. The number of the texts are according to the texts given in my Ostūre-ye Āfarīnesh dar Ā'īn-e Mānī (The Myth of Creation in Manichaeism) (Tehran 2004). The reader can also find the original texts or their foreign translations according to the Table of the Texts at the end of the book. Cf. also W. B. Henning, "A Sogdian Fragment of Manichaean Cosmogony" in Selected Papers, Acta Iranica 15 (Leiden-Téhéran-Liège 1977), pp. 301-313.

spiritual particles.[2] He is as a good and fertile tree that has never born evil fruits; he is the absolute light and eternal beauty; a guard who watches his tower; a sleepless shepherd; a conscious helmsman whose ship never drowns and ultimately reaches the shore of light and immortality; he is the bearer of an undestroyable crown; his throne never falls and he has twelve strong walls.[3]

Second, the Twelve Aeons are in front of the Father of Greatness watching him. The aeons are white and eternal and do not know death. Sometimes they stand obeying like twelve eternal walls, sometimes as twelve stars in front of His sun, watching Him.[4]

Third, the Blessed Places (=Aeons) untouchable and numberless wherein dwell the Light Gods, the Angels, the Elements, and the powers in great bliss and joy, and they have immortal life.

Fourth, the Pure Air is in the Light Paradise, marvelous and beautiful to behold, with immeasurable goodness. It shall bring into being the gods' marvelous dresses and garments, thrones,

[1] In Iranian Manichaean texts, the Father of Greatness is called Zurwān. Although this god of Time has bisexual character in Zoroastrian and Zurvanite literature – because he is both the father and the mother of Ahura Mazda and Ahriman – he is an untouchable God-father in Manichaean texts. He is too transcendental to interfere directly in the material creation. The Living Spirit creates the material world with the help of the Mother of Life. There is Holy Spirit beside the Father of Greatness. One can imagine her as His metaphysical spouse who has not any role in the creation process. See M. Boyce, Reader (Leiden 1975), p. 4.

[2] Here Dr. Jason Beduhn in his notes on the manuscript of the book remarks that "this is the second time you have identified the sun with the Father of Greatness. But to my knowledge the sun is associated with the Third Messenger". However, my description here is based only on the Sogdian fragment referred as text no. 54.

diadems, and fragrant wreathes, ornaments, and finery of all kinds by its supernatural power.

Fifth, the Realm of Light is self-existent, eternal, miraculous; in height it is beyond reach, its depth can not be perceived. No enemy and no injurer walk in this realm; its divine pavement is of the substance of diamond that never shakes. All good things emerge from it: adorned, graceful hills wholly covered with flowers, grown in much excellence; green fruit-bearing trees whose fruits never drop, never rot, and never become wormed; springs flowing with ambrosia that fill the whole Paradise, its groves and plains; countless mansions and palaces, thrones and benches that exist in perpetuity for ever and ever.

Thus arranged is the Paradise, in these Five Greatnesses. They are calm in quietude and do not know fear. They live in the light, where they have no darkness; in eternal life, where they feel no death; in health without sickness; in joy, where they have no sorrow; in charity without hatred; in the company of friends, where they have no separation; in a shape that is not brought to naught, in a divine body where there is no destruction; on ambrosial food without restriction, wherefore they bear no toil and hardship. In appearance they are ornate, in strength powerful, in wealth exceeding rich; they know not even the name of poverty. Nay, they are equipped, beautiful, and embellished; no damage occurs in their bodies. Their garments of joy are finery that never get soiled, of seventy myriad kinds, set with jewels. Their places are never destroyed.[1]

There are five kinds of trees in the Paradise of Light. These trees are eternally green and bearable during summers and winters.[2] The Great Spirit blows into them and feeds them with her light.[3]

The Paradise of light shines with five pure thoughts at every coast, and has a refreshing wind; gods, divinities, essences, trees, springs and plants are happy through it.[1] It is a realm where no one can find wrath, greed, lust, deception, destruction, chaos, theft, sin, hunger and thirst, coldness and warmth, affliction and sorrow, sickness and pain, old age, death and ugliness.[2]

The paradise of Light has five spiritual limbs of breeze, wind, light, water and fire.[3] It has fantastic white outlooks; there are gates, towers, houses, gardens, trees, branches full of fruits and sprouts in them, sparkling in different colours.[4]

The King of Light Paradise, the Father of Greatness, is a great luminous commander who has five limbs: meekness, knowledge, wisdom, absence and cleverness. In addition, he has five other limbs consisting of kindness, faith, loyalty, generosity, and science.[5] He is a noble tree bearing no bad fruits. He is a father with innumerable offspring, a guard who watches his tower, a sleepless shepherd, and an alert helmsman. And his palace has twelve vigorous walls.[6]

One day the Father of Greatness, the splendid and happy light, invoked the aeons of light and shared with them his grand joy. He invoked the aeons of peace and all his spiritual offspring; he established the place of life and depicted living and eternal pictures in it. He invoked the bright clouds, descended the Life as rain through them. Then, he invoked the holy fire, wind and air that blew the spirit of life.[7]

The Great Spirit, the spiritual and ritual spouse of the Father of Greatness, is always beside him. She eternally reveals the path of truth to us and teaches us that there are two essences: the essence of light and the essence of darkness. They were primordially diverged from each other. The divergence continues until the Devil's attack, and the mingled period lasts up to the end of the material world.

The Realm of Darkness

The Realm of Darkness is deep and unlimited from every side, except on the north, which is bordered by the Realm of Light. The essence of the Realm of Darkness has five limbs: Mist (or Cloud), Fire, Simom (warm and poisonous wind), Poison and Darkness.[1] The ruler of this realm is the Devil or the King of Darkness.[2] He is not eternal in nature, but he bears within him eternal essences. His head is as a lion's, his body as a dragon's, wings as a bird's, and his tail as a fish's. He has four legs as quadrupeds. As soon as the Devil began life, he was poised to swallow and destroy every thing.[3]

The essence of darkness is ugly, deficient, wicked, turbid and putrid, bearing a Self that is evil, low, stupid, offensive and foolish, and his action is mingled with wickedness, corruption, damage and deficiency; his features are wickedness, dying and impure excrement.[4]

There exist fiery bodies and poisonous offspring in the Realm of Darkness. The Devil gathers many commanders and is ready to fight.[1] This realm is equipped with five caves, each deeper than the other; Greed (MP. Āz Dēw), the mother of demons and the Devil's spouse, lives there. She is the generator of all evils.[2] The Devil begins combat from these five caves, with five springs polluted with poison, and with five tastes that are salty, sour, hot, rough and bitter.[3]

As the King of Darkness came into being in darkness, he first moved from right to left, corrupting everything. Then he decided to ascend, but when he saw the sparkling of light, he worried and, since he saw that the more he ascended, the more he trembled, so he was drowned in his thoughts and finally he returned to his elements. Afterwards, he decided to ascend once more. The Realm of Light, however, realized the Devil's wicked purpose for slaughter and corruption. This consciousness led to the consciousness of the clever world, then to the consciousness of the world of absence, wisdom and generosity.[4]

Then the King of Darkness went to the border of Light and saw Five Greatnesses or light-beings of Light Paradise. So, he said to him; "Would I be like them?" But he was born of darkness, an unfortunate being that has nothing, no wealth in his treasury and no eternity in his destiny. He watched the light-particles one moment so that if something descended, he would seize it, put on the light garment, and become like him.[5]

Manichaean creation myth is ultimately the story of the Two Principles and the Three Periods. The Two Principles are the essences of light and darkness. Each of them has a unique origin. The Three Periods are: 1) Primordial Period, the golden era of separation and division of light and darkness in which the sky and the earth have not been created yet. 2) Mingled Period, when darkness attacks at the Realm of Light and creates misery. Man is created during this era and lives at this burning place, but he promises to flee from it. 3) Final Period, when there will be a grand metamorphosis. Righteousness and Evil will return each to its origin. The golden era of separation will begin again. Darkness will be imprisoned at the depth of a pit and the lights will be united for ever.[1]

The Devil's Invasion of the Realm of Light

When the Devil saw the Realm of Light, he wished to possess it. The idea of invasion occupied his mind. He decided to ascend with the help of the Sons of Darkness.

When the Father of Greatness saw this, he invoked the spiritual forces of light and said: "Gather here all of you! And guard yourselves against the Devil's eyes, who has looked up now!"

One of the Sons of Light looked from the sky and as soon as he saw the Devil, he told his light-brothers: "O, my brothers! O, Sons of Light that there is no deficiency and diminution within you; I looked into the pit and saw those evil eyes belonging to that son of evil and darkness who is about to fight. I saw his seven companions and twelve viziers. I saw his established camp with fire burning in its center. I saw those indigent poor ones who were thinking of war; I saw their bloody weapons ready to fight; I saw their traps and nets spread so that when the destined bird comes forth, be it trapped. I saw those sons of corruption and darkness drinking stolen wine, and eating stolen meat."[2]

The Five Greatnesses worried. Then, the Father of Greatness reacted and said: "I never send out to battle one of these forces of Light Paradise which are my spiritual and eternal particles, because

[1] Coptic text no. 58; Chinese text no. 80.
[2] Ibid.

I created them for peace and rest. I myself have to take action." So, he invoked the Mother of Life. She invoked her brave son, the Primordial Man. He, in his turn, invoked his Five Sons and was ready to fight.[1]

The First Creation

The grand goddess of the First Creation is the Mother of Life who stands with her hands on her breasts, in front of the Father of Greatness and is his servant. She is the afflicted mother of the Primordial Man, the mother of all the righteous ones and all the living; and she is the first weapon of the Lord, the Father of Greatness.[2]

After the Devil's invasion, the Primordial Man rushed into the Realm of Darkness. First, he put on the garment of 'body' and attacked against the Devil and the demons together with his Five Sons who are Ether, Wind, Light, Water, and Fire. He put into jail many of the demons, but finally, the aeons of wind surrounded him, like a wild army in the territory of the wind. The Primordial Man tried sharply to release himself and his sons, but the demons swallowed the light-particles of his Sons, and he himself was imprisoned at the bottom of the pit.[3]

Then, the demons fastened him. He was shining among the demons of darkness with a handsome body, like a bright star in the middle of darkness, like a human being among the wild beasts and like a deity among the devils.[1]

[1] Syriac text no. 95; in Greek text no. 102, it is stated that there was not any evil in the Father of Greatness nor could he punish the Devil through it. So, he sent out his force called 'Spirit' to fight with the Devil. This process caused the mingling of soul and matter.

[2] Middle Persian text no. 3; Parthian texts nos. 35 and 36; Coptic text no. 57. According to a Middle Persian text (no. 2, st. 1), the Mother of Life, in spite of bearing the Primordial Man, supervises all battle scenes and enrolls as a guide and helper. She proceeds up to the border of the Realm of Darkness (cf. text no. 36) and later tries to release her son.

At this time, the Living Self, who was originated from the essences of the Five Elements or Five Lights (the Primordial Man's children), helped his father, but he was finally swallowed by the demons too.[2] While the Devil was quarrelling with the Primordial Man, the Five Lights were mingled with Five Elements of Darkness: Smoke with Fire, Light with Darkness, Simoom with Wind, Cloud with Water, and Ether with Poison.[3]

According to other narratives, the Primordial Man was as though in a ship like a rich treasure;[4] a ship whose bottom is 'Dawn', with lightful ropes hanging on it. Its helmsmen were splendid and its captains put on the 'Dawn' as their garments. They brought the treasure of the noble god, an unbound treasury.

When the Devil saw the rich ship of the Primordial Man, he gathered the robber dark-hearted demons, and sent them towards the ship. They stole the innumerable treasures of the lightful ship, seized the hyacinths and jewels.[5]

The Primordial Man thus was imprisoned by the demons and fell unconscious in the dark pit. After a while, he was conscious and supplicated his mother for help. Then, the Mother of Life appealed to the Father of Greatness in order to send a redeemer for her son.[6] When the Father of Greatness knew the incident and heard that the Primordial Man's ship had run into the storm and his helmsmen were injured and captured, he summoned a messenger and ordered him: "Go there, where the wind carried away the ship. Pull it and bring it here! Guide the helmsmen and bring forth those who were the trustee of the treasure. Dig out the Devil's territory with spade, destroy and upset it. Cast down the firmaments with hyacinths and pearls. Gather all the treasures of that god, put them on the ship. Disgrace them, those worthless ones, and cast their diadems down!"[1]

[4] The parable of the ship refers, in fact, to the bondage of the human soul in his material body. This is presumably a Christian parable because it was taken from Thomas' Psalms, Psalm no. 3; cf. C.R.C. Allberry, A Manichaean Psalm-Book (Stuttgart 1938), pp. 207-209.

The Primordial Man's imprisonment was a trap to defeat all evil forces. For the Father of Greatness like a shepherd seeing a lion coming to annihilate his flock, used a lamb as a snare and left it in the battlefield to catch the lion finally. He tried to save all the sheep of his herd by luring it with a lamb and then cure the injured innocent animal.

Such was the Father's way, who sent forth his brave offspring. He, the Primordial Man, together with his Five Elements, attacked the five pits of Darkness. He fell upon them as rain, sank into them as a sparkle, crept into their inner limbs and imprisoned most of the demons, but he himself fell at the bottom of the pit and cried out: "The fetid and malignant demons have rebelled and used their spears against me." Meanwhile, the Father of Greatness invoked: "Greeting and peace be upon thee, O the offspring of Light! Greeting and praise be upon thee, O youth! We will release thee of the demons' claws!"[2]

The Second Creation

The Father of Greatness invoked the Beloved of the Lights or the first deity of the second Creation.[3] The deity tries to release the

[3] Syriac tex t no. 96; according to another Syriac text (no. 95), an angel called Naḥashbaṭ visits the Primordial Man with the diadem of victory in his hand, and shines forward. The Beloved of the Lights, whose specific character was stated obscure and uncertain by Mary Boyce (op. cit., p.5) is, in my opinion, a deity who descends following the Primordial Man to the Realm of Darkness and Primordial Man too and imprisoned a number of the dark forces.[1] Then, the Beloved of the Lights invoked, or gave birth to, the Great Architect. The latter also invoked the Living Spirit who, in turn, invoked his Five Sons. He created the Keeper of Splendour from his reason, the King of Honour from his mind, the Adamas of Light from his intelligence, the King of Glory from his thought, and Atlas from his understanding. These divinities descended down to the Realm of Darkness and found that the Primordial Man and his children had been swallowed by the Devil and the demons.

Therefore, the Living Spirit cried out loudly, called the Primordial Man and told him: "Salutations, O Pious One among the evils! O light-created in the idle of the darkness! O God who has dwelt among the savage beasts! Now the time of your redemption has come forth!"[2] seizes some captives from the forces of Darkness (cf. Arabic text no. 86; Syriac text no. 96). One of the functions of the Beloved of the Lights is possibly to assist the Living Spirit through enlightening the scene of the battle. For, according to a Syriac text (no. 95), the angel Naḥashbaṭ has also such a duty and takes a lamp in front of the Primordial Man and illuminates the battle scene in the Realm of Darkness.

[1] Arabic text no. 86.

[2] Syriac text no. 96; in Coptic text no. 58, the redeemer of the Primordial Man is a Maiden equipped with five forces who fights with five pits of darkness. This deity certainly cannot be the Maiden of the Light, for she appears in the Third Creation. She may be the Mother of Life. (Here Dr. Jason Beduhn writes in his editing of the manuscript of this book: " The Chinese texts have the Mother of Life working with the Living Spirit to liberate the Primordial Man. This is probably the same tradition you point to in the Coptic text. But also the child of the Primal Man, Fire, descends as a maiden, who is formed into weapons that attack the Devil, etc., in the Coptic material.") In another Coptic text, no. 67, we read that the Adamas of Light released that 'youth' who is imprisoned in the pit of darkness. In Arabic text no. 86, the redeemer is Ḥabīb al-Anwār or the Maiden of the Lights. Therefore, since most of the Manichaean texts are translated from the texts which themselves are translated from other languages, and also because of the multitude of the divinities, the narrators and interpreters

This call manifested as a deity named the Call-God.[1] He descended too, split the demons' army, greeted the Primordial Man and told him: "Gather your limbs to ascend up to the Paradise of Light!"

The Primordial Man rejoiced at hearing this joyful good news and answered him. From this response, the Answer-God was created.[2] Then, the Primordial Man proclaimed through this deity: "Thou has brought forth salvation and peace for us and for the sons of light. Let us know what has happened to them." The Call-God answered: "They are rejoicing and conferring benevolence." Then, the Call-God and the Answer-God went forth together towards the Mother of Life and the Living Spirit.

The Living Spirit came to the border of the light with darkness. He appeared with Grand Light and came near with his force and his Father's strength in order to fight with the demons and their camps. He threw his right hand down to the border of darkness, pulled up the Primordial Man and brought him to the Paradise of Light.[3] Then, he came down, caught the Devil, cast down his diadem from his head, put the dictators of the Realm of Darkness into jail, took their kingdom and leadership, punished them and cast them down to fiery pits, closed the springs of fire so that they could not send up smoke. He extinguished the sparks of fire, brought up the light and stood it at its right place. He, with the aid of his sons, seized both the masculine and feminine demons, put them into jail, obstructed the troublesome rivers, cleaned the waters and sent up fresh water. He uprooted the darkness, cast it down and finally, established the light in its real abode.

The Living Spirit took the Primordial Man's ship, which had run into the storm, to the coast of salvation. He subdued its inner rebellions, assigned some watchmen to it, venerated its helmsmen, and destroyed and cast down the demons' false heaven on which the stolen hyacinths and pearls were fixed. He disgraced them, cast their diadems down, strengthened the ship and fixed breakwater on it and pulled it up as a gift for the Father of Greatness.[1]

The Living Spirit returned again and said: "Three vehement strokes have beaten the enemy and there were three combats." In the first combat, the Devil attacked the Realm of Light, but the Living Spirit defeated and enchained him. In the second combat, the Devil was torn and burnt at the Grand Fire.[2] In the third combat, all things were devastated and the masculine demons were separated from the feminine ones.[3]

At last, the Living Spirit ascended from the Realm of Darkness and rested beside the Mother of Life and the Primordial Man at the Paradise of Light.

The Creation of Cosmos

Then, the Living Spirit, the god of the Seven Climes along with the Mother of Life began to design the cosmos. After a long counsel, they began to fashion the world. First, they made the 'Five Rugs'[4]and there they seated the splendid deity. The 'Five Rugs' served as a wall between the Paradise of Light and the mingled cosmos. Below it, they fashioned ten firmaments from the skins of the killed demons. They fixed a magic twelve-faced Lens there, and a divinity watched over it so that the remaining demons could cause no hurt.[1] Then, they created forty angels in order to keep up those ten firmaments with twelve gates on each firmament. So, they built the other four gates on four sides. The thickness of those ten firmaments and of the air was ten myriad parasangs. To each of twelve gates that exist in each of the firmaments they constructed six thresholds, to each threshold thirty Bazaars, in each Bazaar twelve Rows, in each Row two sides; to the one side they made one hundred and eighty stalls, to the other side another one hundred and eighty. In every stall they fettered and enclosed the demons, the males separately from the females.[2]

Afterwards, they assigned the Keeper of Splendour as the ruler of three upper firmaments, and the King of Honour as the ruler of the other seven firmaments. They crowned them.[3] The King of Splendour stood on the first firmament holding the head of the Five Elements or five children of the Primordial Man.[4] The King of Honour will judge the demons and the other creatures of Darkness and will watch over the root of the Light. In his watch-post, there will be an earthquake and evilness and demons named Egrigroi will rise.[5]

Under the Ten Firmaments[6], however, they created a Rolling Wheel[1] and Zodiac. They fastened the most iniquitous, vicious and rebellious demons of Darkness on the Zodiac. They imprisoned the twelve constellations and the Seven Planets and handed them to the lowest firmament along with Two Dragons.[2] They assigned two angels – a male and a female – to revolve them uninterruptedly. They made two bright chariots from the wind, the light, the water and the fire refined of mixture: the Sun's Chariot was built from fire and light, with five walls of ether, wind, light, water and fire; and twelve gates, five houses, three thrones and five 'soul-gatherer' angels who are in the watery wall.[3]

Then, the Living Spirit clothed himself with Three Garments[4] from those refined light-particles which were: the garments of wind, water, and fire. And he set bright stars on different regions of the lower firmament.

At this time, the Great Architect filled and surfaced the five pits of death in order to create the New Paradise.[5] He fashioned a wall

The Living Spirit fashioned eight earths from the bodies of the killed demons.[2] Atlas stood on the fifth earth holding the three upper earths on his shoulders. The other four earths were built on the lower parts.

keeps the earths steady with feet and hands. He has three splendid pillars and five holy domes.[1]

After a while the seas, the mountains, the valleys, the springs and the rivers were created on each earth each of which had many realms, countries, tribes, villages and houses. Each country was ruled by a Dahibed (the ruler of the country), each tribe by a Zandbed (the ruler of the tribe), each village by a Wisbed (the leader of the village), and each house by a Mānbed (the leader of a house). Then, Āstānag (month), Rāstwān (twenty-four hours) and Wizihrag (two hours) were created. But the world was still unmovable and timeless.

The Living Spirit and the Mother of Life commanded the Call-God (Mizdagtāz) and the Message-God (Azdegaryazd) to stand in front of the Keeper of Splendour – the king of the first firmament – and obey him.[2]

The Living Spirit and the Mother of Life rose up to the Paradise of Light after creating the cosmos. They were accompanied by the Primordial Man, the Beloved of the Lights and the Great Architect and stood before the King of the Paradise of Light with their hands on their chests; they bowed, praised and said: "We praise thee, O our Father who created us through thy miracle and holy word; and imprisoned the Greed Demon, the Devil, the demons and she-demons by us. So command a deity to go forth and watch the prison of the demons, to motivate and to bestow time to the Sun and to the Moon; to redeem and save the light and splendour of the gods which were harmed by the Greed Demon, the Devil, the demons and she-demons; and to instruct the wind, water and fire to pass forth to the paradise!"

The Third Creation

The King of the paradise of Light created three gods through his miracle and holy word: the Third Messenger[1], Jesus the Splendour and the Maiden of Light. The Third Messenger rules over the earth and the sky, keeps the cosmic light, and clears out the days and nights.[2] He invoked the Twelve Maidens whose garments are decorated with signs and diadems: First, strength; second, wisdom; third, victory; fourth, the mind force; fifth, purity; sixth, righteousness; seventh, belief; eighth, piety; ninth, trust; tenth, benevolence; eleventh, beneficence; and twelfth, light.[3]

When the Third Messenger came towards the ships of the sun and the moon, he commanded three servants to move the ships and told the Great Architect to fashion the New Paradise;[4] he also commanded three Chariots of Water, Wind and Fire to raise themselves up. Therefore, when the two ships of the sun and the moon began to sail and reach the middle of the cosmos, movement and time came into being.[5] Time consists of a month that is divided into thirty days and into the new Moon and the full Moon; a day

The word Nēryōsang means 'the masculine feature or the feature of man'. Theodore bar Konai speaks of the legend that Hormazd created Narse as a 15 year old boy and made him nude at the back of the Devil so that the women would fall in love with him and wish him from the Devil. See M. Bahār, Jostārī dar Asatīr-e Irān (A Research in Iranian Mythology) (Tehran 1983), pp. 47-48; A. Tafazzoli, "Wooing of Afrāsyāb to Spandārmað", Iran-Nāmeh, vol. 7, no. 2 (Winter 1988), pp. 196-7. The nakedness of Narisah Yazd and the Maiden of Light in Manichaean Middle Persian texts is to tempt the demons who are chained in the sky gates so that the imprisoned light-particles can be released through them. Cf. Middle Persian text no. 6.

consisting of a rāstwān (twenty four hours or a circle of the sun); a year consisting of twelve months which are equal to twelve constellations, divided into spring, summer, autumn and winter.[1]

The Third Messenger transformed himself into masculine and feminine bodies and along with the Maiden of Light appeared nude in front of the chained demons in the sky. As the male demons saw the nude bodies of the Third Messenger and the Maiden of Light, their lusts were stimulated. They ejaculated and threw down the light-particles through their seeds to the earth. Part of the seed falls into the water and becomes a huge sea-monster, which is overcome by the Adamas of Light. Part falls on land and forms the trees and plants. The female demons who were pregnant from unions in hell, miscarry, and their abortions, containing less light than the male semen, fall to earth and people it with the five kinds of living creatures, which correspond with the five species of demons.[2] The Third Messenger concealed his bodies to give back those light-particles to their own deities. But they did not accept the particles, like men who have disgust at their own vomited foods. So, their semen was shed into the earth, half on dry and half on wet regions.[3] From the semen which was poured on dry regions, plant, flowers, grasslands, seedless plants and all kinds of vegetation came into being. The Greed-Demon had also mixed his spirit with them. And the half which was shed into the sea was transformed into an ugly, horrible robber-giant who came out of the sea, spreading sins throughout the world.[4]

[4] According to Syriac text no. 97, the semen of the demons which was poured into the sea, was transformed into a horrible giant who was similar to the Devil or the King of Darkness. Then, the Adamas of Light was sent to fight with him. He fought and defeated the giant. First, he turned him on his back, struck on his jugular vein, beat his shield to his jaws, and pressed one foot on his thigh and another on his chest.

Then, the Living Spirit sent the Adamas of Light, one of his Five Sons, to spread the giant's limbs into the north, the west and the east. The Adamas of Light also defeated the giant, overthrew him and stood on him so that he could not commit a sin.[1]

When the demons and she-demons, the wrath-demons, little and great monsters, biped, quadruped, winged, poisonous, creeping-body, and all those who were primordially pregnant by infernal demons and also were imprisoned in the sky, they saw the splendour and beauty of the Third Messenger, they were so capricious that they became unconscious. So, they aborted their offspring who fell down on the earth. Then, they stood on the ground, ate the fruits of the trees, grew and became as grand giants and demons. The Greed-Demon entered their bodies through the same fruits. They were overwhelmed into lust and slept together.[2]

The Creation of Man

The Greed-Demon again saw that the sun and the moon were the guards of the god's splendour and always took light-particles from him and from the material world to purify and guard them through the chariots of the sun and the moon and eventually pass them to the New Paradise. The Greed-Demon, filled with rage, wished to proceed everywhere. So he thought it well to create two human beings, masculine and feminine, based on the two masculine-feminine shapes of the Third Messenger, so that they would be her clothes and sheathes, and she would dominate them and they would not be taken from her. She would be eternally free from want and she would never be agonized. Therefore, she created two grand demons, masculine and feminine, called Ashaqlūn and Naqbā'īl, from those demonic aborted offspring, descended from the sky.[1] They were lion-bodies, lustful, raging and sinful predators whom she put on as garments and concealed herself in them.

[1] Middle Persian text no. 5; Andreas-Henning cited a passage which described the defeat of the giant by the Adamas of Light (Mir. Man. i., p. 182, n. Z; cf. M. Boyce, op. cit., p. 65). According to this text, the Adamas of the Light, like a lion released from the cage, presses his left foot on the chest and neck, and his right foot on the thigh of the giant (there is not, of course, the word 'thigh' in the text, but it has been used in a similar Syriac tradition. Cf. Syriac text no. 97). Also we know that the Adamas of Light cast down the giant like a deer in the hunting ground, the head to the east, the foot to the west, the middle to the four mountains, waist to the north, and face to the south (cf. Mir. Man. I, p. 182). The Adamas of Light is the Coptic name of Wisbed, because he is the Adamas (brilliant) that shines in the sky and is seen from every side. He is the Wisbed of the cosmos in the north, the east, the south and the west, and its keeper. Cf. Middle Persian text no. 5.

In this way, the Greed-Demon taught Ashaqlūn and Naqbā'īl lust and cohabitation. They cohabitated together and bore dragon offspring. The Greed-Demon also took and ate them to create the bodies of two masculine-feminine creatures from them. Then Ashaqlūn and Naqbā'īl taught all the little demons lust and cohabitation and made them cohabitate together too. The Greed-Demon fashioned the result of that cohabitation with her lust and made the body of a masculine being with bones, tendons, flesh, veins and skins.[2] She fastened the light and splendour of the gods – which were primordially mingled with the offspring of giants and demons – to the body as soul; then, she transmitted her greed and desire, lust and cohabitation, enmity and vilification, jealousy and sinfulness, rage and hot-temper, peevishness and unintelligence, evil-doing, stubbornness and greed, revenge and egotism, agony and sorrow, pain and ache, poverty and need, sickness and senility, and her infection into this masculine creature. He also gave the voices and vowels of those aborted giants to this creature in order to talk and know easily. She created this masculine creature in the likeness of the Third Messenger. Rage, lust and sinfulness rained on him from the giants, the Zodiac and planets so that he became one savage, giant-like and greedy. When the masculine creature was born, he was called Adam (Mp. Gēhmurd), who is the first masculine human being.

[2] The limbs of this body are also described as 'seven evil creatures'. Cf. Middle Persian text no. 24. According to the same text, human limbs totally consist of 360 parts. The human body is sometimes described as microcosm, that is, an imitation of the macrocosm in which human beings can be joyful and deceived (Middle Persian text no. 25); even the microcosm in some of Middle Persian and Parthian texts is called 'micro-corpse' and the macrocosm 'macro-corpse' (cf. texts nos. 18, 1, 3, 25 & 2.). In Coptic texts, the human body has been described as a fourteen-head dragon; seven heads on the top of the body of which two are for sight, two for hearing, two for smelling, and the seventh is the tongue to choose different tastes (cf. text no. 73).

Another time, the Greed-Demon fashioned a feminine body with bones, tendons, flesh, veins and skins. She imprisoned the light and splendour of the gods – which were primordially mingled with the offspring of giants and demons – into this feminine body, taught her greed and desire, lust and cohabitation, enmity, vilification and other sinfulness. Therefore, when this feminine creature was born, they called her Eve (Mp. Murdyānag), who is the first woman. Her sinfulness was more that of than Adam, and she was taught the speech and voice of those aborted giants. The Greed-Demon fashioned Eve in the likeness of the feminine body of the Maiden of Light and filled her with sinfulness and lust so as to deceive Adam.

When these two first masculine and feminine human beings were born and grown in the world, the Greed-Demon and the great demons had great pleasure. The chief of the demons established the committee of great giants and demons and told the two human races: "I created the earth and the sky, the sun and the moon, water and fire, trees and plants, domestic and wild animals for you so that you may have pleasure and joy with them. Be happy and grant my wish!" She then appointed a great terrifying dragon as their guard not to let anybody take them away since these great giants and demons are afraid of gods and worried that they come would forth and imprison them. And those two offspring have been fashioned like the face and the body of divinities.

In this way, when the first woman and man began to exist, the Greed-Demon was awake in them. They were filled with rage, dammed up the springs, hurt the trees and all plants and were not afraid of the gods.[1] The Five Elements or five children of the Primordial Man appealed to the Father of Greatness, the Mother of Life, the Primordial Man and the Living Spirit to send someone to redeem those two human beings, to present to them logos and benefaction, and to save them from the Devil and the demons.

The Gods of Light sent off Jesus the Splendour and the Maiden of Light towards the demons to imprison them so as to save the two human beings.[2] Then, Jesus the Splendour returned to Adam and informed him of the secret of the Paradise, Gods, the Realm of Darkness, the Devil, the Greed-Demon and other demons, the earth and skies; he frightened him of Eve and asked him to flee from this evil woman.[3] Having done so, Adam looked up and wept, cried as

[1] Middle Persian text no. 10; the creation of the first woman and man in Coptic texts is greatly influenced by Christian traditions. In Coptic text no. 59, we see that when the first woman and man were created, they stood in the paradise; someone orders them not to eat from the tree so that they cannot discern the good from the evil. But Adam was tempted by Eve and ate the fruit of that forbidden tree. The text is presumably distorted it; it does not have a Manichaean feel. From the Manichaean point of view, the first woman and man were not put in paradise at all while they are the offspring of the demons.

[2] According to a Sogdian text (no. 57), at the time of the rise of Jesus the Splendour, two hundred demons descended from the high sky to the sphere; they become excited and angry in the world because their circulation and spiritual veins are attached to the sphere.

[3] Jesus the Splendour says to Adam that his fathers are in the Paradise of Light and half of Adam's soul is mingled with matter; he stands in front of the stings of the leopards and elephants, the predators and dogs eat it; it is mixed with a groaning lion, plucked his hair, hit on his chest and cried: "Curse, Curse to the fashioner of my body, who drew me into slavery!"[1]

Then, Ashaqlūn cohabited with Eve who gave birth to an ugly offspring named the Red-Haired-Son. Later, this son cohabited with his mother and she gave birth to two daughters named Wise-World and Greed-Daughter. The Red-Haired-Son married Greed-Daughter and let Wise-World marry the White-Faced-Son.

There were divine light and splendour in Wise-World while Greed-Daughter lacked them. One of the angels saw Wise-World and told her: "Keep yourself well, for you will give birth to two sons who fulfill the joy of God." Then, he slept with her and she gave birth to two daughters named Fryād and Pūrfryād. When the White-Faced-Son heard this, he burnt with rage and was filled with sorrow and told her: "How did you bring these two forth? I think they are the offspring of the Red-Haired-Son who has slept with you!" Wise-World told him of that angel. The White-Faced-Son, then, went to his mother and complained of Cain's deed and said: "Do you know what he has done with my sister and wife?" As soon as Cain knew this, he went to the White-Faced-Son and beat on his head with a stone, killed him and took Wise-World as his wife.

When Ashaqlūn and Eve saw this, they became depressed. Ashaqlūn taught her magic doings in order to enchant Adam. She did so and became nude and brought him a diadem of flowers from the Tree of Life. When Adam saw her, he slept with her, filled with everything and is chained in the trap of darkness. Then, he takes Adam up and makes him eat of the 'Tree of Life'.

[1] Syriac text no. 97; we read in the same passage that Jesus the Splendour domesticates Adam with his specific art. He wakes up after drowning in a deep sleep. Jesus the Splendour separates the charming demons from him and binds some of them with chain. In the Arabic text no. 87, we see that Jesus the Splendour puts Ashaqlūn and Naqbā'īl in chains.

a magnitude of lust. Then, Eve became pregnant and gave birth to a pretty and healthy baby.

When Ashaqlūn knew this, he became sorrowful and sick and told Eve: "This is not our baby, it is strange to us!" Eve wanted to kill the baby, but Adam took it with him, placed it on the earth at once and drew seven circles around the baby, called it "Alive' and 'Pure';[1] saying "I'll feed it with cow's milk and fruits!" Then he took the baby and went far away.

Ashaqlūn set off the demons to seize the tree and the cow and to take away them from Adam. As soon as Adam saw this, he took the baby and drew three circles around it. He inscribed the name of the Father of Greatness on the first circle; the Primordial Man on the second; the Living Spirit on the third one. Then he appealed to his God and said: "If I'm sinful, what is this baby's fault?" One of those three divinities approached at once. In this way, Ashaqlūn and the other demons were evaded.

Afterwards, there appeared a tree to Adam. It was a Lotus of which sap was leaking. He fed the baby with the sap, called him by name, and after a while the baby was called Seth.[2]

Ashaqlūn, then, was hostile to Adam and the baby. He told Eve: "Go to Adam, may you return him toward us!" She went and charmed Adam. Then she slept with him lustfully. When Seth saw Adam, he scolded and advised him: "Let's flee to the east, towards divine light and logos!" Adam accepted and did not cohabit with Eve for eighty years and he was a righteous man then.[3] Adam and Seth went to a monastery. Adam stayed there up to the time of his death. Then he flew to Paradise. Seth, Fryād and Pūrfryād and their mother, Wise-World, still stayed there up to the moment of their death. Eve, the Red-Haired-Son and Greed-Daughter went to Hell.[1]

Therefore, all the people are of the race of Adam and Eve. Although they are similar to the Third Messenger and the Maiden of Light, they have also devil-like and demonic features. However, there are particles of light imprisoned in every person. So, their major function is to release them.

After a while, the Great Nous came down and helped human beings with his Five Limbs: Reason, Mind, Intelligence, Thought and Understanding. He, as a son among the gods,[2] along with Jesus the Splendour and the Maiden of Light fashioned the temple of the microcosm, in the same way that the sun, the moon, and the Perfect Man fashioned the temple of the great world or macrocosm.[3]

At last, the gates of the prisons were opened and the imprisoned light-particles were released. All the pious ones and the followers of the Great Nous were saved.[4] The Great Nous sent some messengers for the impure and polluted human beings in order to present them with the fruit of Gnosis.

The Fate of the Soul after Death

If death comes to a righteous one, the Primordial Man will send forth a divinity named the Just Judge as a guide, along with three angels who have a jar of water, a set of garments and a light diadem, respectively. A young figure similar to the righteous one

However, the Devil and the Greed-Demon try to draw their souls to forgetfulness, sleep and intoxication. The awakened soul is called 'the New Man'. This feature is taken from Saint Paul. Cf. M. accompanies them. The Devil, the Greed-Demon and the other demons appear. As the righteous one sees them, he/she seeks help from the Just Judge and the other three angels. They approach him/her. As soon as the demons see them, they flee from there. The divinities take the righteous one with them, they clothe him/her in the garments, put the diadem on his/her head and the jar of water on his/her palm. The righteous one flies through the Column of Glory[1] to the Moon, the Sun and the New Paradise, in front of the Primordial Man and the Mother of Life. His/her corpse remains fallen there. The Sun and the Moon absorb its forces that are water, fire and breeze. What remains of the corpse, consisting of pure darkness, falls into hell. Also Rahangweh Yazd (the best-Chariot-Pulling God), a divinity in the Chariots of the Moon and the Sun, is the gatherer and the keeper of all the saved lights.[2]

[1] The Column of Glory is both a divinity and the passage of the redeemed lights. The Milky Way is one of his manifestations.

[2] In the Middle Persian text no. 8, st. 22, we read: "The Third Messenger stands Rahangweh Yazd in the chariots of the Sun and the Moon in order to...the light and splendour which were swallowed by the demons and takes them in prison..."; unfortunately the rest of the fragment is corrupted, but one can presume that Rahangweh Yazd, lodged in the chariots of the Moon and the Sun, is responsible for gathering and keeping all the redeemed light-particles. Although one can be certain here that the divinity lodges in the chariots of the Sun and the Moon, his/her function has not been discerned in the surviving passages. An intelligent reading of Rahangweh Yazd (the Best-Chariot-Pulling God) is suggested by my colleague Dr. H. Rezā'ī Bāghbīdī ("On the Unknown Epithet of a Manichaean God" in Central Asiatic Journal, ed. G. Stary, 46 [2002] 1, pp. 1-4), but his justification of identifying the deity with Kišwarwāryazd (the Column of Glory) is not sufficiently convincing because the sudden changing of the name and epithet of a deity in a specific short stanza is strange. In addition, the refined and redeemed light-particles (souls) pass respectively through the Column of Glory to the chariots of the Moon and the Sun and finally to New Paradise. So how can the Column of Glory stand in the chariots of the Moon and the Sun?

As for a human being who has accepted the Manichaean religion and accompanied the righteous ones, but who also has done evil deeds, when such a one dies, both the deities and the demons approach him/her. He/she pleads with them and implores them to remember his/her good deeds. The deities will save him/her from the demons' claws.

A sinful human who is overwhelmed with greed and lust, faces the torture and agony of the devil and the demons at the moment of his/her death. The divinities approach him/her bearing nice garments in their hands. He/she thinks that they have come to save him/her while actually they want to scold him/her. He/she is reborn in another body in this inferior material world and remains there for a while until his/her final destiny, falling into hell.

These are the three ways in which human souls will take death: the New Paradise for the righteous one; the horrible world or peril for the enemies who, at the same time, accompany the righteous one and guard the religion; and finally hell for the sinful.[1]

Afterwards, the Primordial Man from the north, the Third Messenger[2] from the east, the Great Architect and the Living Spirit from the west, come forth and stand on the New Paradise looking

[1] Spirit may be embodied many times before redemption. The attitude is influenced by the Buddhist idea of metamorphosis. There are two traditions for the destiny of the spirit at the eve of death: 1) the spirit goes to the Just Judge to be justified. It should either go to the New Paradise or come back again to the world, passing the Mingled Period, or it should go to the inferno; 2) the righteous spirit leaves the body and stands in front of one of the redeeming gods accompanied by three angels who bear its signs of victory: a garland, a diadem, and a celestial garment. The spirit takes all these presents and passes through the Column of Glory to the Moon, the Sun and the New Paradise. Cf. M. Boyce, op. cit., pp. 7-8.

[2] The name of the deity in al-Fihrist of Ibn al-Nadīm is Bashīr 'Messenger' (G. Flügel, al-Fihrist, p. 336; al-Fihrist, Persian tr. by M. Tajaddod, p. 597. The divinity is most probably Narisah Yazd or the Third Messenger. See also D. Dodge, The Fihrist, p. 783, n. 193.

at hell. The righteous ones fly towards those lights, quickly reach the League of Gods and look down at hell and the sinful ones.

The End of the World

At the end of the world, the Devil accompanied by the demons tried to spread evil throughout the world by cohabitation and birth, and therefore, to make the imprisonment of the light-particles eternal. He makes more bodily prisons everyday and tries to deceive women – who have fewer light-particles – and to spread the seeds of lust and cohabitation. In this way, more souls are imprisoned and the release from the material body will be more difficult.

At this time, Jesus[1] comes again and sets up the throne of justice. All the light-particles released by the redeeming gods such as the Third Messenger, Jesus the Splendour, and the Great Nous, fly through the Column of Glory to the moon, the sun, and then to the New Paradise. The process continues until there is nothing left of light that the sun and the moon can refine. Then, Atlas who is the bearer of the eight earths leaves his position. The skies and the earths fall down and they are disordered.[2] The earths break down and the cries of the sinful ones reach up to the skies. The fiery, watery, and poisonous walls and all the columns break down,[3] and a grand fire boils out and burns everything in order to release every particle of light in them. This burning and sparkling of fire lasts 1468 years. When these events end and the evil Darkness sees the redemption of light-particles and the flying of the gods and the guards, it weeps and decides to fight. His armies scold him. Darkness falls at the grave which was dug for him. A rock will be put on him as great as the world. He will be smashed and cannot cause oppression again.[1] Two substances of light and darkness will be separated from each other forever. The last light-particles will be released and they will fashion a divine body called the Last God.[2]

Finally, the New Paradise will join the Paradise of Light. The gods, all the spirits and the released light-particles which have been clothed with the celestial garments, and have diadems of light on their heads and jars of water on their palms, will be in front of the Father of Greatness; a splendid visit that the creation of the material world previously obstructed. Now, the time will be eternal, all beings will become integrated light and the golden primordial era will begin again.

Mani's Pictorial Manifesto

Introduction

What was the Ārdahang (Pe. Arzhang)[1] and what kind of paintings or motifs had it illustrated? This is the quest of our study, which we are to answer to the greatest possible extent allowed by the surviving documents. One can say, first, that the Ārdahang was Mani's pictorial manifesto in the third century of our era. It is quite probable that this lost pictorial masterpiece was illustrated by the prophet's disciples or followers in later eras.[2]

Mani himself states in Kephalaia, a collection of his sayings and discourses, that "all the prophets have written about their religions and wisdom before me, but I have both written and illustrated them."[3]

Mani called his faith the 'Religion of Light'. It is, like all the other Gnostic approaches, a mystic and illuminative doctrine which manifests the descent of the soul of light into the material world. The main motive of the creation of the cosmos is, in fact, the redemption of the imprisoned light-particles from this world.

[1] Arzhang is the Persian name of the Parthian Ārdahang recorded by Classical Persian historians.

[2] Professor Sundermann, after reading the manuscript of this book, among other valuable suggestions, noted that there are some traits that show that the Ārdahang was not illustrated by Mani himself.

[3] Polotsky-Böhlig, Kephalaia II (Stuttgart 1937), p. 154; cf. also I. Gardner, The Kephalaia of the Teacher (Leiden 1995).

Iranian mysticism is also an expression of the imprisonment of the human soul in the material body. So, the Religion of Light is by itself the promoter of a special Iranian Gnosticism which has roots in the Sassanian dynasty and even before that. The passionate song of Nay (traditional flute) described in the Prologue to the Mathnawī of Rūmī, the great Iranian mystic and poet of 13th century AD, expresses such a motif as well.[1] It relates undoubtedly the descent of the human soul and the separation from one's transcendental essence. The separation and alienation of human spiritual essence can be seen through the Religion of Light as the imprisonment of light-essence in this material world and in the material body of human beings.

Mani learned the pictorial tradition from his Gnostic predecessors. He, as well as his father, Patēg, flourished in the community of the Mughtasila (the Baptizing sect). During his life in Babylon, Mani learned the art of painting and drawing, as well as the art of nibēgan-nīgārīh (book-painting) and calligraphy, and in this showed a marvelous talent. He developed his own script based on the Syrian script known as Estrangelo, and many Middle Iranian translations of his books, and those of his disciples, were written in this script.[2]

Arzhang in Classical Persian Literature

Classical Persian literature that speaks of Mani chiefly emphasizes his artistic character and includes some legendary narrations. For instance, the Shahname of Ferdowsi described Mani as follows:

> Here came forth an eloquent man from China
> That the earth never saw such an artist.

Superior to the other prophets.[1]

It is surprising that Mani's detailed biography was not well known in Iran during Ferdowsi's era at the 10th century AD. Ferdowsi called him a painter from China who came forth to the court of Shapur, whose unkindness was so great that it led Mani to an unfortunate destiny. We know, on the contrary, through the documentary Manichaean scriptures of Turfan, that Mani propagandized his religion freely during Shapur's period and even wrote his famous book Šāburagān, of which fragments have been preserved, in his name.[2] Later, during the reign of Bahram, Mani was interrogated and executed, and his followers fled to Central Asia and China. They created a precious literary and artistic tradition in the vast regions throughout the Silk Road.

Bayān al-Adyān (The Expression of the Religions), a classical Persian work written by Abu'l-Ma'ālī, describes Mani's story as follows:

> He was a master of painting who flourished in the kingdom of Shapur, son of Ardeshir. He asserted prophecy among the magi and his demonstration was the art of calligraphy and painting. They say he drew a line on a piece of fine silk. When they took out the silk thread, the line disappeared. He created a pictorial book designed with many kinds of paintings which were called Mani's Arzhang, and it is in the Ghaznein's treasuries.[3]

The document shows that the Ārdahang's paintings were preserved until the end of the 5th century AH/11th AD in Ghazne.

Awfī wrote in his Jawāmi'al-Hikāyāt wa Lawāmi'al-Riwāyāt about Mani the painter:

> ...And his claim was chiefly in the art of painting. He was skillful and perfect at it. And one sign of his skills was that he drew a circle on a large silk cloth. Then he took a compass and circled on it, showing that it was matched with his drawn circle.
> ...and he (Mani) went to India, Kashmir and Tibet. The people of Tibet and Turkistan adhered to him. He made idols and deceived them with his paintings, wandering on the mountains there and not lodging at one place. And during his wandering, when he reached the cleft of a mountain with running water and a fantastic sphere around and a narrow entrance, he then chose that as his lodge and brought food with him for a year. No one knew of him. Then, one day he told his followers: 'I will fly to the heavens and will stay there for one year. After a year, on a certain day, you should come to a certain mount, bringing a horse so that I come with you and announce my religious ceremonies and the gift of my religious law to you.' Then he suddenly concealed himself in the cave, supplying himself with a large epistle in the form of paper scroll which was very fine and white as the shell of an egg. He drew marvelous paintings on it during the year. At the promised day, he took the pictorial epistle into his hand and came out. He said: 'I was serving at the court of the god of heavens. He commanded me to conceal his commandments and this is the book of God.' When the people saw it, and all were impotent to create it; they believed in and confirmed it. They called it Mani's Arzhang and it is still preserved in the treasuries of the emperor of China.[1]

If we accept Awfī's narrative, we can presume that Mani's Ārdahang was at hand in the Turkistan of China up to the beginning of 7th century AH/13th century AD. After Mani's death and the cruel assassination of his followers in the following centuries, most Manichaean artistic works including the Ārdahang were destroyed.

Up to the beginning of the 20th century when Manichaean scriptures were discovered in Turfan, no one knew of the precious treasures of Gnostic-Manichaean literature. [1] The Ārdahang, however, has never been found since then, except some commentaries in Middle Persian and Parthian to which we will refer in the following pages.

Asad Tūsī, quoting from his father, called Mani 'the Painter of Light':

> The Painter of Light cast down the veil of darkness,
> As far as the earth, which, like the sky, became colourful like the Arthang.[2]

One can actually call Mani the Painter of Light, for he always sought light, that is, the light-particles lost among the particles of the material cosmos. The whole world is mingled with darkness and the light-particles of the spiritual realm have been imprisoned in it. The prophesied mission of humans is to release these light-particles.

The Painter of Light offered a new miracle for his prophetic mission: painting and portrait drawing. Ḥamdollāh Mostowfī, an Iranian historian, says:

> In Shapur's dynasty, Mani the painter claimed prophecy, and his prophetic sign was that he drew small and large circles, and short lines > in such a way that when they used compasses and rulers, they saw they were exactly rendered. And he drew the shape of the inhabited quarter of the earth and the other uninhabited three quarters on the globes of some eggs which showed all cities, mountains, seas and rivers. He made a marvelous shirt, such that when somebody put it on it was visible and by putting it off, it was invisible.[1]

To approach such a miracle, Mani had to leave the people, and he preferred solitude. So he sought asylum in a cave in the way that the other prophets did. Therefore, he hid himself from the people's eyes. His absence lasted one year. Mīrkhwānd presents a fantastic description in his Rowḍat al-Ṣafā:

> And Mani was a unique painter. They say he drew a circle with a diameter of five meters. When they examined it with a set of compasses, there weren't any differences in the perimeter at all. Therefore, he became famous and won a vast celebrity in India and Khatā (West China), for he drew marvelous icons and he was continually traveling throughout the eastern countries.
>
> It is said that during his journey he approached a mount which had a cave containing a fantastic space with fresh air and a spring; the cave had only one entrance. Mani, hiding himself from the people, brought food for a year to the cave and told his followers that he would fly to the heavens and his settlement there would last a year. After a year, I will come down to the earth and will bring good news from God to you. And that godless prophet told the community that they should be waiting in a certain place near a cave on the eve of the second year. After this statement of his will, he disappeared and hid himself in the cave. He was busy drawing pictures for a year. He painted marvelous and fantastic portraits on a tablet and called it Mani's Arzhang. After a year, he reappeared near the entrance of the cave holding the tablet in his hand, a tablet painted with novel pictures, adorned with different marvelous icons. Everybody who saw the tablet would say:

[1] Hamdollāh Mostowfī, Tārīkh-e Gozīdeh (Selected History), quoted from A. Afshār Shīrāzī, op. cit., p. 522.

The time will bring a thousand icons
There isn't but one in such a way
That exists in the mirror of our vision.

The people were surprised at seeing the tablet. Mani claimed that he had brought it forth from heaven as his miracle.[1]

The Interpretation of the Ārdahang

What was the Ārdahang and what icons did it exhibit? Undoubtedly its content was so precious that, according to the legends, it forced the Painter of Light to live in a cave alone for a full year. In addition, the Ārdahang's importance was so high that when his death time approached, according to Kephalaia, he foresaw his time of torture and persecution and said:

I weep over the paintings of my Picture[2]

The Ārdahang was undoubtedly Mani's pictorial manifesto. His doctrine was hardly comprehensible due to the complex mythology and various marvelous deities. The motifs such as the wonderful structure of the cosmos with ten firmaments and eight earths, the Arks of the Moon and the Sun, Three Wheels of Light, Wind and Fire, Miraculous Turning Wheel, Three Columns and the Five Arches, and New Paradise. The Light paradise, the Realm of Darkness, the Greed-Demon, and the other similar figures overwhelm the reader in surprise and obscurity.

Obviously, it was inevitable for a painter to draw these marvelous religious motifs and to explain them for the Hearers (Mp. Nīyōšāgān: the lowest rank of Manichaean community). So one can conclude that the icons of the Ārdahang described the cosmogonical doctrine, creation, the process of cosmogony, the structure of the cosmos, the end of the world or eschatology, which would have been presented as some portraits in the shape of a canonical book, precious ritual scrolls or, as they say, in the shape of tablets.

According to some Manichaean manuscripts (e.g. M 219),[1] the tradition of pardeh-khāni (reading through the portraits) in front of the audience was relevant during the pre-Islamic period. Mani enjoyed the tradition greatly, and most probably drew the Ārdahang's icons on the *pardeh*s (curtains) or scrolls. In the Islamic period, this tradition remained alive, as the continuation of an old Sassanian tradition, to explain the epic episodes of the Shahname. The tradition is still alive in some regions of Iran, especially in ghahve-khāneh's (Iranian traditional coffee shops). It is also known as the tradition of naqqālī (minstrelsy), and there are still local minstrels and the manuscripts of naqqālān (minstrels) in some regions.

Only few pieces of interpretation of the Ārdahang have been preserved. One can deduce from the surviving fragments that there was a comprehensive narration of Manichaean religious paintings of which most parts have been destroyed. One of these interpretations is a text from the treatise the Ārdahang Wifrās (The Interpretation of the Ārdahang). It was preserved in a Parthian manuscript, M 35:

> ...and the story of the Great Fire: like unto (the way in which) the Fire, with powerful wrath, swallows this world and enjoys it; like unto (the way in which) this fire that is in the body, swallows the exterior fire that is (lit. comes) in fruit and food and enjoys it. Again like unto (the story in which) two brothers who found a treasure, and a pursuer lacerated each other, and they died; like unto (the fight in which) Ohya, Lewyatin (Leviathan),

[1] See M. Boyce, Reader (Leiden 1975), p. 182, fragment dl.

> and Raphael lacerated each other, and they vanished; like unto (the story in which) a lion cub, a calf in a wood (or: on a meadow), and a fox lacerated them both, [and they vanished, or died]. Thus [the Great Fire swallows, etc.] both of the fires...[1]

The Great Fire is the fire which, according to Manichaean cosmogonical myth, appears at the end of the world, spreads everywhere and swallows the whole universe in such a way that the last particles of light will finally be released.

If we accept that the Ārdahang's pictorial manifesto has drawn the process of creation and eschatology, then, based upon Manichaean manuscripts and various interpretations, we can describe its drawings and ultimately reconstruct it, as I did in the case of the Manichaean creation myth through various scattered texts, including fragments in Middle Persian, Parthian, Sogdian, Coptic, Chinese, etc.[2]

One can even see some pictorial features of the Ārdahang in the surviving works of later eras. Professor Chao Ḥuashan has recently recognized some examples of Manichaean paintings some of which represent cosmogonical themes of the Ārdahang. For instance, the wall-painting of cave no. 38b in Bäzäqlīq shows a picture of the Tree of Life (Shajirat al-Ḥayāt) with worshippers gathering under it; a grand tree with green leaves and twelve grand flowers and innumerable fruits. The Tree of Life is the symbol of the Realm of Light and has three branches representing three phases of creation or three periods of Manichaean cosmogony. Also, in Mānestān (monastery) of North Sangim, cave no. 4, a wall-painting shows the Tree of Life and the Tree of Death, which are entwined with each other. The interweaving of the trees of life and death represents the mingling of light and darkness, according to Manichaean doctrine, and this is most probably considered to be one of the important motifs of the Ārdahang.[1]

Manichaean paintings, however, are influenced by Iranian, Chinese and Buddhist art. The influence causes Manichaean art to imitate Buddhist themes. For instance, one can recognize lotuses in most Manichaean figures of deities. Colours used in the paintings are purple, red, fiery red, blue, yellow and dark green. The artists used gold leaf to enhance the pictures. Eyes are oblique as in Chinese miniatures, and the lips and mouths have been changed to dots with an unparalleled tenderness.[2]

Manichaean art is also rooted in the Parthian art of the Mesopotamian region. We should not, of course, ignore Sassanian artistic tradition. Mani himself learned the Mesopotamian-Syriac pictorial tradition. His followers were undoubtedly inspired by the Parthian art of Mesopotamian regions as well.

The Mongol-Uigur paintings style has also influenced the artistic works of western Turkistan and Iran. However, Manichaean painting – as well as the Religion of Light – is neither Chinese, nor Buddhist, nor Parthian, but uniquely Manichaean because Mani himself was the inventor of a style of painting and a special script and probably the pioneer of Manichaean book-illustration.

It is obvious that Mani was the innovator of miniature art and the first Manichaean artist. Miniature, the art of book-illustration and gilding of the Islamic period, was also influenced by Manichaean art. We can see this influence in the pictorial tradition of the Ilkhanids and the Timurids. Some scholars think that the artistic tradition of Samarkand and Herāt – which itself was under the influence of Manichaean art – even affected the Indian miniature and later painting school of Tibet during the 11-12th centuries AD and was developed by them.[1]

Now, on the basis of the relative comprehensive narration of Manichaean cosmogonical myth, we can tentatively describe the Ārdahang's pictorial manifesto, or rather, based on the surviving documents and manuscripts and the surviving paintings on the Mānestān walls of Turfan, we can reconstruct it in imagination. In addition, I think that we can create a new Ārdahang based on the present documents and narrations considering that the motif of the Ārdahang can still function artistically.

The portraits of the Ārdahang, according to the surviving interpretation, have been most presumably drawn in three parts of a book or three 'screens', 'canvases', or 'tablets' to describe three cosmogonical periods. Most likely, it had been painted both as nibēgān-nīgārīh or book-illustration and as painting canvases according to the tradition of pardeh-khānī or portrait-reading, i.e. narrating religious or epic episodes through portraits.

The function of the Father of Greatness, who is the absolute light and the highest Manichaean deity of the cosmos, is very important. He is described as a four-faced deity who lives in the Light Paradise. According to Manichaean texts, he is shown as an elegant and fertile tree that has never born any bad fruit; he is the absolute light and eternal beauty. The Paradise of Light has a diamond surface, covered with innumerable beautiful mountains, colourful flowers, fruitful trees of the four seasons, fountains of eternal water, gardens, houses, castles and thrones. The motifs of divine figures which might have been illustrated in the Ārdahang, were presumably as follows:

[1] H.- J. Klimkeit, Manichaean Art and Calligraphy (Leiden 1982), pp. 17ff.

The Motifs of the First Creation: the motifs or the figures of the Mother of Life (mother of the cosmos and the bearer of the Primordial Man); the Primordial Man (Son of God, the symbol of eternal and celestial Man; and the personification of the imprisoned soul in body; Five Sons of Light (the children of the Primordial Man who are: Ether, Wind, Water, Light, and Fire); and the Living Self, a deity symbolizing the imprisoned light in Matter.

The Motifs of the Second Creation: the motifs or the figures of the Beloved of the Lights, a deity who is the illuminator of the battlefield in the redeeming process of the Primordial Man accomplished by the Living Spirit and his Sons); the Great Architect (the builder of the New Paradise, a temporary paradise for the refined light-particles delivered by the Arks of the Moon and the Sun in order to attach to the Paradise of Light at the end of the material world); the Living Spirit (the redeemer of the Primordial Man imprisoned by the King of Darkness at the depths of the pit. He is the creator of the material world built on the dead bodies of the devils); Five Sons of the Living Spirit (the Keeper of Splendour: the king of the first firmament and the guard of three upper firmaments among ten firmaments; the King of Honour: the king of the lower seven firmaments; the Adamas of Light: a deity who is standing in the middle of the cosmos watching it; the King of Glory: the revolver of the Three Wheels of Wind, Water and Fire; Atlas: a deity standing on the 5th earth holding all the eight earths on his shoulders and feet, equal to Atlas of Greek mythology); the Call-God (the 6th son of the Living Spirit, a deity who calls the imprisoned Primordial Man and informs him of his situation); the Answer-God (the 6th son of the Primordial Man who answers to the Call-God).

The Motifs of the Third Creation: the motifs or the figures of this phase of creation are: the Third Messenger (a deity of redemption and the pattern of the male body of man); Jesus the Splendour (Messenger and man's guide); the Maiden of Light (the redeemer of some imprisoned light-particles and the pattern of the human female body); the column of Glory (the light-column or the Milky Way through which the pure souls and the released light-particles go up to the Chariots of the Moon and the Sun, and eventually to the New Paradise); Rahangweh yazd (a deity who is standing between the Chariots of the Moon and the Sun gathering and keeping the released light-particles)[1]; the Great Nous (the redeeming deity and the guide of human beings, who has five features: Reason, Mind, Intelligence, Thought, and Understanding); the Just Judge (a deity judging the human soul after death); and Istomen Yazd, the last deity in Manichaean cosmogony who is fashioned of the last redeemed light-particles at the end of the world after the Great Fire.

The above imaginary reconstruction of Manichaean portraits is based mostly on Middle Persian and Parthian fragments and similar texts in Syrian, Coptic, Greek and Arabic. Each of the texts shows some parts of the Manichaean narration of cosmogonical myth, the creation of man and eschatology. It is obvious that the most beautiful scene of the Paradise of Light, the battle of the deities of Light with the devils of Darkness, the creation of the first man and woman (Adam and Eve) and the Great Fire of about 1400 years at the end of the world would be among the most important themes of the pictorial-book of the Ārdahang which was illustrated by the skillful brush of Mani or his disciples. It is obvious that throughout classical Persian literature, Mani was mostly introduced as a painter and portrayer, rather than a prophet. Most of the Persian historical and literary works ignore his real character as a prophet or even as a heretic Gnostic, and if they mention his real personification, they mostly scold his evilness.

[1] See Chapter II, note on Rahangweh.

The Ārdahang was a version of a myth that might be still applicable artistically: clearing out the darkness, the suppression of the devil forces, gathering the imprisoned light-particles in Matter, getting on the Chariots of the Moon and the Sun, and approaching the Father of Greatness's Paradise of Light were always the motifs among human wishes throughout the world, and the Ārdahang was, in fact, the narrator and illustrator of the unattainable wishes of humans.

IV

The Role of the Beloved of the Lights In the Process of Manichaean Cosmogony

Introduction

The Beloved of the Lights, whose Middle Persian name is Rōšnān Xwārist, is the same as the Parthian Frih Rōšn, the first deity of the Second Creation of Manichaean cosmological myth. So far, scholars such as F. C. Andreas and W. B. Henning (1932, 5-6), A.V. W. Jackson (1966, 75), M. Boyce (1975, 5) and some others following them, mentioned the deity with "unknown, doubtful, or obscure" function. Even in a recent decade, Prof. S. Lieu states that the deity's "precise function in the plan [of cosmogony] is obscure" and relying only on the facts expressed in the Fihrist of Ibn al-Nadīm, he says that the deity helps the Primordial Man (Lieu: 1992, 15). And finally, M. Heuser, relying only on the Coptic texts, states that "the role of the Beloved of the Lights is almost totally exhausted in his function as an interim being." (Heuser-Klimkeit: 1998, 33) This chapter, however, based on a comparative analysis of some Middle Persian, Parthian, Arabic, Syriac, and Coptic texts, tries to make clear the deity's function as the first direct emanation of the Second Creation.

Middle Persian and Parthian texts

In a Middle Persian fragment, we see Rōšnān Xwārist (the Sweetest of the Lights)[1] together with a group of high-ranking deities, among them Mādar-ī Zīndagān (the Mother of Life), Mihr Yazd (the Living Spirit), Ōhrmizdbay (the Primordial Man) and Nōgsahāfur Yazd (the Great Architect),

> 'wd myhryzd 'wd srygrqyrb qyrdg'r 'wl 'w 'hr'pt hynd 'wd 'b'g 'whrmyzdby 'wd rwšn'nxw'ryst *'wd nwgšhr'pwryzd hndym'n 'wy whyšt'w šhry'r dstkš 'st'd hynd.'wš''n ngwcyd 'wd zwwpr nm'c bwrd. > And Mihryazd and the female-formed creator (= the Mother of Life) were led up to Paradise. And together with God Ōhrmizd (= the Primordial Man) and the Sweetest One (the Beloved of the Lights) and the New-World-Maker God (= the Great Architect) they stood saluting before the Sovereign of Paradise. And they prostrated themselves and paid deep homage and spoke thus: 'To you, the Lord, we show reverence, [you] who called us forth through your miraculous power and your word of blessing. And through us you bound Āz (the Greed Demon) and Ahreman (the Devil) and the demons and the witches. (Asmussen: 1975, 123)

[1] The adjective xwārist was translated doubtfully into 'sweetest?' by M. Boyce (1977, 100). Andreas-Henning translated it as 'the most blessed of' (1932, 5). The word comes from the Old Iranian xwarzišta-. We can also take it from xw'r 'good", as it appears in a geographical name Xwārazm (good earth); Av. Xvārizəma- (Reichelt: 1968, 97. 111). In Mazandarani or Tabari, an old dialect of Northern Iran, my native language, xw'r / x'r means 'good, lovable' and it is still used as a living word. Nyberg takes xw'r from xwāhr as 'easy, agreeable' (Nyberg: 1974, 220); and Mackenzie as 'light, easy' (Mackenzie: 1971, 95). The Avestan xvāθra- is substantive (hu + aθra-* ('breathing': Skt: Ainti') 'comfort, happiness, paradise'. The adjective form is xvāθravam 'happy, blessed' (Reichelt: 1968, 281).

The Parthian name of the deity is Frih Rōšn (the Beloved Light).[1] In a Parthian text, M 2 II, we read, > `wt kd hrwyn rzmywz'n rngs jm'n `ndr nw'g šhr `ngwd, `wd hwyc qmbyft cy zmyg rwšn `wd qwf'n, `c kw, nw'g šhr dyštn r'd, ``bc'r 'zgryft bwt, `w wxybyh pdm'n gd, `wt 'stwmynyc yzd pt bšn'n hynz'wrystr `wyšt'd, `wt bg'n rzmy'hyg `d pnj rwšn `c xdm drwšt bwt, `b'w `xyzynd hrwyn rdnyn, fryštg'n `wd bg'n rzmywz'n, `wd `wyštynd pt pdwhn `wd wyndyšn `w whyšt šhrd'r: nxwšt `whrmyzdbg `d 'stwmyn yzd, `rd'w'n m'd, fryhrwšn, nrysf yzd, b'myzd, w'd jywndg, yyšw`zyw', qnygrwšn, `wd mnwhmyd wzrg. (Boyce: 1975, 86, st. 7)

> And when all the fight-seekers rested in the New City (New Paradise) for a while, and also that small part of the earth of light and mountains(?), which it used [as a] tool to make the New City, it came to its convenient place, and also Istomen Yazd (the Last God) stood with the most powerful figures, and the fighting deities with five lights were cured of injury, then all the jems, angels and fight-seeker deities rose, and stood to bestow praise on the King of Paradise: first the Primordial Man with Istomen Yazd (the Last God), the Mother of Life, the Beloved Light, the Third Messenger, the Great Architect, the Living Spirit, Jesus the Splendour, the Maiden of Light and the Great Nous.

Also in Angad Rōšnān I, a Parthian hymn-cycle, we read,

> `ngd rwš(n)'n 0 fry'ng pt `xšd > dhwm (z'wr w) hwfry'd 0
> pd hrwyn d'hw'n
> (`w mn gryw) xwd'y 0 wyn'r'h `wm pdw'c'h
> (`wm hwfry'd)(`)h 0 mdy `n dwšmnyn > hrwyn wyg'nyšn 0 (`)c mn wyd'r'h > cy hwyn tnb'r dbgr 0 kym pd drd `bj'myd.

[1] 'Frih', in my opinion, is an adjective here meaning 'beloved' not a substantive as Prof. Boyce translated it as 'the Friend of the Light' (Boyce: 1975, 9; 1977, 40); see also Sogdian noun fry'wy (friyāwe) 'love, desire' (Gharib: 2004, 156-7).

Rich Friend of the beings of Light! In mercy, grant
Me (strength and) succour me with every gift!
Array (my soul), O Lord! Respond to me!
(Succour me) in the midst of the foe!
Make pass from me all the ravages of their deceitful
Body that tortures me with pain.
(Boyce: 1954, 112-113)

On rwšn'n fry'ng, it seems to me that it is an equivalent for Rōšnan Xwārist (the Sweetest of the Lights) instead of fryh rwšn. It can be translated as 'the Beloved of the Lights', or 'the Beloved Light'. A justification for seeing rwšn'n fry'ng in this way is that in the fourth line of the cited fragment, we see 'xwd(')y' as addressed to the deity.

The first Middle Persian fragment quoted above describes the final scene of the Second Creation in which the Living Spirit, having made the world, goes with the other gods of this creation before the Father of Greatness, to entreat him to evoke the Third Messenger. In this way, the process of Third Creation commences.

We are faced, therefore, with a significant deity of this stage of creation who is not, of course, 'an interim figure' as M. Heuser states. (Heuser: 1998, 33)

According to the Parthian text of Angad Rōšnān I, 'the Friend of the beings of Light' is a strength / gift bestower and a helper of man among the 'foes and all the ravages of their deceitful bodies.'

Arabic texts

One of the oldest Arabic texts on Manichaeism, surviving more than a century before Ibn al-Nadīm's al-Fihrist[1], is Kitāb al-Radd-i

[1] The oldest surviving Arabic text on Mani and Manichaeism is, of course, Tawḥīd al-Mufaḍḍal, dictated by Imām Ja`far Ṣādiq (d. 148 AH / 770 AD) to Mufaḍḍal Ibn-i `Umar al-Ja`fī; a short fragment in Kitāb al-Khawās al-Kabīr by Jābir Ibn-i Ḥayyān (d. 161 AH / 783 AD); Kitāb al-Ḥayawān, composed by

'la'l-Zandīq al-La`īn Ibn-i Muqaffa` (The Book of Refutation against the Damned Zandīq Ibn-i Muqaffa`) composed by Qāsim Ibn-i Ibrāhīm (d. 246 AH / 848 AD).[1]

Throughout the surviving parts of this book, we see the name of the Beloved of the Lights as 'Ḥabīb al-Anwār' among the great deities such as 'Abu'l 'Aẓimat = the Father of Greatness', '`Umm'l-Ḥayāt al-Mutinassimat / Mutibassimat = the Pleasant / Refreshing or the Smiling / Joyful Mother of Life', and an epithet of the Great Architect's helpers as 'ḥurrās al-khanādiq wa'l-aswār = the guards of the ditches and towers' as follows, > alam tarū asmā'ahum allati yusammūna wa mā minhā lāghayrih[2] yu`aẓẓimūna faminhā 'indahum Abul-'Aẓimat wa Ummal-Ḥayāt al-Mutinassimat[3] wa Ḥabīb al-Anwār wa hurrās al-khanādiq wal-aswār wal-Bashīr wal-Munīr wal-Insān al-Qadīm wa mā dhakarū min al-arākina allatī 'alayhim bihā(bihā 'alayhim) min allāh all'n alla'natuh wa mā qālū min 'Amūd al-Sabḥ[4] allati bihim biqawlihim fīhā aqbaḥu mā yustaqbahu wa akdhabu akādhīb al-zawr wa a'jab al-a'ājīb('ajāyib) mā wasafū min al-ẓulmati wal-nūr.[5]

[1] This book was translated into Italian by Michelangelo Gyuidi (in 54 pp text, 28 pp. intro. and 127 pp. trans.) in Rome in 1927. The translator used four manuscripts signed A, B, C, and D. It is not precisely known that the book is truly a refutation against Ibn-i Muqaff`. See A. Afshār Shīrāzī: 1957, p. 80-81.

The other section of the fragment refers to Manichaean deities as, > fayāwaylahum waylan waylā min aqāwīlihim qīlan qīlā fī Abī 'Aẓimatihim wa Umma Ḥayātihim wa Ḥabīb al-Anwārihim wa Bashīrihim wa Munīrihim wa 'Amūd al-Sabḥihim wa Insānihim wa mā t'abbathū fīhi min arākinihim fa'azzamū minhā ghayri ma'nā wa sammawhā kadhiban bil-asmā' al-husnā.[2]

> Woe to them, Woe! Woe to their sayings, nonsense sayings on the Father of Greatness, the Mother of Life [3], the Beloved of the Lights, the Third Messenger, the Maiden of the Light, the Column of Glory, and the [Primordial] Man, and what they say nonsense of the archons, so they honoured those nonsense names and called Good Names as wicked.

The longest and most authentic Arabic text, however, on Manichaean cosmogony is undoubtedly the Fihrist of Ibn al-Nadīm, which calls the Beloved of the Lights as Ḥabīb al-Anwār:

> wa itba'ahu malika janān al-nūr bi ilāhati ākhir wastanqadhahu wastazahara 'alal-ẓulmat wa yuqālu lihādhā alladhī itba'a bihil-Insān,

---

[1] In other Arabic texts, the deity is called Ilāhat al-Nayyirūn (the Goddess of the Light-givers). See Bahār-Esmailpour: 2005, 76.
[2] Ibid., p. 83.
[3] Here without the epithet of al-mutinassimat/al-mutibassimat.

Ḥabīb al-Anwār fanuzila wa khalasa al-Insān al-Qadīm min al-jahannamāt mu'ammian akhadha wa asara min arwāḥ il-ẓulmat.[1]

And the King of Paradise of Light sent another God [2] following him (the Primordial Man) and saved him, and conquered against Darkness. And this (deity) who was sent following the (Primordial) Man is called Habīb al-Anwār. He fell down and saved the Primordial Man of hells (pits) and took some parts of the spirits of Darkness, and bound them.

The adjective 'habīb' (beloved) is worthy of note. It mostly denotes the angelic and feminine (divine or earthly) figures, and it is quite the opposite of 'muḥib' (lover).[3] In addition, the Fihrist used 'ilāh' (god), not 'ilāha' (goddess) for the other gods such as the Father of Greatness, the Call-God, and sometimes 'malak' (angel) for the other deities.

It is also noteworthy that in other manuscripts of the Fihrist used by Flügel and in an Egyptian manuscript published in 1348 AH / 1970 AD as well, we never see 'ilāh' (god) in spite of frequent differences of words and expressions quoted by Flűgel and other scholars. However, it is not known why Flügel has translated 'bi-ilāh'/ 'bi-āliha' as 'god/gods'. Perhaps he had in mind angels without any specific sex.

On the other hand, a Persian translator of the Fihrist, the late Prof. M. R. Tajaddod, who annotated another Arabic text, and used

[2] Here the word 'bi-ilāha' can be also read as Goddess. Thus, Prof. M. Abolqāsemī, Iranian scholar and the editor of the Manichaean chapter of the al-Fihrist, following Flügel's translation presented the deity as a masculine figure; so he had to change 'bi-ilāa' (goddess) into 'bi-ilāh' (god). See M. Abolqāsemī, Mānī be Revāyat-e Ibn-i Nadīm (Tehran 1379/2001), pp. 19, 46: n. 50.

a quantity of authentic manuscripts to translate the Fihrist into New Persian, took the deity to be 'elāhe' (goddess):

> The angel of the Paradise of Light sent forth another goddess following Him (the Primordial Man) and saved him and conquered Darkness, and the one who came down following the (Primordial) Man and released the Primordial Man of those hell-beings and took captives from the spirits of Darkness, was called Ḥabīb al-Anwār (the Beloved of the Lights).

Syriac texts

One of the most coherent and vital accounts of Manichaean cosmology can be seen in the Syriac anti-Manichaean writings of Theodore bar Konai. It has been suggested that he based his criticism directly on one or two of Mani's original books, Pragmateia and Epistula Fundamenti.[2]

P. van Lindt raises a thoughtful, but unanswered, question on the function of the Beloved of the Lights. He writes,

> The function of different figures mentioned by Theodore bar Konai remains unclear. An example is the Beloved of the Lights, one of the main evocations of the Father of Greatness. Why does he precede, together with the Great Architect, the key figure of the Living Spirit? Would it not have been more meaningful that the Living Spirit was evoked immediately by the Father of Greatness, just like his pair the [1] Tajaddod: 1988, 586.

[2] Tardieu (1981, 56) suggests Pragmateia, but Cumont and Krugener (1912, 4) suggest Epistula Fundamenti. Cf. also Lindt: 2000, 378.

Mother of Life? Is the order coincident or has it a deeper purpose?" (Lindt: 2000, 387)

The answer to the first question will be made clearer in the last part of the paper through analyzing Syriac texts. The fact at hand now, is that Syriac texts on Manichaean cosmological myth allude to two significant figures: the angel Nḥšbṭ (Naḥašbaṭ?), and ḥbyb nhyr' (the Beloved of the Lights), as follows,

1 And he says: then an angel named Naḥašbaṭ came forth to see the Primordial Man, holding the diadem of victory in her hand.
2 And he says: Naḥašbaṭ threw light before the Primordial Man, and as the King of Darkness saw this, he showed reflection and said: What I sought for afar, I found at my hand. Consequently, the Primordial Man gave himself and his Five Sons as well, as 'food' to the King of Darkness.
3. Then in the second evocation, the Father of Greatness evoked the Beloved of the Lights (Syr: ḥbyb nhyr').The Great Architect evoked the Living Spirit (Syr: rwḥ' ḥy').
4. They came into the Realm of Darkness and found that the Primordial Man and his Five Sons had been swallowed by Darkness.[1]

Naḥašbaṭ, as the above quoted Syriac fragment conspicuously demonstrates, is an angel who came to meet the Primordial Man with the Crown of Victory throwing light before him.

So the deity's function would be to guide the Primordial Man (Lieu: 1992, 14) and presumably to light the scene of the battlefield. Naḥašbaṭ, though clearly different from the Beloved of the Lights, may be identical with Maiden (without any specific epithet) praised frequently in some Coptic texts such as A Manichaean Psalm-Book.

Coptic texts

Coptic texts are not silent about the Beloved of the Lights, but one may be confused with different usage of Light, Lights, Maiden, Maiden of the Light, or the Beloved of the Lights.

However, pe merit n nouaine (the Beloved of the Lights), referred to many times in Coptic texts (but only six times in A Manichaean Psalm-Book), is undoubtedly the same Ḥabīb al-Anwār mentioned in Arabic and Syriac texts and the same Rōšnān Xwārist / Frih Rōšn of the Middle Persian / Parthian fragments. We are also faced with frequent descriptions of the Maiden of Light in A Manichean Psalm-Book, who is sometimes identical with the Living Self (a deity made up of the Five Elements) of the First Creation; at other times she is identical with the Maiden of Light of the Third Creation.

The Beloved of the Lights in A Manichaean Psalm-Book,

> ...Our father, the First Man of Glory
> Whose victory and garland are blessed,
> The Beloved of the Lights that wears the crown...
> For Salvation...
> The Good One, the Great Builder, the first of the...
> ...to the New Aeon to form it..."
>
> (Manichaean PsB. ccxix)

> This is the day of the First Man
> This is the day of the Beloved of the Lights;
> The Holy day is that of the Great Builder
> Who builds the New Aeon.
>
> (Manichaean PsB. ccxxxv)

Whenever the Beloved of the Lights is referred to, the 'lights' is first plural, sometimes with the epithet of 'Luminaries' (Manichaean PsB. ccxxvii); afterwards he is always recited after the Primordial Man and before the Great Architect and the Living Spirit.

In one of the Manichaean Psalms (Ps. Ψαλμοί Σαρακωϊώυ?), there is a marvelous description of the deity:

> The Second Emanation
> The Beloved of the Lights
> The Lovable of the Angels
> The giver of garlands to the...
> The Ordainer of everything
> His son that is begot.
> Who is the Great Builder
> The Builder of the New Aeon...
> (Allberry: 1938, 137)

What was confusing for the Coptic writer or scribe, and for Theodore bar Konai as well, was that these might have been three figures confused: the Beloved of the Lights, the Maiden (who is sometimes praised as the Living Self, rather than the Maiden of Light, in A Manichaean Psalm-Book), and Naḥašbaṭ the angel.

In the second Coptic fragment quoted above, the composer or the scribe might have been confused about the figure, because the giver of the diadem/garland to the Primordial Man is Naḥašbaṭ of the Syriac texts. The use of the epithet 'Angel' is notable.

The other surprising epithet of the Beloved of the Lights is that he is the 'Ordainer of everything'. The deity bears this significant power because the Father of Greatness resigns after his second direct Emanation, i.e. after the emanation of the Beloved of the Lights he assigns the function of continuing the process of creation to him.

Now we can answer the question brought up by M. van Lindt who asked why the Beloved of the Lights precedes the Great Architect and the key figure of the Living Spirit who is the redeemer of the Primordial Man in the Second Creation. It is because the Beloved of the Lights, like the Mother of Life, is the Father's 'direct Emanation' and the 'Ordainer of everything' at this stage. So, the Beloved of the Lights 'begets' (according to A Manichaean Psalm-Book), or 'evokes' (according to Syriac text) the Great Architect who helps the Living Spirit to end the process of cosmogony in the Second Creation. Here, the Mother of Life and the Primordial Man are comparable with the Beloved of the Lights and the Great Architect.

Naḥašbaṭ of the Syriac text, in my opinion, is the same Maiden (Allberry: 1938, 137, 162) who is identical with the Living Self (made up of the Five Elements) and quite different from the Maiden of Light, a significant goddess of the Third Creation). Both Naḥašbaṭ and the Maiden throw light before the Primordial Man and help him in the Battlefield,[1]

> Maiden equipped with five powers
> That might fight against the five abysses of the Dark.
> (Manichaean PsB, ccxxiii)
>
> Or,
>
> His (the Primal Man's) beloved Daughter
> ...of her Father
> Who died for her brethren
> Her brother, the Living Wind...
> (Allberry: 1938, 137)

In Syriac texts, we have both Naḥašbaṭ and Ḥabīb Nehīra whose functions, as mentioned above, are clear to some extent. The obscurity lies with Ḥabīb al-Anwār of the Arabic version. If we suggest Naḥašbaṭ as Maiden 1 (=the Living Self) of A Manichaean Psalm-Book rather than the Maiden of Light as Maiden 2, we can come a pace forward. Ḥabīb al-Anwār, as Ibn al-Nadīm describes in his al-Fihrist, has both functions of Naḥašbaṭ / Ḥabīb Nehīra and Maiden 1 / the Living Self, i.e. throwing light before the Primordial Man, and consequently being his helper, and the vital function of being a significant deity as the direct Emanation of the Second Creation, and the second Emanation of the Father of Greatness during the whole process. The problem would become clearer if we consider that Arabic texts lack the figures such as Naḥašbaṭ or the Maiden 1(=the Living Self). Then, Maiden 2 (=Maiden of Light) would be active for the Third Creation.

[1] Cf. also Heuser: 1998, 28.

Considering the attributes of the Beloved of the Lights, including the Most Lovable, the Sweetest, Ḥabīb (beloved, not Muḥib or Lover), Frih (dear, beloved) Light, and Angel (just once in A Manichaean Psalm-Book), one can deduce that these qualities are mostly used for angelic or feminine figures. The word 'beloved' could be associated with 'maiden' rather than a male figure in the minds of the composers or scribes, especially in eastern regions.

On the other hand, among the twelve attributes emanated by the Father of Greatness, as Professor Gharib states, "with which they accomplish their cosmic actions", the fifth is 'zeal' which is an endowment of the Beloved of the Lights, who "accepts to go to the enemy camp to help the captives, and shows the way to the Primal man" (Gharib: 2002, 19-20).

The word 'zeal' (Pth: abrang; Sgd: audux) itself refers to a lovable case; the New Persian equivalent is 'dil' (heart). Therefore, we face similar, and easily confused attributes for them, including the Beloved of the Lights, Maiden 1 (the Living Self), Maiden 2 (=the Maiden of Light), Daughter of the Father. The latter may refer to Naḥašbaṭ, or the Living Self.

Conclusion

As far as the texts show, we have three significant and separate Emanations. The First Emanation is the Mother of Life who forms a triad with the Primordial Man and the Living Self. The Second Emanation is undoubtedly the Beloved of the Lights who forms another triad along with the Great Architect and the Living Spirit. The Third Emanation is the Third Messenger who forms the final cosmological triad of deities with Maiden of Light and Jesus the Splendour. It is notable that the Third Emanation, the Third Messenger (Narisah Yazd in Middle Persian texts) has both feminine and masculine figures (Boyce: 1975, 7). Thus, we can suggest this two-fold character for the Beloved of the Lights too. However, this hypothesis needs deeper examination.

V

Manichaean Gods and Goddesses in Kitāb al-Radd-i 'la'l-Zandīq al-La'īn Ibn al-Muqaffa'

One of the oldest Arabic texts[1] on Mani and Manichaeism is a precious treatise named Kitāb al-Radd-i 'al'l-Zandīq al-La'in Ibn al-Muqaff'(The Book of Refutation against the Damned Zandīq Ibn al-Muqaff') composed by Qāsim Ibn-i Ibrāhīm (d. 246AH / 868AD).[2]

The treatise survived more than a century before al-Nadīm's Kitāb al-Fihrist and was translated into Italian by Michelangelo Gyuidi (in 54 pp. text, 28 pp. introduction, and 127 pp translation) published in Rome in 1927. In his introduction, Gyuidi states that he used four manuscripts of the treatise marked with the signs of A, B, C, and D. It is obvious that the book was composed in the first half of the 9th century AD. However, it is not definitely known that

However, they do not refer to Manichaean deities directly. Cf. Tawḥīd al-Mufaḍḍal, narrated by Mufaḍḍal Ibn al-'Umar Ja'fī, Najaf, 1369 AH / 1949 AD, pp. 5-90; Jābir Ibn al-Ḥayyān, Kitāb al-Khawās al-Kabīr, ed. Paul Kraus (Cairo, 1354 AH / 1933 AD), pp. 224-332.

[2] M. Gyuidi, Kitāb al-Radd-i 'al'l-Zadīq al-La'in Ibn al-Muqaff' (Rome 1927); A. Afshār Shīrāzī, Mutūn-i Arabi va Fārsi dar bāre-ye Mānī va Mānavīyyat, appended in S. H. Taqīzādeh, Mānī va Dīn-i `ū (Tehran 1957).

the book was really a refutation against Ibn al-Muqaffʿ, or against the whole Manichaean doctrine. Although Ibn al-Muqaffʿ is directly addressed in the title of the treatise and is damned by the composer, it is obvious that the treatise pays attention only to the Manichaean dualistic doctrine of light and darkness which threatened the Islamic society at that time and was mostly refuted by the zealot theologians.

The main theme of the treatise is to refute the zandīqs or the dualists, especially a Manichaean sect whose leader was called by the writer Mani al-Zandīq. In the author's words, > thumma inna firqatan min al-kafara qādahā iṣyānuhā wa na'aqa naqadhatihā fill-kufra wal-'amā shaytānuha imāmuha al-muqaddam wa sayyidihā al-mu'aẓẓam Mānī al-kāfar mā ni'amallāh al-la'īn alladhī lam yabliq kafara qat billāh al-shayātīn.[1]

>
> A sect of pagans guided by their rebellion that cried and was influenced by paganism, and the blindness of their Satan who was their first Imam (leader) and their mighty lord, Mani the pagan to whom the God may not keep the damned whose paganism never reached the god of the devils.

The author then refers to Mani's doctrine of two contradicted elements of light and darkness, > faza'ama annal-ashyā'a kullihā shay'an wa qad yūjadu khilāfu za'imihi bil-'iyān. falā tūjida bayna mā dhukara min al-nūri wal-ẓulmat firqatan illā wujidat al-ashyā'u kullihā bimithlihi lahā mufāriqatun illā anna al-firqatan bayn al-ashyā'i owjida wa min al-ashyā' lilnūr wa ẓulmat.[2]

[1] Guidi: 1927, 4; Afshar Shirazi: 1957, 77.
[2] Ibid.

> Then he supposed that all things consist of two substances but the opposite side of his supposition is clearly true; and there is no difference (or separation) between the mentioned light and darkness unless there were a separation among the whole things like those two [substances] except the separation among things is clearer and there are things among them that emphasize the darkness.

The dispute on the doctrine of dualism continues throughout the treatise in order to prove its falsehood. Sometimes the author quotes indirectly from Manichaean writings:

> 1. thumma qāla tahakkimā waftarā za'amā anna al-ashyā'a kullihā min al-nūr wal-ẓulmat mizājun wa annahu lam yakun baynahumā fī mā khalā min dahrihimā imtizājun.[1]
>
> Then he (Mani) said domineeringly and accuses suspiciously that all things are mixed with light and darkness, and that there has not been any mixture between them for a long time.
>
> 2. wa qāla fi awlāhimā lam yamtazijā thumma qāla ukhrāhumā imtazajā fajama'ahumā 'indahu fil-imtizāj.[2]
>
> And [Mani] said [that] they (light and darkness) were not first mixed. Finally it was ordered to be mixed together and to be gathered in amalgamation.
>
> 3. faqāla bil-nūru wal-ẓulmatu mizājāni wa min var'ihimā falahumā aslān. hal yūjid min dhālika lahum illā mā yūjadu liman·khālafahum.[3]

---

[1] Ibid.
[2] Gyuidi: 1927, 5; Afshar Shirazi: 1957, 78.
[3] Ibid.

Then he said [that] light and darkness are mixed together and beyond them, there are two principles for them. In this case, do they find anything except for their opposites?

4. thumma yuqālu lahum ayḍan ḥaddithūnā 'an nūr al-shamsi wa mā yubāshiru abṣār al-mubṣirīn minha 'inda shurūqihi bil-lamsi....[1]

Then, it is told about sun's light and what the beholders watch while [it is] shining concretely... .

5. wa za'amū annal-shay'a lā yakūna minha abadan illā mithli jawharihi mujtami'an wa mufradan. wa sha'n al-nūr al-'luw wal-irtifāu wa sh'n al-ẓulmati al-sufūl wal-itḍā' wa kadhalik sha'nu kulli ḍiddayn matā wujiddan mutaḍāddayn matā 'alā hādhā hawā hādhā fahuwa abadan yahwi eddhā ḍidduhu samā wa yusammū idhā ḍidduhu hawā. wa fī firāq al-shay'. lisha'nihi ḥaqīqatun fanā'ihi wa buṭlānihi kal-nāri allatī min sha'nihā al-taskhīnu wallīnu alladhī lāyakūu illā walahu talīyīnu qamtay baṭalat sha'nuhumā baṭalat labuda 'aynahumā liannahu lāḥāra illā muskhkhinun wa lālīn abadan alumalīn.[2]

And they supposed that nothing of it does create eternally except it is convened and individual; the dignity of light is mighty and sublime; and the dignity of darkness is inferior and longing for lowness. And also the dignity of both opposite things, whenever they are found, and as far as they stand in this nature, when he ascends, the [other] descends, he always descends if its opposite comes up. And everything that is separated from its real dignity will be destroyed, such as fire of which the characteristics are heating and softening; for there is never fire except with its softening [nature]. Whenever these two characteristics run away from it, its essence will be false. Why? Because there is no heat unless there is a heater and there is no softness unless there is a thing that softens.

6. wa qad za'amū annal-nūr qad zāla 'an dārihi min al-'ulā wa ṣāra ilā hādhihil-arḍ al-suflā wa fī dhālik min taghyīrihi mā qad qīla min buṭlān 'aynihi wa kadhālik al-ẓulmatu fī buṭlānuhā idhā ṣārat ilā khilāfa sh'nuha faṣārat fī manzilihā suflā ilal-irtifā` wa mu'talā fahumā fīqawlihim qad baṭulā....[1]

They said that light is separated from its lofty abode and has descended to its inferior, earth, and in this transformation, it was said that its essence has lost its substance; and such is darkness in its falsehood if it is opposing its dignity, then it turns into its inferior position, and such is darkness in losing its dignity. Then, according to their (Manichaeans') saying, they [light and darkness] will be false....

Towards the final pages of the manuscript (Gyuidi: 1927, 52-54), the author refers to eight Manichaean deities. Here the author reveals his enmity and orthodox attitude. For he criticizes the Manichaeans obscenely. He writes, f*awaylun lahum mimmā katabata aydīhim wa waylun lahum mimmā yaksibūn [al-Qur'ān al-karīm, sūrat al-baqara, āyat 83] wa biayy mutala'abi qātalahum allāha yatal'abūn. alam tarū asmā'ahum allati yusmmūna wa mā minhā lāghayrih (lāghayriha) yu`aẓẓimūna faminhā 'indahum Abul-'Aẓimati wa Ummal-Ḥayāt al-Mutinassimati* [2] wa Ḥabīb al-Anwāri wa hurrās al-khanādiq wal-aswāri wal-Bashīr wal-Munīr wal-Insān al-Qadīm wa mā dhakarū min al-arākina allatī 'alayhim bihā (bihā 'alayhim) min allāh all'n alla'natuh wa mā qālū min 'Amūd al-Sabḥ allati bihim biqawlihim fīhā aqbaḥu mā

yustaqbahu wa akdhabu akādhīb al-zawr wa a'jabu a'ājīb ('ajāyib) mā wasafū min al-ẓulmati wal-nūr.[1]

Vow to them on account of what they have written, vow to them on account of what they do. In which playground are they playing? May God kill them! Do you not see the names to which they are called, and there are not among these names except those who are revered including Abu'l-'Aẓimat (the Father of Greatness), 'Umm'l-Ḥayāt al-Mutinassimat / al-Mutibassimat (the Pleasant / Smiling Mother of Life), Ḥabīb al-Anwār (the Beloved of the Lights), ḥurrās al-khanādiq wa'l-aswār (the guards of the ditches and towers), al-Bashīr (the Third Messenger), wa'l-Munīr (the Maiden of Light) and al-Insān al-Qadīm (the Primordial Man); and what have been mentioned of the archons, who would be damned with the worst curses, and what have been told of the 'Amūd al-Sabḥ (the Column of Prayer [Glory]) that in their word, it is the filthiest thing which is dishonoured and is the most deceitful cruel deceits and the most surprising which are described of light and darkness.

Again, the gods and goddesses are mentioned at the end of the treatise, this time without stating the 'guards of the ditches and towers' and blaming the Manichaeans for their dishonest deed of mixing the holy names with filthiness and falsehood.[2]

So we are faced with seven deities in Kitāb al-Rad, including the following (respectively according to their ranks and positions in the three phases of Manichaean cosmogony).

The Golden Age (before the First Creation)

1. Abu'l 'Aẓimat = the Father of Greatness. The greatest god of the Manichaean pantheon. He is beyond the material world and lives in the Paradise of Light. In the Fihrist of al-Nadīm, he is called Malik-i Janān al-Nūr (the King of the Light Paradise). (Flügel: 1925, 328, 329) The name in Kitāb al-Rad appears to be translated from Syriac texts with the equivalent name as 'b' drbwt', (bar Konai: 1981, 313), while al-Nadīm apparently quotes the term directly from Middle Persian texts whyšt'w šhry'r 'the King of Paradise' (Boyce: 1975, 8). It is confirmed in al-Milal wa'l-Niḥal (Shahristāni: 1972, 192; Abolqāsemī: 2004, 45-46, 145-146) as Malik al-Nūr or Malik al-'Ālam al-Nūr whose New Persian equivalent is Shahryār-e Nūr (the King of Light) or Shahryār-e Behesht-e Rowshanī (the King of Light Paradise). However the deity is called Bonus Pater in Latin sources, and pydr wzwrgyft (the Father of Greatness) in Parthian texts. (Bahār-Esmailpour: 2005, 72)

The First Creation: The Period of Mixing of Light and Darkness

2. 'Umm'l-Ḥayāt al-Mutinassimat = the Pleasant Mother of Life. A goddess and the mother of the whole life who is considered as the most important deity of the First Creation or the first phase of cosmological periods. Her original Syriac name is 'ma' dhy' 'the Mother of the World'. (bar Konai: 1981, 313) The Arabic equivalent is 'Umm'l-Ḥayāt. Our text appears to present another unique epithet for the goddess, that is, al-Mutibassimat

(Smiling).[1] (Flügel: 1925, 329) Her other names are: Mp. m'dr y zyndg'n / zyndg'n m'dr; Pth. m'd zywndg / 'rd'w'n m'd 'the Mother of the Righteous ones' / m'd rwšn 'the Mother of the Light' / xwšyzg 'Sweet, Pleasant' / 'whrmyzdbg m'd 'the Mother of the Primordial Man'. (Bahār and Esmailpour: 2005, 72) The other epithet of the goddess in Middle Persian fragments M 981, M 991, and M 7980-84, is srygrqyrb qyrdg'r 'the Female-Body Deity'. (Boyce: 1975, 63, St. 8, 67, St. 21) She is the first evocation of the Father of Greatness to oppose the invasion of Darkness. The Mother of Life evokes the Primordial Man who is the third deity mentioned in the treatise.

3. Al-Insān al-Qadīm = the Primordial Man. His original Syriac name is 'nš' qdmy' 'the Primordial Man' (bar Konai: 1981, 314), who is the symbol of man descended into the material world and the process of his release is the redemption of man's descended soul. His other names are: Mp. 'whrmyzdby 'God Ohrmyzd', n'zwgz'dg 'the Son of Graceful'; Pth. 'whrmyzdbγ, mrd hsyng 'the Eternal Man', mrdwhm nxwyn 'the First Man' and Primus Homo in Latin texts. (Bahār-Esmailpour: 2005, 72) The imprisonment of the Primordial Man is the symbol of the Fall of Light in the material world.

The Second Creation
(The Period of Release of Light and the Creation of the Material World)

4. Ḥabīb al-Anwār = the Beloved of the Lights. The deity's original Syriac name is ḥbyb nhyr' (bar Konai: 1981, 314)

[1] The other manuscript (with the sign of D) which M. Gyuidi used in his edition of Kitāb al-Rad mentions 'al-Mutibassimat' (smiling) which appears for the first time for the deity. See Afshār Shīrāzī: 1957, 82; Flügel: 1925, 3329.

whose function is Manichaean cosmogony is not precisely known, but according to Kitāb al-Fihrist of Ibn al-Nadīm, he is a pioneer who was instrumental in loosening the Primordial Man from the chains of Darkness (Lieu: 1992, 15). Al-Nadīm writes, > wa atba'ahu malika janān al-nūr bi ilāhati ākhar wastanqadhahu wastazhara 'alal-ẓulmati wa yuqālu lihādhā alladhī ittaba'a bihil-Insān, Ḥabīb al-Anwār fanuzila wa khalasa al-Insān al-Qadīm min al-jahannamāt mu'ammian akhadha wa asara min arwāḥ al-ẓulmati.[1]

> And the King of Paradise of Light sent another deity following him (the Primordial Man), saved him and conquered against Darkness. And that he who came down following the [Primordial] Man and saved the Primordial Man from the hells (pits) and took some [parts] of the spirits of the Darkness as prisoners, was called Ḥabīb al-Anwār (the Beloved of the Lights).

It is notable that the Persian translator of Kitāb al-Fihrist, Mohammad Reza Tajaddod, read the word 'bi-ilāha' as 'goddess'[2], but Flügel (1925, 329) took it as a 'god' and Mohsen Abolghasemi (2001, 46) changed the word to 'bi-āliha' and took it as a 'god' too. The deity's function would be clearer if we compare different Coptic, Syriac, Middle Persian, Parthian and Arabic texts. However, the deity is one of the direct emanations of the Father of Greatness and has an important role in the second phase of creation. It will not be precisely known unless some new original Syriac, Middle Persian, Parthian, Sogdian, Uigurian, or Chinese materials are discovered. The other names of the deity are: Mp. rwšn'n xw'ryst (the sweetest of the Lights); Pth. fryh rwšn (the Friend of Light / the Beloved Light). (Boyce: 1975, 9)

The Third Creation (The Salvation of Man)

5. Al-Bashīr (the Messenger) = the Third Messenger. His original name in Syriac is 'yzgd' (bar Konai: 1981, 316), who is the first deity of the Third Creation. His other names are: Mp. nrysh yzd (God Narisah) / rwšnšhr yzd (the God of the Realm of Light); Pth. nrysf yzd (God Narisaf / myhr yzd (God Mihr, of course different from myhryzd, the Living Spirit, an important and key figure of the Second Creation who rescues the Primordial Man and creates the material world) / rwšnšhr yzd (the God of Light Realm) / zyn'rys bg (God Zēnārēs); and Lt. Tertius Legatus. (Bahār-Esmailpour: 2005, 73) He commands the Great Architect to make New Paradise (a temporary paradise which lasts until the end of the material world and it is the place for the released light particles and spirits). The Third Messenger reveals both his masculine and feminine figures to tempt the archons chained in the sky. (Esmailpour: 2004, 113)

6. Al-Munīr (the Shining One) = the Maiden of Light. Her Original Syriac name is btwlt nhwr' / trt'sr' btwlt' (Twelve Maidens) (bar Konai: 1981, 316); each of her twelve manifestations refers to a sign of the zodiac (Lieu: 1992, 18); her other names are: Mp. & Pth. knygrwšn; Mp. sdwys (Sadwēs). She also tempts the male archons chained above the sky and leads them to ejaculate and drop down the swallowed light particles. Al-Munīr's other Arabic name is Ilāhat al-Nayyirūn = the Goddess of the Lights. (Bahār-Esmailpour: 2005, 73) Finally, both al-Bashīr and al-Munīr cause the archons to release the light particles during the redeeming process of creation.

7. 'Mūd al-Sabḥ = the Column of Pray [Glory]. The deity's Syriac name is 'stn šbḥ' (Ephraim: 1921, 208). His other names are: Mp. šrws 'hr'y; Pth. β'mstwn / kyšwrw'r yzd (Bahār-Esmailpour: 2005, 73), also β'mstwn in Sogdian texts (Gharib: 2004: 97). The deity's visible appearance is the Milky Way. According to the releasing process of the Third Creation, "when three wheels are set in motion by the Third Messenger, the light particles or souls are drawn up, refined and made sublime and at the same time conveyed along the Milky Way from the moon to the sun." (Lieu: 1998: 20) In the Kitāb al-Fihrist we read,

>
> Then, he created the sun and the moon to refine the light of this world. Again, the sun refines the light mixed with the archons of warmth, and the moon [refines] the light mixed with the archons of cold; that [light] ascends to the Column of Pray [Glory] and together with the other prayers, the sacredness, good speech, and fine deeds will go up [to heaven].

[1] Flügel: 1925, 330.

Included with the above mentioned deities, Kitāb al-Rad refers to ḥurrās al-khānadiq wa'l-aswār (the guards of the ditches and towers) which is evidently related with another god of the Second Creation, the Great Architect whose original name in Syriac is bn rb'. (bar Konai: 1981: 314). His other names are: Mp. r'z 'y wzwrg (the Great Builder), nwgšhr'fwryzd (the New Realm-Maker God); Pth. β'myzd (the Light God); and Ar. Bannā al-Kabīr (the Great Builder) (Bahār-Esmailpour: 2005, 72).

It seems that Kitāb al-Rad refers only to the deity's heavenly comrades who help him guard the ditches and towers made by him after the process of making the material world. However, there is a Middle Persian fragment which directly refers to the function of the Great Architect in cosmological process:

> And Rāz-i Wuzurg (the Great Builder) filled in and leveled those five ditches to create New Paradise, and in the same way, he piled up and cast down the firmaments upon four layers of the earth, dark, dry, and black, firing and watery, one upon the other.[1]

Conclusion

A survey of the deities mentioned in Kitāb al-Rad shows that although the author wishes to refute Manichaean dualistic doctrine, especially its cosmology, and to reveal the falsehood of its divinities, he cites indirectly and sometimes directly from Manichaean texts. Since the treatise was compiled in the middle of the 9th century AD, and Manichaeans were still living in Iran and Mesopotamia at that time, the author could still use some original Manichaean sources in Arabic and presumably in Syriac which are paralleled with original Middle Persian and Parthian Turfan texts. New findings of this paper consist of two epithets of al-Mutinassimat (Pleasant) and al-Mutibassimat (Smiling) for the Mother of Life, the significant figure of the First Creation in Manichaean cosmology. The Persian equivalents of the two epithets are š'dgr and xnd'n, which are not found as the deity's epithets throughout the Middle Persian and Parthian texts discovered so far. In addition, referring to the comrades of the Great Architect as ḥurrās al-khanādiq wa'l-aswār (the guards of the ditches and towers / fortifications) is a new theme which needs further consideration with regard to determining the deity's function.

Rūmī's Prologue to the Mathnawī and Gnostic Hymns: A Comparative Analysis

Introduction

The prologue to the Mathnawī is indeed the epigraph and the manifesto of Iranian-Islamic mysticism, wherein one of the most fundamental mystical themes, that is, the isolation and straying of the human spirit and the fall of the spirit from the heavens down to this earthly world, has been discussed. The separation and isolation of man from his material form has been an obsession of the ascetics. We find its climax in the mysticism of Mowlānā Jalāl al-Dīn Mohammad Balkhī, better known as Rūmi. Here, we shall try to make a comparative analysis of the prologue of the Mathnawī and the Gnostic hymns. After surveying the main motifs in the prologue and in the most famous Gnostic hymns, it can be argued that Islamic mystical themes have deep roots in Christian and Manichaean gnosis during the early centuries of the Christian era. The mystic idea of the fall of man from his transcendental dwelling is, at one extreme, comparable with the fall of light from the Paradise of Light in Manichaeism, and in the other extreme, with the fall and absurdity of human spirit in Christian Gnostic schools of the third to fifth centuries.

The main themes of pre-Islamic gnostic hymns such as in A Manichaean Psalm-Book and other Middle Persian and Parthian hymns are analysed here. The themes have been compared with the content of the prologue of the Mathnawī. In the final analysis, there have been common features between Gnostic-mystical themes of early Christianity and Muslim mystical works and thoughts, which show the continuity of the mystical tradition in the broad realm of Christianity, Manichaeism and Islam.

The foremost interpreters of the Mathnawī have interpreted the reed flute as follows:

> The reed flute applies to the Holy Spirit and the rational soul, which has been isolated from its world and has been held captive in the prison of the body. It is wailing now in its longing for the return to its world and lamenting over its suffering, isolation and imprisonment. Therefore, in the last couplet, nayistān (reed bed) must be the world of incorporeal beings or the station of immutable essences.[1]

Later, 'Abdal-Raḥmān Jāmī, and the subsequent interpreters of the Mathnawī, considered nayistān the first invisible spirit or the first ordained being and / or the second invisible spirit or the second ordained being, and took man and woman as manifestations of the Divine Attributes and possible beings, or intellects and spirits. According to Professor Furūzānfar, this is a mistaken interpretation of and a far cry from the speech of Rūmī.[2] Furūzānfar considered the reed flute as an allegory of Rūmī himself, who lost his being and ego and was overtaken by love and the Beloved. Be that as it may, whether we hold the 'reed flute' to be Rūmī himself or to be the Spirit, it is an essence which has been isolated from its source, that is, the reed bed, and dwells in a state of fusion and burning. Rūmī too seemed to be suffering from being isolated from his eternal and celestial Beloved. His Mathnawī describes this state of affairs.

While commenting on the introduction to the Mathnawī, Jāmī composed several couplets that described the attributes and archetypes that manifested and burgeoned in man who, nevertheless, lives in captivity:

> In the reed bed wherein each nothingness
> Had the colour of unity with pre-eternity
> Since all names and essences impeccable
> Are manifested in man
> Everybody is wailing
> Each thing is separate from its essence
> The love of nation seized them
> This was the cry of men and women.[1]

Comparative Analysis

What we intend to establish here is the point that the subject of isolation or imprisonment of the spirit within the confines of the body, is not new to Islamic mysticism. The perspective of the captivity of the soul and the imprisonment of the body was first discussed by the Gnostics or mystics in early Christian times and verily constitutes the cornerstone of Gnostic thought. The theme of the fall and captivity of the soul on earth was discussed by the Gnostics of the second and third centuries of the Christian era.

The heretic mystics of the early Christian era were divided into a number of categories. The foremost Christian Gnostic was Simon the Magus, who believed Helena to be the last and lowest incarnation of the spirit isolated from the transcendental world. He held that the salvation in the Hereafter would take place simultaneously with the ultimate salvation of the fallen spirit. He also held salvation to be within the temporal order, whereas other Gnostics conceived salvation as attainable only by escaping their earthly prison.With regard to his own fall from the upper world and his passage through the celestial zones, which swelled with mischief and matter, he said:

> I took on a new form in every firmament similar to the form of the creatures of that firmament, so as to hide myself from the eyes of the ruling angels and to descend near Ennuia, called the Holy Spirit, the one through whom I created the angels, and they created the material world and mankind.[1]

Marcion, the heretic gnostic of the early Christian era, headed another movement. He believed that God bore no intrinsic relation to the created universe at all; he also believed that the soul bore no relation to God. Unlike other gnostics, he did not consider the soul to be alien, or corrupted, to this world and held that our souls belonged to this world.

The third approach of the gnostic doctrine is found in the school of Hermes of Egypt. Hermetic writings, such as the treatise of Poimandres, have pointed to the basic difference between the soul and the body and are an indication of the profound gnostic thought. Furthermore, it has been stated in this treatise that "at the beginning there was a light in the whole universe, peaceful and pleasing; later on, darkness appeared at the bottom, which was very horrifying, despicable and intertwined like a snake."[2]

In Muslim literature, Hermes has been identified sometimes with Enoch, one of the prophets of the Children of Israel, and sometimes with the Prophet Idris. He has also been presumed to be

[2] Ibid., p. 49.

the prophet of the Sabeans. A number of works with a tinge of Gnosticism have been ascribed to him. The instances of meeting an angel or a celestial instructor, analogous to the symbolic tales of Avecinna and Suhrawardī, can be found in the works of Enoch. Therefore, unlike the prophetic teachings, the teachings and philosophy of this school came in vogue among Shi'ite Muslims, who accepted and welcomed them. From the second century AH / eighth century AD, the Hermetic literature spread over the entire Muslim world from two main seats, Baghdad and Ḥarran. By the time thinkers like Avecinna, Ibn-i Tufail, Suhrawardī and Ibn-i 'Arabī emerged, the hermetic doctrines had already taken root. There are indications that these Muslim thinkers derived their ideas from those hermetic doctrines.[1]

The Hermetic ideas exercised a great influence on Muslim mysticism. The term 'universal man' frequently mentioned in the works of the mystics is found for the first time in one of the Hermetic works, The Psalm of Na'assene. The correlation between the 'First Man' of this world and the Primordial Man is of paramount importance in mysticism.[2]

The fourth approach in the Gnostic doctrine is the school of Valentinus, which has been called the Syro-Egyptian Gnostic school as well. Valentinus believed in an eternal being; when the universe was in a deep state Sophia came into being. Sophia was the latest creation and, by virtue of her eternity, she was isolated from all others. She was so isolated from the eternal essence that she eventually descended into debauchery and madness. She then embarked upon her liberation and underwent horrid agonies. Later the intellect emerged and liberated Sophia from debauchery and sent her back to the upper world. Thus, according to the gnostics of this school, all the souls that have fallen captive to this world and have become slaves to debauchery, can be liberated and attain perfection through mastering gnostic wisdom.[1]

The last Gnostic approach is the Manichaean asceticism, which took shape during the third century AD, and which exercised a tremendous impact on gnostic movements. Mani, in fact, developed the mystical tendencies preceding him, but strove to change these mystical tendencies into a broad religion. According to Mani's ideas, the human soul is an invisible light which ought to pass through the gate of eternal life. Man presently lives in a time of light and darkness. Redemption is attained when man becomes aware of this fact and redeems his soul or light incarcerated within him. On the other hand, the human soul, being captive in matter, can only attain redemption when it becomes aware of its rightful position, and especially of the fact that its abode is in that world, the realm of light. The material forces always chant to the soul and urge it to sink into a sleep of intoxication (oblivion).

There are thus varying approaches in the gnostic school, but all of them can be categorized broadly into two main systems, the Iranian gnostic system and the Syro-Egyptian gnostic system. In both of these systems, the mystical principles are the same, viz. the gap and isolation noticed between the Transcendent God and the universe, the difference between the universe and man, and most important of all, the duality of the soul and body. But the real difference between these two systems lies in the manner of all and destruction of the soul or light:

[1] See Gnosticism and Manichaeism, ed. & tr. by Esmailpour, (Tehran 1994), p. 35; also see M. Bahār and Esmailpour, Manichaean Literature (Tehran 2005), pp. 50-54.

In the Iranian category, which is under the impact of the Iranian transcendental duality, and especially that of Zoroastrianism, the matter did not derive its source from the real light nor from the divine spirit. According to this school, the matter, being unclean and dark, has a non-divine source whereas the soul is clean and pure. It is important to keep in mind that, according to this school, the emergence of the material world lies in neither the abnormal result of the divine light and grace nor in the result of its isolation from God, but it has been manifested as a result of the battle between the matter, i.e. evil and darkness, and the soul, i.e. grace and light. Because of this battle, these opposite poles mingle together and the soul becomes a captive of the matter, and at last attains liberation and returns to its origin, from which it had been separated.[1]

The antagonism between soul and body or the battle between intellect and spirit can be seen explicitly in the poetry of Rūmī:

The soul in its separation from the throne like a she-camel
The body from its love of the thorn
The soul takes wings towards heaven above
The body claws at the earth
O You who have died for your country, as long as you are with me
My soul shall be far from Leilī.[2]

In these couplets, Rūmī has likened the tug of the war between soul and body or the battle between form and meaning and / or the antagonism between intellect and spirit to the antagonism of Majnūn with the she-camel.[3] The squabble between soul and body and between intellect, and spirit or the dispute between love and intellect and form and meaning conjures up the duality of the gnostics who believe in the eternal and everlasting separation of the world of light and darkness or of spirit and matter. Of course, this analogy does not suggest that the mystics accepted the fundamentals of Gnostic-Manichaean thought, but it conjures up a kind of dialectic, which is observed in most cultures, inter alia, in Iranian culture.

On the other hand, in the Syrian school, the two roots of existence are considered to be related to a single divine principle, and all of existence, i.e. the inferior material world and the immaterial world, has been ascribed to a single source. The issue of the fall and destruction of the soul is related to the ignorance of the soul which, separated from its eternal and celestial source, recedes into inferiority and oblivion.

Now let us see what the prologue to the Mathnawī with its special perspective, which is the main vignette of Sufis and ascetics of the thirteenth century AD and the preceding phases, has in common with the gnostic poetry of the initial phases. As pointed out earlier, the motif of separation, from the paradisal nayistān (reed bed), and the longing for union are among the important perspectives of this Prologue:

> Everyone who is left far from his source
> Wishes back the time when he was united with it.

This longing for union with the celestial source can be seen among the followers of the above two Gnostic systems. Inter alia, in one of the hymns of Mani (hymn 261) it is said:

> I will pass up into the skies
> And leave this body upon the earth
> The trumpet sounds, I hear
> They are calling me up to the immortals

I will cast away my body upon the earth
From which it was assembled.[1]

The gnostics of the early Christian era, including Mani, whose mystical ideas had a more profound impact on the Sufis than the impact of his religious system on the Muslim society, considered this world as a vast prison and an arena of evil and Ahriman, wherein man has become incarcerated like a bird and lives in a state of anguish. According to Manichaean mythology, the perimeters of this earthen sphere are encircled by numerous firmaments similar to concentric globes. The most important among them are the seven firmaments of planets on top of which is the firmament of the fixed stars or the eighth firmament. All these firmaments serve as barriers between man on earth and the fixed and enduring celestial world. Man lives in a state of deep isolation, and it is this isolation that makes man miserable:

But whoever is parted from one who speaks his language
Becomes dumb, though he has a hundred songs.

The soul and spirit of man are incarcerated within the body just like the caged bird. The gnostics, particularly the Stoics, called this part incarcerated in the body 'Pneuma' or the 'Etheric Fiery Being', or the Universal / Divine Soul. This soul or Pneuma is a quotient of the sacred divine being, which has been separated from the kingdom of God and has fallen down to this material world; therefore, its isolation is saddening and biting, as Rūmī says:

Since every limb seeks separation
The dear soul will be within separation
It says, 'O low earthly limbs
My nostalgia is bitterer

[1] C. R. C. Allberry, A Manichaean Psalm-Book (Stuttgart 1938), p. 191.

I belong to the heaven above.'
The willingness of the soul is for the inspiration
The soul of the place is His essence.[1]

This theme can be observed in a better and beautiful form in one of the famous couplets in the prologue to the Mathnawī:

I want a bosom torn by severance,
That I may unfold (to such a one) the pain of live desire.

In the Manichaean hymns, Angad Rōšnān (The Perfect Lights), too, this theme is presented in a different way:

The soul replied: I am the delicate-born of the Father of Greatness
I am mingled with this material world and suffer
Take me out of the arms of death (the low world)[2]

And concerning the redemption of the Living Self it says:

O bright Self (soul and spirit) farewell
Go back to your own place
O happy force, O the elected greatness![3]

In the above hymn-cycle, as well as in Huyadagmān (Good Luck for Us), sung by a great Manichaean gnostic, Mar Wahman Xwarxšed, there are numerous songs regarding the captivity of the soul, the incarcerated man and his redemption. These gnostic hymns are originally composed in Parthian language during the third and fourth centuries AD, that is, during the flourishing period of the Gnostic religion at the beginning of Christianity:

I cry upon the soul
Perchance I may attain salvation
From the flocks and predators
Which devour each other. [1]

Or:

O Soul, come and never fear
Death has fallen
Illness has dissipiated
O Soul! Come thee, come up!
Wishes are difficult to achieve
All are doomed to destruction
And the sorrow of death
And you have been separated from your place.[2]

Or:

The guest of light
The incarcerated man
Has stepped into a calm state![3]

Let us now compare these rhymes with the speech of Rūmī:

We belong to heaven above and go upwards
We belong to the sea and go to the sea
We do not belong here or there
Our star is not in the galaxy
We shall go to Pleiades
Do not obstruct the path
We shall go to the mount of Caucasus.[1]

The theme of crossing the earth and reaching the empyrean and the abode of the Omnipresent has been given in most of Manichaean Psalms. The inferiority and the misery of this world and the futility of affection hereto is the prevailing trend of these hymns, which was uttered by the Manichaean ascetics two or three centuries before Islam:

> This lion that is within me I have strangled
> I have turned him away from my soul
> Him who pollutes me at all times.[2]
>
> I will pass through the skies
> And leave this body upon the earth
> The trumpet sounds, I hear
> They are calling me up to the Immortals
> I will cast away my body upon the earth
> From which I was assembled.[3]
>
> The days of thy life are running from thee;
> Why dost thou vainly waste thy zeal
> On the wings of the earth
> And puttest behind thee all the [things of evil]?
> Thou hast spent thy life sunk in the worries and cares of the world
> Working thyself into a decline through the pains and the sorrows.
> Thou art a stranger housed in a body of the earth
> Defiled, how long therefore hast thou been heedless
> Of what thou ignorantly dost?
> Blessed art thou, for the path of journey is open to you.
> Do not entrust your journey to oblivion.[4]

Lo, the time has drawn near
May I return to my habitat
Thou art the way, thou art the way of life eternal.[1]

The gist of the above hymns has been sung by Hāfiz of Shiraz in a beautiful way:

Joyous that day when from this desolate abode, I go
The ease of soul, I seek; and for the sake of the Beloved, I go.

To abandon the world and its attendant errors is the longing of the wandering soul of man:

I have forsaken the world and its errors
I have loved my savior, prayed, fasted
And given alms... [from my youth up]
Because of the hour of need.
Come now my lord, Jesus. And help me
All hail! O busy soul
That hast finished her fight
And subdued the ruling power,
The body and its affections.[2]

It is again uttered by Hāfiz in his mystical couplet:

The world and worldly affairs are nonsense
One thousand times have I sought for.[3]

To a Manichaean gnostic, the inferiority of mundane affairs is such that, in fact, one is not meant not to contaminate oneself with the darkness and material forces; but since it has been preordained for the soul to become a prisoner of darkness, the ascension to the empyrean and to the heavenly domain has been the desire of every gnostic ascetic:

> I have not been mingled with the mixture of the matter
> For, it is a thing that perishes,
> Thy good fight I have set myself
> To strip myself of the body of destruction,
> The habitation of the powers of death
> And transcend on high to thy aeons (thy Paradise Realm)
> From which I was once separated.[1]

Now we shall see from the viewpoint of the above discussed themes to which one of the two prevailing gnostic systems the first mystics of the Islamic era, inter alia, Rūmī were inclined to. We will also examine the ways whereby the gnostic asceticism penetrated into the realm of Muslim mysticism, especially during the seventh century AH / thirteenth century AD.

The majority of the mystics of the Muslim era followed the Syro-Egyptian Gnosticism rather than the Manichaean Gnosticism of Iran, for the Syro-Egyptian Gnosticism was more akin to the monotheistic spirit of Islam than to the duality and amalgamation of light and darkness of Mani, which is a far cry from the unity of the world.

Naturally, the selection of Syro-Egyptian gnostic ideas was easier, for these ideas had a mystical aspect and had not acquired the form of a popular and consummate religion like Manichaeism, whereas Manichaeism had acquired the status of an independent religion during the third century AD and was in vogue up to the ninth and in some areas up to the twelfth century AD. Of course, this does not mean that the Manichaean ideas had no impact on the Iranian culture. Manichaeism survived through the survivors of Mazdaism and through a number of sects, inter alia, a heretic sect, which had emerged under the impact of Mazdaism.

According to the Gnostics of the Syrian school, the soul is subject to fall, but according to Manichaeism, a portion of the light or heavenly soul becomes captive in the battle of the forces of darkness and the gods of light. The Syrian school tries to ascribe the dual existence (good and evil, soul and matter) to the single Divine source. According to this school, the whole of existence, whether the world of matter or the world of spirit has a single source, and this destruction and ignorance is part of the luminous soul, which has been isolated from its Divine source. Manichaeism, on the contrary, is based on the eternal separation of matter and soul, and of light and darkness.

With the help of Hermetic ideas, the Syro-Egyptian Gnostic school was able to establish its influence among the Muslims. Its widespread influence was observed in some of the main religious centers of Islam, viz., Baghdad and Harran from the second century AH / eight century AD onwards. The hermetic ideas which had a Gnostic foundation were imbibed by the mystics of Islam, especially, by the Shi'ite mystics; thus one can trace the continuation of pre-Islamic mysticism in the initial periods of Islam, which reached its apogee and flourished during the seventh and eighth century AH / thirteenth and fourteenth century AD.

The liberation of the soul imprisoned in matter is conditional on the awareness and wisdom, "As in the macrocosm, man is a prisoner between the seven firmaments; so inside our body, in microcosm, this celestial Pneuma is incarcerated in the seven-fold prison of our spirit, which has its celestial source. If this incarcerated spirit does not attain awareness and gnosis, it is so embroiled in the darkness of the body as to know nothing of itself."[1]

Rūmī made this liberation conditional on the elixir of love, without which man remained imprisoned in the prison of the body like a bird without plumage:

> When love has no fear of him
> He will remain fearless like a bird
> The body of the dust ascended heavenwards because of love
> The mountain came into dance
> Everything is a beloved and the lover a veil
> The living is a beloved and the lover dead
> Our plumage is his noose of love
> He will drag her by the hair homewards.[2]

It is evident that the awareness and gnosis are attained through illumination and spiritual discoveries, like the light of love which shines on the heart of the traveler and all of a sudden redeems the soul from the fold of darkness and takes it to the realm of light.

The theme of a caged bird, a symbol for the soul, is also mentioned in Manichaean hymns:

> Like a bird in snares, so also am I
> While I am in the body of death
> I have not been a servant of Ahriman
> Pluck my feathers, be ashamed...[3]

The bird of the celestial garden which we find here and there in the poems of Rūmī and other mystics, is the symbol for the virtuous soul or spirit, meaning that the virtuous spirit or soul finds itself essentially with plumage which is flying towards its native place, the celestial garden. We can find glimpses of this winged creature in the works of Suhrawardī, Avecinna and Ghazzālī as well as in the Manṭiq al-Ṭayr of Farīd al-Dīn 'Aṭṭār.[1]

The allegory of the bird in the gnostic hymns is sometimes given as the allegory of a sheep caught in the grip of matter or the forces of darkness:

> Like sheep that have no shepherd
> Matter and her sons divided me up
> Amongst them, they burnt me in their fire
> They gave me a bitter face.[2]

This rigid and bitter face points to the earthen frame or body, which is rigid and unclean according to the Manichaean gnostics, and ought to be replaced with the attire of light.

> I am the light that shines forth
> That gives joy to souls
> I am the life of the world
> I am the sap of all trees
> I am sweet water that is beneath the sons of matter
> O Soul, raise thy eyes to the heights
> And contemplate thy bonds...[3]

It is the possession of the essence of wisdom that enables the virtuous spirit to travel towards the firmament and to become free from the prison and cast off the veil of matter and stigma of defiling and to attain union with God by transcending the material world. This Gnostic theme can be observed beautifully in the prologue to the Mathnawi:

> Dost thou know why the mirror of thy soul reflects nothing?
> Because the rust is not cleared from its face
> The mirror is separate from the color of adornment
> The ray of light is the sun of God
> Clean the rust off his face
> Then, understand that light
> With the ear of your heart, hearken to this truth
> So you may get out of darkness.[1]

This 'ray of light of God's sun' has been manifested in gnostic poetry as the eternal light, which belongs to the very land of light, i.e. the land of the eminent Father of Greatness or Zurwān, a portion of which has come into this material world through the lesser gods of light.

The imprisonment of light has been described in Manichaean Psalms as the incarceration of a boat or ship bearing the light-particles which is besieged by the King of Darkness and his band; thus the light mingles with the darkness. The mission of man is to isolate and liberate himself from his amalgamation, to liberate his inner light through the attainment of gnostic wisdom, to proceed towards the moon and the sun via the Milky Way and thence towards the Paradise of Light, to ascend the Upper Paradise or the Paradise of Light, to present himself before the gods of light and to become part of the absolute light:

> His light is down, up and right
> On His head, shoulders like a crown.

[1] J. M. Mowlavi, op. cit., p. 354.

Or according to another interpretation of Rūmī, it is to become a celestial, imaginary and untraceable substance:

> I shall pass by the angels like birds
> I shall become what will come within the imagination.

As stated above, the only way of redemption is to achieve awareness about the transcendence and alienation of the divine world from this material world. Therefore, in order to be redeemed, man perforce has to recognize the Transcendental God beyond this material and horrible world. Man must recognize Him, must identify Him and must discover his own inner being and must know his source of origin, his place of imprisonment and his future station:

> Whence have I come, for what have I come?
> Where am I going? Why do you not show me my home?

The prerequisite to this wisdom is the discovery of gnostic and ascetic intuition for the attainment of the Truth.

According to the gnostics preceding Mani, the isolation of divine substance or soul had occurred before the creation of the material world. The Messenger of God from the Paradise of Light strove to liberate this soul, but Ahreman and the demons created the material world and man in order to imprison this isolated soul in the body of this world and in the body of man. This fact indicates that the Muslim wisdom, rejecting this point, has played a vital role in the evolution process of Gnosticism. From its very maturity and fostering, i.e. from the second and third century AD, up to its climax and spread in the Muslim world, Gnosticism has traversed a long way and has undergone a process of change during the lapse of time without losing its main substance.

In this far-reaching movement, the Sabeans or Mandaean gnostics, too, had their role in the formation of Islamic mysticism.

Mandaeans have numerous common aspects with the topics of the prologue to the Mathnawī and with its corresponding themes in Manichaean songs and hymns. Here we will mention only two examples of Mandaean gnostic hymns:

> Living knowledge came to me
> It cried and opened my eyes
> Woke up my spirit
> Woke the god of secrets
> Raised man from among the dead
> And woke me from sleep
> Life had woken in me.[1]

Or, concerning the redemption of the soul from its worldly abode, it says:

> Hail to thee, hail to thee, O Soul!
> Thou hast fled the world
> From corruption
> Thou hast left the body to the world
> The world is a wicked place
> Arise! Arise! O Soul!
> Come back to the former abode
> To where thou hast come.[2]

The other gnostic allegory is that of pearl, shell and treasure. In the gnostic texts, pearl has the figurative form and is related to the soul of man. In Manichaean texts, pearl is the very light imprisoned in the shell. Shell is the prison, and pearl the prisoner. Thus, if the soul is the very pearl, then it has to be searched for in the ocean. It is because of this that in Manichaeism the struggle of

[2] Ibid., p. 204.

soul is likened to the 'divers' who probe into the depths of the ocean (depth of wisdom) to search and find valuable treasures. The goal of Manichaeism is not only the 'liberation of pearls' from the prison of the material through the fragile attire of the body, and 'bringing togrther of spirits' or 'collecting spirits' which are like parts of a body, but their everlasting purification as well.[1]

Besides the allegory of pearl, the symbol of treasure, too, has its importance for Manichaean vision in the description of the Living Spirit. He is the essence of all the scattered pieces of light imprisoned in the world. Even the Manichaean angels are called radanīn (jewels).

In the Mathnawī, too, shell and pearl are referred to repeatedly. In fact, shell is mentioned and discussed 19 times and pearl 135 times throughout the Mathnawī, such as:

> The small and the big pearls are out
> With the shell lives that big treasure.[2]

Or in the prologue to the Mathnawī:

> The pitcher of my eye was not filled greedily
> The shell was not convinced, was not filled with pearls.

The Mathnawī has several instances. Of these we shall only cite the following as samples:

> One put a pearl in the heart
> He put in the seas and the oceans.[3]

> You said there was a sea within him

[2] The Mathnawī, Book I, p. 102, verse 17.
[3] Ibid., p. 72, verse 18.

A whole treasure was within his heart.[1]

The light of that pearl is shining out
It has been relieved of these chains.[2]

The metaphor of pearl and shell has a long history in mystical poetry, and they have been mentioned in the ancient poetical works. The pearl is the prevailing metaphor and allegory used for narrating one of the most important mystical themes common in the works of gnostics, Manichaeans, the early Christian ascetics and the Sufi poets. Perhaps we can find its most beautiful expression in the following couplet of Hāfiz, the great Iranian poet:

The pearl that was out of the oyster of time and space abode (universe)
It was sought by the lost beings of the coastline.[3]

One of the gnostic allegorical songs, 'The Song of the Pearl', composed by Judah Thomas, was mentiond in The Acts of Thomas (third century AD), also called The Raiment of Pride. According to this allegory, the pearl has fallen into the mouth of the python, and the seeker ought to take it out of the mouth of the python and thereby liberate the soul or light imprisoned in the material world:

Hail to thee, our son in Egypt
Arise from the deep slumber
And hearken to my words
Remember thou art the prince
Remember the pearl
For which thou hastened towards Egypt.[4]

The allegory of the merchant, merchandise and treasure describes the position of an apostle or ascetic struggling for the redemption and deliverance of the soul. The gnostic texts even went further to consider the merchant figuratively as Father of the kingdom of God, who possessing tremendous wealth, out of that treasure, kept only the solitary pearl which was a part of the holy and eternal soul:

> The Father of the Kingdom is like a merchant
> Who found treasures and pearls
> He was an intelligent merchant
> He sold all his property
> He possessed only the pearl
> You are looking for a wealth
> Which is not to be exhausted
> A wealth which the blow flies won't gnaw
> And the worms won't corrupt.[1]

Conclusion

It can be concluded from the foregoing that the gnostic Manichaean hymns, the gnostic-mystical themes of early Christianity and Muslim mystical works and thought have several common features, which is an indication of the continuity of the mystical tradition in the broad realm of Christianity, Manichaeism and Islam. Most Iranian scholars, such as the late Professor Ebrāhīm Pūrdāwūd, Malik al-Sho'arā Bahār and Mohammad Mo'īn, mostly emphasized the impact of Zoroastrianism and Mazdaism on Persian culture and literature, while others have pursued research on the gnostic Manichaean impact to a lesser degree. Although the idea of permeation of gnostic themes into Islamic mysticism and the manner in which these themes permeated Iranian and Muslim culture through the Christian and Manichaean ascetics is a new trend in literary and mystic research, the continuation of deep, sustained and steady research might bring about a profound change in the study of mystical works.

The Kephalaia of the Teacher

The Edited Coptic Manichaean Texts in Translation with Commentary

by

Iain Gardner

E. J. BRILL

The Kephalaia of the Teacher is the most detailed account available to modern scholarship of the teachings of Mani, and of the universal religion that he founded as the final successor to Buddha, Zarathushtra and Jesus. This volume provides the first complete English translation of the Coptic text (c. 400 CE), together with an introduction, commentaries and indices. Topics include the apostleship of Mani, the practices of the Manichaean community, accounts of the heavenly and demonic beings and worlds, as well as discussions of astrology and religious psychology.

In Manichaeism many of the gnostic and dualistic themes of early Christianity achieved the status of a world religion, and the subject is the heir to contemporary interest in heterodoxy and the deconstruction of received histories (see the Nag Hammadi codices).

Iain Gardner, Ph.D. (University of Manchester 1983), is Chair of the Department of Religion and Philosophy at Edith Cowan University, Western Australia. He is currently editing the newly-found Coptic and Manichaean texts from Kellis, on behalf of the Dakhleh Oasis Project.

PREFACE

This volume provides an English translation, together with commentary, of the presently edited Coptic text of the Kephalaia; as established primarily by A. Böhlig and H.-J. Polotsky in the 1930's and early 1940's. This is but part of a single codex of the Medinet Madi library of Manichaean writings, the entirety of which codex is considerably greater than will be found here. The editorial process still continues. Work on a second Kephalaia codex from the same find has hardly begun. There is also Iranian kephalaic material. Thus I am conscious of the limitations of what is presented here as an entry into the fantastic worlds of Mani and his followers in their search for the God of truth.

My own fascination with this text began in the latter 1970's as I prepared for a doctoral dissertation on the Christology of Manichaeism at the University of Manchester. At that time I attempted rough translations both as a means to understand the doctrine, and as an exercise in the language. At the beginning of this present decade S.N.C. Lieu was kind enough to remember our struggles as graduate students, and wrote to me wondering if I would be willing to revise some of these drafts for a collaborative volume containing Manichaean texts from the Roman Empire. I somewhat arbitrarily set myself to the task of a hundred plus pages from the Kephalaia, but rapidly discarded my youthful exercises. Towards the completion of this initial stage Dr. Lieu introduced me to D. Montserrat with the suggestion that we might work together on the complete edited text, and Dr. Montserrat began to prepare drafts of chapters on which I had not yet worked.

In 1992 Dr. Montserrat visited me in Australia, and we enjoyed the opportunity to develop ideas for the volume and to work together on first drafts of difficult sections. Since then other commitments have forced Dominic to withdraw from the collaboration, but I take this opportunity to thank him for his many fine suggestions, and to acknowledge the occasions that his phrasing may have influenced the final version. Similarly I thank Samuel Lieu, and acknowledge that phrasing from collaborative work appears in the introductory material.

However, sole responsibility for the published text is my own.

Now, in 1994, I have again worked through every line. As each reading has brought more light, so I become more aware of the impossibility of the translator's task. However, it is apparent that the density and complexity of this text have proved a barrier to the study of Manichaeism, particularly in the anglophone world. My hope here is to have rendered more accessible the greatest and most detailed of the available primary sources, and thus to encourage future work that will in time supersede my own.

I thank Edith Cowan University for the use of resources and the help of many colleagues, in particular Peter Bedford with whom I have often discussed problems of the translation process. My Faculty was kind enough to grant me time release from teaching during the early part of the work, for which I am indeed grateful.

INTRODUCTION

Manichaeology and the Religion of Mani

The self-declared apostle Mani (216 – 276 c.e.) was a native of Babylonia who founded a world religion in the early years of the Sassanian Empire. He believed himself to be the recipient of direct revelation from his divine Twin Spirit, which being is understood to be the Paraclete foretold by Jesus, and with whom Mani became 'one body and one Spirit (K.15.23 – 24)'. Thus, in his Gospel and Epistles, he introduces himself as the apostle of Jesus Christ (e.g. CMC. p.66). In Greek and Coptic his name is Manichaios; that is 'Mani the living', as derived from his native Syriac.

Modern scholarship has devoted much attention to the question of the nature and characteristics of Mani's teachings, and of the religion that he founded; and this history of manichaeology may be read as a commentary on that of the discipline itself. For the Christian theologians and leaders of the past Manichaeism had been a dualistic heresy that threatened and attempted to subvert the truths revealed in scripture, as held secure and preached by the church. Thus the origins of the discipline, for western culture, are to be found in the Greek and Latin sources of that world; particularly in the disputations, anathemas and parodies of the bishops such as Augustine (once himself a believer but turned champion of orthodoxy) and Archelaus (the fabled victor over a hapless Mani) and Epiphanius (the acerbic cataloguer of errors).

When western scholarship began to free itself from the heritage of heresiology a new approach to sources, especially by orientalists in the latter nineteenth century with access to Syriac and Arabic authors such as Theodore bar Konai and an-Nadim who quote from Mani himself, gradually started to write a more objective history.

The twentieth century has brought a succession of dramatic textual finds that have repeatedly shifted the focus of attention. The first actual Manichaean writings discovered were in Iranian and Turkic and Chinese literatures, and were plundered from Central Asia by the great European expeditions at the start of this century. In the heyday of the 'History of Religions' as a discipline Manichaeism was reinvented as a Persian religion.

However, even since the 1920's scholarly attention has been repeatedly forced to focus on gnostic and Judaeo-Christian origins and traditions in Mani's teaching. Such are evidenced particularly by the Medinet Madi library from the 1930's, of which the Kephalaia is part; and then since 1969 the Cologne Mani Codex, which text recounts the genesis of Mani's own life and the community that he founded. Also the flood of scholarship occasioned by the Nag Hammadi library, that is the inaccurately but popularly named gnostic Gospels, has provided a context for the growth of manichaeology as its heir apparent.

Now, near the close of the twentieth century, the student of Manichaeism is presented with a striking array of sources evidencing a religion that spread from Mesopotamia throughout the late classical and Islamic worlds of the Mediterranean and west Asia, and across the Silk Road to finally flare and die in south China. Throughout this century the discipline has been preeminently the domain of specialists, necessitating a high degree of philological and technical skill, particularly such as is preserved in the elite institutions of the European continent. However, developments and projects by the academic community now in process seem certain to render the subject both more accessible and of broader interest. These include the activities of the International Association of Manichaean Studies, with its conferences and publications; and the various renewed efforts both to complete the editing of sources and to make them more available.

The latest and still continuing development in the story of Manichaean textual discoveries is part of this process. This is the uncovering of a fourth century Manichaean community and its texts at the late Roman site of Kellis in Egypt, by an Australian archaeological excavation directed by C. Hope on behalf of the Dakhleh Oasis Project. For the first time the social context of a Manichaean church from the early period, indeed of any so-called gnostic group of antiquity, can properly be recovered. Thus the subject becomes part of the documentary record of the late classical world.

Every discipline is a product of its own cultural framework and its time. Manichaeology at the turn of the millenium takes its place in the story of the deconstruction of received histories. The finds at Kellis evidence that the Manichaeans there regarded themselves as the true and holy church. This story subverts that of the inevitable triumph of, for want of a better phrase, catholic Christianity. Instead, Christianities in context are found to be diverse, subjects of law and economics and inter-personal relations. Doctrine is imposed and undermined, theological orthodoxy is seen to be a social construct.

What then is the meaning of the religion of Mani? The Mani Codex is a nascent gospel for the apostle that compiles written testimonies by some of his closest disciples, together with quotations from his own writings; and contextualised by excerpts from Paul and other authoritative apocalypses of the past. While hagiographical elements are already apparent, such as the tutelage of Mani by his Twin (σύζυγος) from youth, it does provide clear evidence of his upbringing in a Judaeo-Christian baptist community. Mani conflicts with the elders over the food and ritual practices of the group (on the perhaps revisionist grounds of actualised Manichaean praxis), and appeals to the teaching of their leader (and founder?) Alchasaios. Thus the community seems related to the Elchasaites of Christian sources, although it is notoriously difficult to disentangle the various teachings of such sects from the available texts.

In any case, it is apparent that Mani broke with the community, and the evolution of his teaching overlaid diverse elements from gnostic and Syriac Christian traditions upon the restricted world of his youth. The influence of Bardaisanite and Marcionite teachings is apparent, although in his scriptures Mani also enters into dispute with such. The adult Mani embarked on his career as healer and apostle, travelling throughout the Persian Empire and to India and the boundaries of Roman power. He seems to have been favourably received by the Sassanian King Shapur I, to have travelled in his entourage, and to have been welcomed in the courts of the aristocracy. Zarathustra and Buddha were incorporated into the tradition of true apostles, together with Jesus, although recent scholarship has tended to downplay the extent of Iranian and Indian influence on the essential structure of Mani's teachings. However, after the deaths of Shapur and his successor Hormizd, Mani was imprisoned by Vahram I probably under the influence of the chief mobed Kirder and the Zoroastrian hierarchy; and there received his own martyrdom. This was then followed by a general persecution of his followers, especially in Mesopotamia.

Since its liberation from heresiology the study of Manichaeism has been driven by philological experts and historians of religion. This has tended towards a dominating interest in the texts in themselves, and in the various strands of Manichaean teaching. However, Mani's vision and the worlds of his followers must also be comprehended as integrated wholes. Mani believed himself to be the recipient of, and owner of, truth.

> This is how everything th[at] has ha[pp]ened and that will happen was unveiled to me by the Paraclete; [...] everything the eye shall see, and the ear hear, and the thought think, a[n]d the [...] I have understood by him everything. I have seen the totality through him! (K. 14.19–23 and see CMC pp. 66-7)

For Mani truth can both be accessed and comprehended. Error attacks and mingles with it in history, but revelation from the eternal world illuminates the good, and offers the sure hope of final victory. Revealed truth is the same as that good that has always been present in the universe, which holds it together, proving life and coherence within death and disorder. Thus, on their own terms, Mani's teachings can not be regarded as eclectic. If his revelations accord with those of earlier apostles it is because they derive from the same source. Where they differ the prior apostolic teaching has been corrupted. Thus Mani reiterates and reveals Zarathustra, Buddha and Christ. Other Buddhisms or Christianities can only be dull reflections of this truth.

In his lifetime Mani devoted himself to the building up of the true church. The superficiality of religious terminology ('church') is important to an understanding of Manichaeism, for as a persecuted minority the community was accused of dissimulation and subversion. Mani wrote his inspired scriptures so that the truth could never again become corrupted by error. He sent out missionaries to east and west, and claimed that no previous revelation had been universal and thus final, as was the one that had been given to him.

From the late third century Manichaeism challenged the Christian hierarchy of the Mediterranean world; but with the triumph of catholic Christianity in the Roman empire, and the common interest of church and state, these western communities gradually failed and died under persecution. In west Asia Manichaeism remained a vibrant force well into the Abbasid era, and Arabic authors had access to the canonical scripures. However, the religion of light had its longest history in central and east Asia, perhaps surviving in south China until the early modern period. Despite the widely varied cultural forms in which it represented itself, Manichaeism retained an essential unity of vision and expression, and acted as an important conduit for the transmission of cultural ideas between east and west[1].

Manichaeism in Egypt

Manichaean missionaries would have first arrived in Egypt about 260 c.e. By the end of the third century the religion had attracted enough attention to be condemned by both the state, which feared its Persian origins and regarded it as harmful to the fabric of society; and the ecclesiastical authorities, who were particularly shocked by Mani's claim to be the apostle of Jesus Christ, come to restore and renew the true church. Nevertheless, although fiercely combatted and persecuted, Manichaeism attracted a radical and often sophisticated following. The pagan neoplatonist Alexander of Lycopolis, who informs us that the first missionary to reach Egypt was Papos[2], wrote against the doctrine surprised at its attraction for his philosophical colleagues. The religion also spread further west to Roman North Africa, where the writings of Augustine are an eloquent reminder of its appeal in the latter fourth century.

Upper Egypt seems to have become a particularly fruitful area for the Manichaean mission, and Christian writers made frequent attacks upon it. It is highly possible that missionaries reached the Thebaid not only via Alexandria and along the Nile valley, but also directly by sea from Mesopotamia to the coast (Berenice). The region features in the mercantile travels of Scythianus, the proto-Manichaean of Christian polemics. The largest corpus of extant Manichaean texts, the Medinet Madi library including the Kephalaia, can perhaps be traced to this area according to dialect. Although Manichaean success in the Roman Empire peaked about 400 c.e., it seems probable that communities survived in areas such as this into the Islamic period.

[1] For a detailed introduction to Manichaeism and its history see Lieu 1992.

[2] Alexander of Lycopolis, c. Manich. II, p.4, 17-19; and see PsBk2. 34.12.

The documentary texts from Kellis will provide much new detail about this process of Manichaean expansion in fourth century Egypt. It is apparent that the believers understood themselves to be the true and holy church. Presumably the mission to Kellis began as an outreach from an established centre such as Lycopolis. At Kellis there appears to have been significant success, for the documentary texts evidence Manichaeism integrated into the life of the community, and psalms have been found in two different parts of the site. Whether this success was an isolated instance, or more common across the Oasis is unknown. The Dakhleh Oasis is even today a relatively remote region, at the edge of habitation. The excavations at Kellis evidence that the pagan temple was still functioning at the beginning of the fourth century, and it seems reasonable to suppose that the process of Christianisation was less advanced here than in major centres. These features may have aided the Manichaean mission.

Certainly the discovery of bilingual glossaries of Manichaean phrases evidence the remarkable fact of translation from Syriac into Lycopolitan Coptic at Kellis. This, together with allusions to persecution in some of the letters sent to Kellis from the Nile valley, supports the hypothesis that the Oasis became a significant Manichaean centre and safe haven for the community. Unfortunately the archive as yet recovered breaks off at the end of the fourth century, and so the future of the community is unknown. Presumably the strengthening of ecclesiastical control, married to state power, means that Kellis would not long have remained immune from the attention of the authorities.

The finds from Kellis evidence a link between the use of Lycopolitan Coptic and Manichaeism. Dialect and text connect these finds to the Medinet Madi library, for the same psalm tradition is a feature of both finds. Minor textual variants indicate that the Kellis material predates that of Medinet Madi, and thus uncover some of the history of the latter codices. It becomes apparent that codices such as the Psalm Book and Kephalaia are constructed works in the process of evolution.

As regards the social context of Manichaeism: it was a highly literate and transportable religion that in its conscious universalism appealed to and indeed targetted educated elites. It spread along the trade routes and was regarded by the authorities as subversive. It also evidences a strong role for women who are remarkably visible in the documentary texts from Kellis, as in other Manichaean material such as the doxologies in the Psalm Book. The church was strongly structured, programmed for evangelical mission. It developed an elaborate network of what might today be termed safe houses and propaganda factories, for the writing of texts was part of the religious praxis. The letters from Kellis evidence a powerful concern for communication, full of news and greetings and introductions.

Success was founded on the two-fold structure of the community with the elect supported by the catechumens for the full-time service of God, and thus able constantly to travel and to build up the churches. Lay believers, that is catechumens or hearers, could engage in the every day life of family and business; while through their alms-giving they could ensure their eventual salvation. The actual divine work could then safely be left to the elect. Thus the religion, despite its powerful evangelical mission and other worldly focus, was well placed to become an integral part of the community. It is reasonable to presume that Manichaean communities were able to maintain themselves, in areas such as Upper Egypt, for a number of centuries; despite almost continual attack and sporadic enforced persecution.

The Medinet Madi Library

The sensational news of Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten, Originalschriften des Mani und seiner Schüler, announced in 1933 by C. Schmidt, H. Ibscher and H.J. Polotsky, marks a decisive turning point in the modern rediscovery of the religion. The cache seems to have come from a wooden chest in the ruins of an old house in Medinet Madi, to the south west of the Fayoum in Middle Egypt. The codices were already broken up before they reached the Cairo market, where they were first seen by the Danish egyptologist H.O. Lange in November 1929. However, it was C. Schmidt in 1930, while on his way to Palestine to collect manuscripts for the Prussian Academy, who was shown a codex entitled Kephalaia and made the connection with Manichaeism. By sheer coincidence Schmidt was in the process of checking the proofs of the late K. Holl's edition of Epiphanius' Panarion, and he remembered that among the books that Mani was alleged to have received from Scythianus was one with the same title. Further examination revealed the characteristic clause: 'Once more the enlightener speaks to his disciples ...'

News of the discovery was immediately communicated to A. Harnack in Germany; but, before adequate funds could arrive in Egypt for their purchase, part of the find was acquired by the Irish-American philanthropist and collector A. Chester Beatty. His famous collection of classical and biblical manuscripts was housed first in London, but after the second world war transferred to Dublin, where they remain. The rest of the codices were then purchased by Schmidt with financial aid from the Stuttgart publishing company Kohlhammer, and shipped to Berlin.

The entire collection comprised seven codices, four in Berlin and three in London (now Dublin). In Berlin were: the Kephalaia of the Teacher (a small part of this went to Vienna); the Epistles of Mani; the Acts, a history of Mani and the early community; and the Synaxeis of the Living Gospel, (this codex also contains an at present unidentified text). In London: the Psalm Book, together with an index; a collection of Homilies; and the Kephalaia of the Wisdom of my Lord Mani.

The Coptic texts themselves date from about 400 c.e., and are translations of Syriac originals which reach back to Mani himself (the Epistles), or to the first generations (as with the Homilies). They are written in a form (L4) of that dialect known as sub-Achmimic or Lycopolitan; and thus seem not to have originated in the Fayoum, but were carried perhaps by missionaries or believers fleeing persecution.

The conservation of the extremely fragile codices from Medinet Madi, both of London and Berlin, was entrusted to the renowned H. Ibscher; and the task of printing the editions consigned to Kohlhammer Verlag. A special Coptic font was cut to resemble as closely as possible the hand of the original. For the first ten years publication proceeded apace: in 1934 H.J. Polotsky's edition and German translation of 96 pages of Manichäische Homilien; in 1938 the latter 234 pages of A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II, with an English translation by C.R.C. Allberry; and fascicles of the Berlin Kephalaia by A. Böhlig and H.J. Polotsky reaching page 244 in 1940. Unfortunately the rise of National Socialism in Germany, and the advent of the second world war, heralded a number of tragedies. These included the departure from Germany of a number of the leading scholars due to the threat of anti-semitism; the death of Allberry; and the loss and probable destruction of some of the codices housed in the soviet sector of Berlin. Specifically the historical work (Acts) and the Epistles seem to have been removed, and now only portions of these codices remain.

Such events led effectively to an end of work on the Medinet Madi texts for over forty years. Admittedly, A. Böhlig published a further fascicle of the Kephalaia (pages 244 – 291) in 1966, but the material for this was largely prepared in 1943. However, the current outlook is much more positive. With the financial support of the Carlsberg foundation S. Giversen has published a facsimile edition of all the Dublin texts in four volumes: Kephalaia; Homilies and Varia; Psalm Book Part I; and II (Cahiers d'Orientalisme XIV-XVII, Geneva 1986, 1988). Meanwhile, a separate team under the direction of J. Robinson is working on the remaining texts from Berlin, the Kephalaia and Synaxeis codices, together with such leaves as remain of the Acts and Epistles. Another team directed by M. Krause is currently in the process of reediting part II of the Psalm Book, before turning to Part I; and S. Giversen is coordinating the reedition of the Homilies codex. Also, I. Gardner is editing the new Coptic literary texts from Kellis, and coordinating work on the rest of the Manichaean material there together with other members of the Dakhleh Oasis Project.

The Kephalaia of the Teacher

Two codices of Kephalaia (that is 'of the head', thus chapters or summaries) were found at Medinet Madi. Their titles differ slightly, the wording of the Dublin one indicating more explicitly that it is the work of a disciple. However, this may not be of any great significance; and the two codices could well belong together. Until a full edition is made, their relationship will remain unclear. Certainly all the work is apocryphal in terms of Mani's canon of scripture. Still, the reference to the Kephalaia in such an early work as The Sermon of the Great War (H.18.6) indicates that it belongs in essence to the first generation after the death of the apostle (late third century)[3].

[3] 'I am weeping for the Kephalaia'. A reference in the Acta Archelai evidences that the work was known of in Christian circles by the 340's at the latest (for dating see Lieu 1994: 46-47, 135-140).

Indeed, in the introductory section to the text there appears to be a justification from Mani himself:

> The world has not permitted me to write down [...] all of it; and if you, my children and my disciples, write all my wisdom [...] the questions that you have asked me [...] and the explanations that I have made clear to you from time to time; the homilies, the lessons, that I have proclaimed with the teachers to the leaders, together with the elect and the catechumens [...] all that I have proclaimed from time to time. They are not written. You must remember them and write them; gather them in different places; because much is the wisdom that I have uttered to you. [...] according to your capacity, and even as you may find strength; remember! And write a little something from the great wisdom that you have heard from me (K. 6.16–27 9.5–7).

In a sense this is curious since it was intrinsic to the Manichaean scheme of things that the messages of previous apostles had been adulterated because they themselves had not written their own canon, unlike Mani, and their disciples had then corrupted their words. Nevertheless, kephalaic material has also been found in Manichaean writings in the east, in Parthian and Chinese, and clearly became an important genre for the propagation of the religion.

The Berlin codex opens with a grand survey of Manichaean cosmogonic doctrine; a listing of the canon; and a justification for the text itself, as above. Chapter One then relates the advent and task of previous apostles, culminating in Mani's own call, and the revelation from the Paraclete (his Twin Spirit or Counterpart). However, whilst the earliest chapters might be supposed to evidence some coherent structure to the work, there rapidly follows perhaps two hundred more linked in the most tenuous fashion if at all. The work illustrates a fascination, presumably Mani's own, with all aspects of the natural world, with astrology and the worlds of gods and demons. All such are ordered into elaborate taxonomies, underpinned by the detail of Mani's revealed doctrine, in order to establish a highly structured and holistic understanding of the cosmos and universal history.

The chapters vary greatly in length, appearing to incorporate blocks of oral and perhaps written tradition from a variety of sources. In general they follow a standard pattern wherein a disciple (occasionally an opponent) asks a question of the apostle, the 'enlightener' (various epithets are used). Usually contextual or historical detail is missing. The body of the chapter is then taken up with a summary of doctrine on that particular question which convinces all listeners; and may then end with a prayer of praise for Mani and thanks for his revelation. Similar catechetical methods can be found in early Christian and Buddhist texts. Certainly an introductory knowledge of the broad sweep of Manichaean teaching, as provided below, will help before attempting the Kephalaia.

The translation offered here is from the edited Coptic text concluding with kephalaion 122 (K. 295.8)[4]. The original extent of the Berlin codex is difficult to ascertain. The last reported page is 501/502, but a fragment with the pagination 514 has been identified. This may indicate an original total of 22 quires (528 pages). W.-P. Funk is currently editing the latter part of the codex and reports that from K. 296 there can now only be traced records or remains of 139 further pages, some of these in early transcriptions by Polotsky and Böhlig. It thus appears that 70 pages are no longer extant, counting to K. 504 (21 quires)[5].

The total number of chapters in the Berlin codex can be calculated as approximately 210/220. Since the lowest number for a kephalaion yet noted in the Dublin codex is 221 (pl. 17), it seems probable that this is in some sense a second volume, despite some apparent variations in the terminology and structure of the work[6]. The facsimile edition contains 354 plates; but the original extent and order of the codex has not been established.

The Kephalaia as Text

The Kephalaia is a dense and complex work, evidencing a great concern for detail and structure. Who were its authors and readers? Each kephalaion purports to be the verbatim record of a lesson by Mani, yet it is apparent that it is a constructed text in the process of evolution. The sequencing of chapters shows only a limited rationale, with links established by content (e.g. the actions of the Living Spirit in 42 – 44) or by terminology or some catchphrase regardless of theme (e.g. 'five' in 12 – 16). The incorporation of the number into the title, as with 'The Seventh (kephalaion)', evidences that the sequence is beginning to be fixed; but this is likely only to be true of the very earliest chapters.

Redaction history is also apparent in the body of the material itself. For example the description of the five worlds of darkness that occurs in both chapters 6 and 27, (and in the Mandaean Right Ginza), must rely on some prior source. However, since the redactors must have had ready access to Mani's scriptures, they would not have directly incorporated parts of the canon. Indeed, the lessons are presented as secondary to the scriptures, for on occasion they follow requests for the reiteration in condensed form or explanation of what Mani has written elsewhere (e.g K. 16.25 – 28). Therefore, kephalaic material can be understood to evolve as commentary to revelation.
